Replication to the second plea, that the plaintiff did not seize, take, or detain as a distress for the rent in the second plea mentioned any goods of the defendant of sufficient value to satisfy the said rent, and the costs and charges of the distress, sale, and appraisement, or out of which the plaintiff might have satisfied the said rent, costs, and charges, in manner and form, &c. To the third plea, that the plaintiff did not seize, take, or detain any goods of the defendant of value sufficient for a full satisfaction and discharge of the said causes of action in the said declaration mentioned, in manner and form, &c. To the fourth plea, that the plaintiff did not seize, take, or detain any goods of the defendant of the value in the said fourth plea mentioned, in manner and form, &c.

Special demurrers to the replications to the second, third, and fourth pleas. The principal grounds of demurrer set out were, that the replications were too large, and traversed immaterial allegations, and left the real defences set up in the pleas unanswered.

Rew, in support of the demurrers.—The defence set up in the second plea is substantially an accord and satisfaction; and the replication to it is directed to the inducement, which merely shews how the goods came into the plaintiff's possession. Whether they were in his hands as a distress, or otherwise, is quite immaterial, if he took them in satisfaction. The replication also attempts to put in issue the value of the goods, but that also is immaterial, the retaining of them being the satisfaction alleged in the plea. In a recent case in the Exchequer, Sibree v. Tripp (1), it was held that the acceptance of a negotiable security may in law be a satisfaction of a debt of larger amount. Parke, B., in giving his judgment in that case, cites the following passage from Co. Lit. 212, b.—“The obligor or feoffor cannot, at the time appointed, pay a lesser sum in satisfaction of the whole, because it is apparent that a lesser sum of money cannot be a satisfaction of a greater; but if the obligee or feoffee do at the day receive part, and thereof make acquittance under his seal, in full satisfaction of the whole, it is sufficient by reason that the deed amounted to an acquittance of the whole." It is clear, then, that the accord was good, and that the acceptance in satisfaction is the material part of the plea. The replication also speaks of the costs of the sale and appraisement of the goods taken, though no sale or appraisement took place. The traverse is too large for thus introducing immaterial averments into the issue, and is therefore bad—Stephen on Pleading, 4th edit. 269, 272. Thurman v. Wild (2), Eden v. Turtle (3), Basan v. Arnold (4), Tempest v. Kilner (5). In Eden v. Turtle, Parke, B. said, "I quite agree that if the effect of the replication was to compel the defendant to prove more than he otherwise would have been bound to do in order to support his plea, it would be bad." Again the replication is bad, as containing a negative pregnant. It amounts to this: "the plaintiff never took any goods of sufficient value," &c. That allegation is pregnant with the affirmative that he did take the goods. In Com. Dig. tit. 'Pleader,' (R,) 5, an instance is given where the introduction of time and place was held to make a traverse bad as a negative pregnant. Similar arguments are applicable to the replications to the third and fourth pleas.

Lush, contra.—The authority of the cases is not disputed; and if more is involved in the issues than is necessary, the replications are bad. It is submitted that the third and fourth pleas are bad; and that if the second is good, the replication to it is good also. The second plea professes to be one of accord and satisfaction; but it does not contain an accord: if it does, it shews no satisfaction. It is not alleged that there was any agreement that the plaintiff should take the goods in satisfaction; but that having got them, he accepted them in satisfaction with the assent of the defendant. The defendant may have said and done nothing in the matter.

[MAULE, J.—Surely the acceptance in satisfaction is the material part of the plea.]

There ought to be a delivery in satisfaction as well.

[WILDE, C.J.—The words "accept in satisfaction" must surely imply an accord.]

They may do so; but it does not follow that there is a satisfaction. This differs materially from the case where a person delivers goods to another, who has no prior right to them. If the Court can see that there was no consideration for the bargain, then there is no accord; and for this reason the value becomes material.

[MAULE, J.—The replication includes the costs of sale and appraisement.]

If the allegation is material at all, it is correctly traversed in the terms of the plea. If the plea had shewn on the face of it that the value of the goods was less than that for which they were accepted, it would have been bad. The plaintiff was also legally in possession of the goods before the arrangement.

[WILDE, C.J.—You suppose things to have no other than a pecuniary value. If a person chooses to become the owner of goods otherwise than by sale why should he not make an agreement to that effect?]

The third and fourth pleas are bad, because they set up bad accords. They shew a right of action by the defendant for the wrongful conversion, and a right of action by the plaintiff in respect of the matters mentioned in the declaration, and an agreement that they should be quit of their actions against each other. Such an accord is bad, according to the authorities—Com. Dig. tit. 'Accord,' (B.) 1, Lutw. 57, 1 Roll. Abr. 128, tit. 'Accord,' (A.) It is true that the pleas go on to say, that it was agreed that the plaintiff should keep the goods; but that only amounts to the same thing, namely, to be quit of actions.

[WILDE, C.J.—It is more than that, for the defendant gave up the property in the goods seized. The seizure is alleged to have been wrongful, and therefore the de-

Abatement—Non-joinder, Plea of—Affidavit—Residence.

The affidavit verifying a plea in abatement for non-joinder of a co-contractor should state correctly his place of residence; and the Court will set aside the plea on motion, if it appears on affidavit that such place has not been correctly stated. It is not sufficient to state the place where the co-contractor carries on his business.

This was an action of debt. The defendant pleaded in abatement the non-joinder of nine co-contractors, of whom Robert Denton and James Elkington Boord were two. In the affidavit which accompanied the plea the defendant stated that Robert Denton resided at No. 89, Leadenhall Street, in the city of London, and James Elkington Boord at Bath, in the county of Somerset. The plaintiff's attorney filed an affidavit, in which he stated that he had made inquiries as to the residence of Robert Denton; that Charles Bremner resided at No. 89, Leadenhall Street, and had informed the deponent that he was the only occupier of the premises, and that Robert Denton had not resided there for the last two months and upwards; that the deponent had made inquiries also as to the residence of J. E. Boord, and had learnt from a solicitor at Bath that he was not resident there. Affidavits were filed in answer, in which it was stated that Denton had formerly carried on business at 89, Leadenhall Street; that his name was over the door; that two persons called there, and asked if Denton was in; that Bremner answered that he was not, and it was uncertain when he would be in; that Bremner was asked if Denton had given up business, and that he declined to answer, and did not give reason to believe that he had ceased to reside there. It was also stated that Boord had lately removed to Bath, and had been seen there.

Meymott having obtained a rule nisi to set aside the plea and the accompanying affidavit of the defendant, and for leave to sign final judgment for the plaintiff,—

Scott (Nov. 25) shewed cause.—The questions which arise under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 8. are, whether the addresses of Denton and Boord are incorrect, and if so, whether advantage can be taken of such incorrectness by an application to the Court on affidavit. The affidavits in answer shew that the residence of Denton was correctly enough stated, the answers of Bremner being evasive; and there is no sufficient evidence that Boord did not reside in Bath. But the statute only requires the verification of the plea of non-joinder by affidavit, and if the affidavit is false, the party making it is liable to an indictment for perjury: and advantage cannot be taken of the incorrectness of the addresses on an application like this. The cases decided with regard to the correctness of the description of residences under the statute are Lambe v. Smythe (1), Wheatley v. Golney (2), and Newton v. Stewart (3).

[MAULE, J.—In Lambe v. Smythe the question whether advantage could be taken of such incorrectness by an application like the present was not raised at all. The other two cases were decided by my Brother Wightman on the authority of that case. In Wheatley v. Golney this point was not mentioned. In Newton v. Stewart, where the plea was set aside, the point was raised, but the case was decided on the supposition that Lambe v. Smythe was an authority on it.]

Meymott, in support of the rule.—The cases of Lambe v. Smythe and Wheatley v. Golney shew that the actual residences of the parties ought to be stated in the affidavit accompanying the plea; and Newton v. Stewart shews that the plea should be set aside, if it appears on affidavit for the plaintiff, that the addresses have been incorrectly given.

MAULE, J. (Dec. 9.) delivered the judgment of the Court.—This was a motion to set aside a plea in abatement for non-joinder, and was argued before the Chief Justice, my Brother Williams, and myself. The ground of the application was, that the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 8. had not been complied with. That section provides, "that no plea in abatement for the non-joinder of any person as a co-defendant shall be allowed in any court of common law, unless it shall be stated in such plea that such person is resident within the jurisdiction of the Court, and unless the place of residence of such person shall be stated with convenient certainty in an affidavit verifying such plea." The principal question which the Court took time to consider was, what the true construction of the latter part of this clause was? There were two cases in the Court of Exchequer, Wheatley v. Golney and Lambe v. Smythe, in which that Court decided that the question might be raised on an application to the Court. There was also a case where the point was expressly decided before my Brother Wightman in the Bail Court (Newton v. Stewart), but that point did not appear to be carefully reported. We have come to the conclusion that the true place of abode must be stated, and that the question whether it be so may be tried by the Court on affidavit. Before the statute, the law was, that the plea must be accompanied by an affidavit stating that it was true in substance and in effect, it being a dilatory plea, and that being required in all dilatory pleas. The statute did not alter the plea, except in requiring it to state that the person was resident within the jurisdiction of the Court. Now, there was nothing in the affidavit required before the act, which was not also stated in the plea. There was no allegation in it that might not be put in issue. But the provision of the act in question is a requisition which applies to the affidavit only. The residence must be stated in the affidavit, but need not be stated in the plea, and cannot consequently be put in issue by the replication. It would, therefore, be binding on the party if it could not be controverted in the manner proposed; and the question therefore is, whether the legislature meant the allegation to be binding on the plaintiff. Certainly, if the matter of the plea were not true, the defendant would fail, and the plaintiff would obtain judgment; and a doubt was raised on the argument, whether anything more was required than that the defendant should pledge his oath to the truth of the allegation. We think the object of requiring the statement is to enable the plaintiff to sue the party, and unless he gets the true residence that object would not be attained. It is true that the defendant may be certain that the party is within the jurisdiction, and yet may not be able to find his true residence, and then he will be deprived of the plea. But pleas in abatement are not to be favoured, and we think the legislature intended, that if the defendant is so situated that he cannot point out to the plaintiff the residence of the party, who, he says, is within the jurisdiction, he ought to be deprived of the benefit of the plea. Otherwise, the plaintiff would be no better off. We think the words of the section do support that construction. Then, what does the place of residence mean? It means that particular place where, in fact, the person is residing, and the statute is not complied with unless the true place is stated. Taking that to be the true construction, it follows that the matter may be inquired into upon affidavits, and if it turns out that the true place of residence is not stated, the plea ought to be disallowed. This affidavit appears to have been made in good faith. The place was one where the party might reasonably be found and met with. It was where he carried on his business. But still we think, that is not his residence. It would not be his place of residence for the service of a writ, which it is well known must be at his place of residence. Consequently, the plea ought to be disallowed. But, considering that the defendant might have been misled, we think, in making the rule absolute, it should be on condition that the defendant be at liberty to plead in bar within a week.

The defendant was tried on an indictment for perjury, convicted and sentenced, at Nisi Prius. On motion for a writ of habeas corpus to discharge him out of custody, on the ground that the judgment recited in the warrant of commitment was not warranted by law,—Held, that the Court will not grant a writ of habeas corpus, the effect of which will be to review the judgment of one of the superior courts. In such case the remedy is by writ of error.

This was an application on behalf of R. Dunn, a prisoner in the Queen's Prison, for a writ of habeas corpus in order to obtain his discharge from custody on the ground that the warrant of commitment was illegal. It appeared on affidavit that the prisoner was in custody under two warrants. The first warrant stated "that the defendant having been this day convicted of wilful and corrupt perjury, he be committed to the Queen's Prison, there to remain until discharged by due course of law." The second warrant stated that at a sitting at Nisi Prius, held at Guildhall, in London, on Saturday the 10th of February 1847, before Lord Denman, C.J., the defendant "having this day been convicted by a jury of the county of wilful and corrupt perjury, it is considered and adjudged, and ordered by me, the said Chief Justice, that he, the said R. Dunn, for the said wilful and corrupt perjury, be imprisoned in the Queen's Prison for the space of eighteen calendar months, to commence and be computed from the day on which he shall first be taken to and confined in the said prison in execution of this sentence; and that he, the said R. Dunn, do give security to keep the peace and to be of good behaviour to Her Majesty and all Her Majesty's liege subjects, and especially to A. B. Coutts, for the space of two years, the said two years to commence and be computed from the end and after the expiration of the said eighteen calendar months; and that he, the said R. Dunn, do give security himself in 100*l.* with two sureties of 50*l.* each, and that he, the said R. Dunn, be further imprisoned until such securities be given, and that the said R. Dunn be committed to the keeper of the said prison, to be by him kept in safe custody in execution of this judgment." (Signed) "Denman."

Pashley, in support of the application.—The first warrant is clearly bad, inasmuch as the term of imprisonment is not distinctly stated in it. With respect to the second warrant, if a free pardon were granted to R. Dunn for the offence of which he is convicted, and he could not get bail, he would still be compelled to remain in prison for the two years for which the sureties are required, and also for the eighteen months previous to such two years. The judgment therefore is erroneous and the sentence illegal. There is no authority to be found which decides, that on a conviction for perjury the defendant can be sentenced to imprisonment and further sentenced to find sureties to keep the peace any more than on a conviction for forgery: the only security which a defendant can ever be called upon to give is, that he will not offend again in a like manner. In re Reynolds (1) is an authority to that effect, and is in favour of this application. In that case two persons were convicted under the Night Poaching Act, and by the warrant of commitment they were ordered to be imprisoned and find sureties "not to offend again for the space of one year next following;" the commitment was held bad as being too general in its terms, and giving a power to the gaoler, not warranted by the statute, which might subject the parties to a longer term of imprisonment than the law permits.

[MAULE, J.—Then it is an erroneous judgment, and you are not entitled to be heard in this form. A single Judge at chambers may grant a writ of habeas corpus; but a single Judge cannot review the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench.]

[WILDE, C.J.—It is perfectly clear the applicant's remedy is by a writ of error: that is the proper course. If this application were entertained, it would lead to consequences which cannot be anticipated.]

[MAULE, J.—There was a case, O'Connell v. the Queen (2), in which the plaintiff in error was sentenced to be imprisoned for a further term to keep the peace, he having been convicted of conspiracy, and no one advanced this point at all; it seems remarkable that it was not taken if it could have been. The prisoner here is not entitled to make this application under the statute 31 Car. 2. c. 2, for he is imprisoned for an offence which is not bailable. In re Reynolds was the case of a summary conviction by Justices, where the remedy by writ of error did not lie.]

That view of the case would take away the remedy by writ of habeas corpus whenever there is not a summary conviction. A writ of error could not safely be brought in this case, for the prisoner was sentenced at the time of the trial under the statute of 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. s. 9, which gives the power of amending the judgment, and thus the terms of the ultimate judgment are at present uncertain. The warrant as it stands is the existing judgment; it is submitted the sentence thereby pronounced is an illegal sentence, and the writ will, therefore, be granted.

WILDE, C.J.—There can be no doubt that the prisoner in this case must seek his remedy by a writ of error. If the sentence be illegal, that is the course for him to pursue. If the Court were to grant this application, it would follow, that by the summary process of a motion, which may be entertained by a single Judge at chambers, the judgment of the superior courts might be impeached; and thus, among other consequences, the remedy by writ of error, which the law provides for certain cases (of which this is one), would be virtually abrogated.

1847. } FIELD v. M'KENZIE, PUBLIC
Nov. 13, 16. } OFFICER.

Banking Company—Sci. Fa.—Setting aside—Suppression of Facts.

It is no ground for setting aside a rule for a sci. fa. granted against former partners of a banking company under 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 13, that the plaintiff had a collateral security from the bank, which, by care and manage- ment might have been made productive, and which he had omitted to mention in the affidavits on which the rule was granted.

In this case, in which the plaintiff had recovered judgment upon a promissory note, against the defendant, as public officer of the Newcastle-upon-Tyne Joint-stock Banking Company, a rule for a scire facias against certain persons who were members of the banking company at the time the contract was entered into, was made absolute (1).

Channell, Serj. (Nov. 4,) on behalf of Joseph Stocks, one of the parties sought to be charged, obtained a rule nisi, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the former rule and all proceedings had thereon should not be set aside, with costs, on the ground that material facts had been suppressed by the plaintiff on the motion for that rule; and also on the ground of surprise.

The affidavit in support of the present rule contained statements to the following effect:—An indenture was executed on the 26th of July 1842, between T. C. Gibson of one part, and W. Nesham and R. Todd, trustees of the banking company, of the other part. It recited a bill of sale from the sheriff of Durham to Gibson of a leasehold colliery, called Hunwick Colliery, consisting of 712 acres, and Newfield Colliery, consisting of 67 acres, both in the county of Durham; and that Gibson had opened an account with the banking company, in respect of which they required security. The indenture then proceeded to assign and transfer to the said W. Nesham and R. Todd, as such trustees, all the estate and property comprised in the bill of sale, as security to the company in respect of the said account, to the amount of 20,000*l.* and interest. There was a proviso in the deed for redemption on the payment of the 20,000*l.* and interest. An indenture of the 28th of February 1845, between the said W. Nesham and R. Todd, as such trustees, of the first part, the said R. Todd and W. Nesham, G. T. Gibson, and S. Stobart, directors of the company, of the second part, the said T. C. Gibson of the third part, and the plaintiff, J. Field, of the fourth part, recited the former indenture, and that 20,000*l.* with interest was due thereon, which T. C. Gibson had been called upon, but had found it inconvenient, to pay; that the above directors had, with the privity of T. C. Gibson, applied to the plaintiff to advance them 14,000*l.*, and that he had agreed to do so, on having the amount, with interest on it at 5*l.* per cent., secured by the promissory note of the company, and collaterally secured by an assignment of their mortgage security from the said T. C. Gibson, and also by a mortgage from him, with power of sale of a freehold messuage, farm, and lands, called Newfield, with the coal and other minerals in and under the same, for the purchase whereof, he, the said T. C. Gibson, had contracted and paid part of the price; that the plaintiff had paid the 14,000*l.* to the banking company, and that they, by a promissory note of even date with the deed, had promised to pay that sum to the plaintiff or his order, at the expiration of six calendar months, with interest. The deed then witnessed that Nesham and Todd, as trustees, did, with the consent of T. C. Gibson, and by the direction of the directors of the Bank, sell and assign the 20,000*l.* and interest, due upon the mortgage, and the hereditaments and premises therein mentioned, subject to redemption by the company on payment by them, or T. C. Gibson, of the said sum of 14,000*l.* and interest, the money not to be called in for five years if the interest was regularly paid.

On the 16th of April 1847, the plaintiff gave the company notice that he would, at the end of three months, sell the mortgaged property. It was further stated, that one S. Brooke held a second mortgage on the hereditaments and premises for 30,000*l.*, and that they might, with management and care, be made productive and valuable to an amount greatly exceeding the sum of 20,000*l.*, for which they were mortgaged to the Bank.

On behalf of the plaintiff, an affidavit was made by his solicitor, in which he stated that the Newfield property never was brought into the security, the purchase not having been completed, and that the plaintiff never had any lien on it; that the covenant not to call in the 14,000*l.* was conditional upon the performance by T. C. Gibson of the covenant to purchase the Newfield estate, and of other covenants; and that it was further stipulated that the plaintiff was not to be bound to proceed at law or in equity to recover the mortgage debt of 20,000*l.*, or to put in force the other securities, otherwise than he should think fit. It further stated, that pending the notice of sale there had been great commercial distress and embarrassment affecting the mining district, and that an experienced colliery-viewer, on inspecting the property, had reported that if it was then brought into the market, no purchaser would be found, and its future value would be depreciated, but that if the colliery and premises were properly kept up they might become valuable. It also averred, that Stocks was well aware of the mortgage to Field, the plaintiff; and that if Stocks would pay the debt, the plaintiff was willing to hand over the mortgage to him.

Martin and Hugh Hill (Nov. 13,) shewed cause.—The important question in this case is, whether, according to the right construction of the 12th and 13th sections of the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46, it is necessary to shew that a person who has taken a collateral security is bound to realize it before he can obtain a scire facias against former shareholders in a banking co-partnership. This rule was moved on the ground that there had been an improper suppression of facts, but the affidavit in answer shews that there was no want of good faith in not mentioning the mortgage deed, which the plaintiff took as a collateral security for the payment of the money which he had advanced. All that the legislature requires is, that an execution shall be issued against the present members of a banking co-partnership before recourse is had to those who were members at the time the contract was entered into. There is no authority to shew that a collateral security must be realized first. At all events, the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney shews that the security could not at that time be realized, from the state of the market. The only two cases at all applicable are Eardley v. Law (2) and Harvey v. Scott (3), which latter case recognizes the construction of the statute adopted by this Court in giving judgment on the former rule in the present case. The principle to be derived from those cases is, that if the affidavits contain prima facie evidence that due diligence has been used in vain to obtain available executions against the present members of the company, the Court will grant the sci. fa. against the former members. It is for the Court to decide whether the efforts made for that purpose have been made bond fide or not; and even if the Court should be disposed to enter into all the circumstances of this mortgage, the affidavits shew that it could not be considered an available security.

(2) 12 Ad. & El. 802; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 46.

(3) Ante, Q.B. p. 9.

Channell, Serj. and Bramwell, in support of the rule.—The intention of the legislature was to make former partners liable only when all other means had proved ineffectual.

[MAULE, J.—It is very important for you to establish that not only executions but all other means must be had recourse to in the first instance. The present inclination of my opinion is, that the statute contemplates nothing but executions.]

Supposing the party applying for a sci. fa. had a security upon which he could not issue execution, but which the Court could see that he could easily realize, would the Court in such case grant a scire facias against former partners? The affidavits in support of the former rule were not fair and candid, because they purposely omitted the statements relative to this mortgage.

WILDE, C.J. (Nov. 16.) delivered the judgment of the Court.—We have looked through the affidavits in this case, and have come to the conclusion that there is no ground for this rule. The original rule, which asked for leave to issue a sci. fa. against J. Stocks and others, was made absolute last Trinity term, on the ground that the plaintiff had used all reasonable means to obtain satisfaction against the members primarily liable on the judgment which he had obtained, and that such endeavours had been unavailing (4). It is now sought to open that rule upon two grounds, first, because the plaintiff wrongfully suppressed certain facts in the affidavits used by him in moving for the previous rule; and secondly, on the ground of surprise. On the first ground, it is said that the plaintiff mentioned nothing to the Court about a certain mortgage security of a colliery and works in the north of England, delivered to him by the Bank, which, if he had stated in his affidavit, that rule would not have been granted. It is to be observed, that there is very little said about this mortgage security in the affidavits now before the Court: the attorney of Mr. Stocks is the only person who mentions it. At the close of his affidavit, he states the existence of the mortgage security, and that he has been informed, and verily believes, that the said hereditaments and premises are of considerable value, and that by care and management they may be made productive of a large sum of money to an amount greatly exceeding 20,000*l.* He does not say when or how they can be made productive. It is sufficient to say, that such a statement as that shews no present means of payment; neither is there any reason why a plaintiff should not proceed with his remedy by sci. fa. against the former members, because there is in existence a certain security which by care and management may possibly at some time or other be rendered productive. There is nothing further urged on this point in support of the rule. In answer to that statement, it is said by the plaintiff, that property of this nature in the north of England is now so depreciated, and there is so little demand for it, that if put up for sale at the present time no buyer could be found for it, and such a course would materially injure the sale of it at any future period. He also goes on to say, that if Mr. Stocks will pay the debt, he is quite willing to hand over the mortgage security to him. The first ground, then, is wholly insufficient. There was no material suppression of a material fact such as would have induced the Court to vary from its former decision. Nor do we think, upon looking at the affidavits, that there was any wilful or fraudulent suppression of this mortgage-deed: it was perfectly notorious that there was such a security in existence and in the possession of the Bank, and the circumstance of its present want of value seems to be the reason why it was not mentioned. Neither is there anything to shew that Mr. Stocks was taken by surprise on the former occasion. He shewed cause against the former rule, and ought, previously to so doing, to have made all necessary inquiries about the property possessed by the Bank; and this he did not take the trouble to do. If he had made any inquiries he would have heard of this mortgage, and the proper time to bring it before the Court was before the rule was made absolute, not after. The circumstances stated do not constitute a surprise, by which I understand that a party has discovered something, which by the use of reasonable care and diligence he could not previously have found out. That is not this case; and as the plaintiff has been brought here without due reason, this rule must be

Practice—Irregularity—Declaration—Debt and Assumpsit—Variance from Process.

The writ was in an action of debt; and the commencement of the declaration was in the form usual in debt. The first count was good either in debt or in assumpsit, and the second and only other count was a good count in assumpsit:—Held, that this was a good declaration in assumpsit, and should therefore be set aside for irregularity, as varying from the process.

Held, also, that under these circumstances the plaintiff could not insist that the declaration was demurrable for misjoinder of a count in debt with a count on promises, as an answer to an application to set it aside for irregularity.

In this case, the process was issued in an action of debt, and the form of the declaration in its commencement was in an action of debt. The first count alleged that the plaintiff drew his bill of exchange on the defendant, and the defendant accepted the same, and promised the plaintiff to pay him the same, according to the tenor and effect thereof and of the said acceptance thereof, but did not pay the same on the day when it became due, or at any time afterwards. The second count alleged that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff on an account stated; and the declaration then continued, "and the defendant afterwards, to wit, &c., in consideration of the last-mentioned premises promised the plaintiff to pay him the said last-mentioned monies on request. Yet the defendant hath disregarded his last-mentioned promise, and hath not paid the said last-mentioned monies," &c.

Chadwick Jones, Serj., having obtained a rule nisi for setting aside the declaration for irregularity, as varying from the process,

Pearson now shewed cause. — If the first count is a good count in debt, and the second a count in assumpsit, then there is a misjoinder, and the defendant ought to have demurred—Rotton v. Jeffery (1). The word "promise," occurring in a count, does not necessarily make it a count in assumpsit—Compton v. Taylor (2), Cloves v. Williams (3). No formal conclusion is necessary in a count for debt—Ashbee v. Pidduck (4). No promise need be alleged in an action against an acceptor—Stericker v. Baker (5); therefore, the first count is a good count in debt. But at all events, an application to set aside a declaration for irregularity, on the ground that it varies from the process, should be made with despatch to a Judge at chambers—Tory v. Stevens (6).

Chadwick Jones, Serj., in support of the rule.—In Marshall v. Thomas (7) the form of action was wrongly stated in the commencement of the declaration, and that was held to be an irregularity, and not a ground for special demurrer. In Thompson v. Dicas (8) the writ was in trespass, and the declaration, which was in case, was set aside for irregularity.

WILDE, C.J.—I think the rule ought to be made absolute. The process was clearly issued in an action of debt; and the declaration professes to follow the process. It contains two counts, the first of which would be good, either in debt or in assumpsit, and the second is a count in assumpsit. The general rule is, that a record is to be construed as being in accordance with the rules of pleading; and a party is not entitled to contend that his own pleading is bad. It would open the door to trickery, if when an application was made on the ground of an irregularity, the party charged with it might say, I have not committed that fault, but I have committed another. The first count may be good in assumpsit, and the second is in assumpsit. There is, therefore, a sufficient declaration in assumpsit; but as it is not in accordance with the process issued, there is an irregularity in the proceedings which entitles the defendant to have this rule made absolute.

MAULE, J.—The form of the declaration in the commencement is in an action of debt; but that does not alter what follows. The first count states a breach of a promise, and the second is the usual count, on an account stated in assumpsit. The distinction between assumpsit and debt, when brought for the payment of money, is sometimes rather subtle. In assumpsit, the claim is for damages, and in debt the sum is claimed as a duty. When a plaintiff goes on beyond the statement of a duty, and states a promise and a breach of that promise, that may be properly considered as shewing an intention to adopt that form of action in which a breach of promise is material.

Debt for money had and received.

Plea—Never indebted. Issue thereon.

The action was tried, before Wilde, C.J., at the sittings in London after Michaelmas term, 1846, when the following memorandum was put in by the plaintiff:—"March 25th, 1846.—Mr. Varney bets Mr. Isaacs 20*l.* that his horse will make the best of his way for two miles against Mr. Isaacs's horse. Mr. Varney to have the same horse that he used when Mr. Hickman rode with him to the coursing match at Hampton. Each horse to draw ten hundred weight besides the carriage. The match to come off on Monday the 30th of March 1846. The horse to have been the property of Mr. Isaacs for the last eighteen months. The match to come off on the Uxbridge road. (Signed) John Varney."

"The money to be deposited with Mr. Hickman on or before the 28th of March 1846. Witness to 1*l.* having been staked on both sides for the completion of the above match, (Signed) Samuel Ellis; J. Hickman for Mr. Isaacs."

Varney and Isaacs severally deposited 20*l.* with the defendant. The plaintiff gave the defendant notice before the time appointed for the race that he repudiated the wager and demanded back his money, which the defendant refused to return. The plaintiff did not attend to contest the race, Isaacs walked over the ground, and the money was paid over to him by the defendant on the same day. The present action was brought by the plaintiff to recover the 20*l.* deposited by him in the hands of the defendant.

The defendant's counsel, at the trial, submitted that the plaintiff must be non-suited on the ground that the contract proved was an illegal contract under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. s. 18. (1). The learned

Chief Justice overruled the objection, and told the jury, that if they were satisfied that the plaintiff had revoked the authority of the stakeholder before the determination of the event, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The jury found for the plaintiff. A rule having been obtained for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection,—

Talfourd, Serj. and Phinn shewed cause.—The verdict is right, and may be supported upon two grounds: first, the act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. does not apply to a case like the present; and, secondly, if it does apply, the defendant ought to have pleaded that the contract was illegal. Looking to the preamble of the statute, "Whereas the laws heretofore made in restraint of unlawful gaming have been found of no avail to prevent the mischiefs which may happen therefrom," and construing it in connexion with the 18th section, it is contended, that the intention of the legislature was to prevent the recovery of the stake deposited to abide the event of a wager by the party who assumed to have won the wager; it was not intended to prevent either party who had deposited money from voluntarily withdrawing his assent to the contract before the determination of the wager, and thus of his own free will preventing the result which the act was passed compulsorily to prevent. If the construction contended for by the defendant be correct, then the title of the act should be: "An act to continue wagering," &c., for its effect will be that the locus pœnitentiæ always allowed in agreements which savour of illegality is taken away, and a thoughtless wager hastily entered into cannot be departed from. The latter part of the 18th section "that no suit shall be brought in any court of law for recovering any sum of money won upon any wager," is an expansion and repetition of the former part, "all contracts by way of wagering shall be null and void;" and the effect intended, and in fact accomplished, money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made. Provided always, that this enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute for or towards any plate, prize, or sum or money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise."

by the 18th clause is to withdraw from courts of justice the unprofitable and idle task of inquiring into and deciding which of two persons had won a wager and was entitled to the stakes. If the language be ambiguous the Court will not give a wider sense to the words of the 18th section than is warranted by the obvious intention of the statute, but will restrain the meaning within proper limits—Dwarris on Statutes, p. 580, ed. of 1848, Salkeld v. Johnston (2), Crespigny v. Wittenoom (3), Green v. Wood (4), Bac. Abr. tit. 'Statutes' (1), 5. Secondly, if the statute did constitute a defence, such defence should have been pleaded specially, and cannot be taken advantage of under nunquam indebitatus. The Statute of Limitations contains words quite as strongly prohibitory as this statute; so does the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 37, which makes the delivery of an attorney's bill a condition precedent to the commencement of an action. In both those cases a special plea is required, and the same principle must govern this case. The general issue denies that a debt ever existed. If the effect of this statute be to create a disqualification, which disables a plaintiff from recovering that which once existed as a debt, such a defence must be specially pleaded—Potts v. Sparrow (5), Martin v. Smith (6). They also referred to Marryatt v. Broderick (7), and Emery v. Richards (8).

Byles, Serj., Parry, and Joyce supported the rule.—Before the passing of the late statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. a deposit even upon a legal wager could be recovered in an action, if notice were given to the stakeholder before the money was paid over—Eltham v. Kingsman (9), Egerton v. Furzeman (10); and it cannot be disputed that there was a right to recover the deposit if the wager were illegal; nevertheless, it is to be observed, that the rule that an authority coupled with an interest cannot be revoked, does not seem to have been alluded to in these cases. The object and intention of this part of the 18th section of the statute was threefold: first, to put an end to all actions of every sort, whether before or after notice, whether before or after the event, which depended in any way upon wagers or contracts by way of wagering; secondly, to protect the stakeholder from an action under all circumstances; and thirdly, to operate as a penalty against every person who made a deposit to abide the event of a wager. The words of the 18th section, "no suit shall be brought for recovering any sum which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made," are very strong, and it is submitted conclusive to shew that the plaintiff in this case ought to have been nonsuited. As to the second point, it was not necessary to state this defence in a special plea. The construction of the 18th section is as if it had enacted in terms, "that no promise shall be implied from any such deposit." There never was any right of action; there never was any debt, and therefore the new rules of pleading do not apply. This is more like the case of an apothecary who cannot recover without proving his certificate, though the general issue be the only plea on the record—Shearwood v. Hay (11).

MAULE, J. (12).—This is an action of debt for money had and received brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, on the ground that the defendant had received 20*l.* in money which he held to his (plaintiff's) use. It appears there had been a wager on a horse-race, and that 20*l.* had been deposited by each of the parties with the defendant, and that before the race was run the plaintiff gave notice that he would not run the race, and desired that the defendant would return his deposit to him. Under these circumstances, it is contended, that the plaintiff in this case cannot recover: first, on the ground that the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 169. s. 18.

prevents the bringing of an action like the present; and, secondly, supposing that not to be so, then in order to avail himself of that section the defendant ought to have pleaded it specially. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to sustain the verdict notwithstanding the objection involved in the first point; but that if that objection had been a good one the defendant could not render it available as a defence without having specially pleaded it. With respect to the first point the question is, whether when a wager is rendered void by the first clause of the 18th section of the act, a stakeholder can be made liable at the suit of one party who has repudiated the wagering contract. Now the first part of the section provides that all contracts or agreements by way of gaming or wagering shall be null and void; it does not stop there, but further enacts that "no suit shall be brought or maintained for recovering any sum of money alleged to be won upon any wager," and also that no suit shall be maintained for recovering any sum "which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made." Now, the second provision was certainly comprehended in the first, and would have been the legal consequence of the first; but as there is nothing unusual in an act of parliament stating in terms that which would otherwise have been inferred, I do not think that fact ought to have any great weight in construing the act in question. Then, with respect to the third clause, it is said that provision would be idle, inasmuch that it would be no more than the legal consequence of the first unless there was given to it the further effect of depriving a party of his right to recover a deposit under a repudiated wagering contract. This construction, it is true, would give an operation to the clause beyond that which was merely the consequence of and incidental to the previous parts of the section. But I think if the second part of the section be looked at, it is more conformable that the third part should be considered as no more than an exposition of the legal consequence of the first. The second clause relates to the case where a winner brings an action against a loser, seeking to recover against a loser; and although the third clause might have been omitted, yet, if the second were inserted then the third became necessary. I think, therefore, on looking closely at the section and treating it as a matter of grammatical construction, that it does not apply to a case of a repudiated contract such as this. This construction, however, can, I think, be supported on still higher ground. It seems to me that the present action cannot be considered as an action brought to recover a sum of money or valuable thing which had been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event of any wager. Such an action would be one in which the plaintiff would claim the money, because it had been deposited in the defendant's hands to abide the event of a wager: but here it is quite the contrary; the money is claimed because it is money which belongs to the plaintiff and which the defendant holds for him, and is under no obligation to pay over to anybody else. After the notice of repudiation it ceased to be money in the defendant's hands to abide the event of a wager, and became money in his hands belonging to the plaintiff, which the defendant had no good reason for retaining. Upon these grounds, I think the case ought to be determined in the plaintiff's favour. It was said that the scope of the act was to prevent gaming, and to operate as a penalty upon every party who made a deposit, by disabling him from recovering it back, and that therefore the construction contended for by the defendant, as it would have the effect of discouraging gaming, ought to be upheld. But I do not think that it is reasonable to suppose that the act was intended to impose so penal a forfeiture as that suggested. Supposing, however, the true construction of the 18th section to be, that the plaintiff is thereby deprived of the right to recover back his stake, then I think it is necessary that such a defence should be specially pleaded, although in the present case it is unnecessary to give any decision on that point.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am also of opinion that the words of the act do not apply to this case. It is difficult to say whether the latter clauses of the 18th section are to be considered superfluous, or as inserted ex abundanti cautela. Looking, however, at the whole scope of the act it appears to me that it leaves the claim of a person to his deposit under a repudiated wager, as here, just as it was before at common law, and therefore that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. On the second objection as to pleading specially, I also think, though it is not necessary to decide the point, that a defence on the ground of illegality under the statute ought to be specially pleaded.

Indebitatus assumpsit — Contract Executory and Executed.

Where the father of an illegitimate child, in order to prevent the mother from applying to the magistrates for an order in bastardy, promised to pay her 2s. 6d. per week for the child, and the time for going before the magistrate had expired before action brought without any application having been made: — Held, that indebitatus assumpsit lay at the suit of the mother against the father for the child's maintenance, the consideration, which was originally executory, having been executed.

Assumpsit for meat, drink, and necessities supplied by the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before the under-sheriff of Surrey, it was proved that the plaintiff was the father of an illegitimate child by the defendant; that after the birth of the child the plaintiff was about to apply to the magistrate for an order in bastardy; that the defendant, in order to prevent her from doing so, said he would pay her 2s. 6d. a week for the child; that he did so for some time, but had refused to do so any more; and that the time limited by the statute for applying for an order in bastardy had expired before the commencement of the action: On behalf of the defendant, it was objected, that indebitatus assumpsit would not lie, and that the declaration ought to have been special, the consideration being executory and not executed. A verdict was found for the plaintiff, but leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

Phinn now moved for a rule nisi accordingly.—The express promise proved does not support the declaration. The consideration was the forbearing to go before the magistrates. The mere moral consideration arising from the duty to support an illegitimate child would not be sufficient to maintain the promise. The insufficiency of a moral consideration is established in Eastwood v. Kenyon (1) and Mortimore v. Wright (2).

[WILLIAMS, J.—The consideration in those cases was executed. Here, it is executory, namely, to maintain the child.]

In Jennings v. Brown (3), the father of an illegitimate child promised the mother that if she would maintain it he would pay an annuity, and it was held that the promise was founded upon a sufficient consideration. But the point now made is, that there is here an express promise proved, which does not correspond with the promise alleged in the declaration to pay for the maintenance on request.

WILDE, C.J.—As the transaction in this case was one which might be made the foundation of an action, it becomes a question of pleading how it should be stated in the declaration; and looking at the nature of the action, the objection to the pleading ought to be a strong one to induce the Court to sustain it. The consideration for the agreement was the forbearance of the plaintiff from applying to the magistrates, and the period for applying had passed by before the commencement of the action, so that the defendant has had the full benefit of the forbearance. Therefore the contract has been executed on the plaintiff's side; and when a contract, executory at the time it was made, has been executed, a general indebitatus count is sufficient.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think there was evidence to support the common count. If there was any special contract it has been performed, and nothing further was to be done but to pay the money.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The agreement on the part of the defendant was to this effect:—"If you will maintain the child out of your own resources, I will reimburse you 2s. 6d. a week." I think the verdict was correct.

Fines and Recoveries Act—Acknowledgment to bar Dower—Affidavit on Paper—Practice of Court.

The certificate of acknowledgment of a married woman to bar her dower, taken under a special commission, was verified by an affidavit written on paper, contrary to the usual practice of the Court, by which such documents are required to be on parchment:—Held, that the affidavit and other documents might be received and filed.

A special commission had been issued to take the acknowledgment of a married woman at Toronto to bar dower: the time for the return of the commission expired on the 14th of January. The documents were presented to the officer to be filed on the 12th of January, which he declined to do without the order of the Court.

Ball moved that the officer might be directed to receive and file the commission, &c., and that the time for the return be enlarged till the 1st of February next. The affidavit verifying the certificate required by the 85th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. is written on paper, and it is suggested by the officer that that document should be on parchment. There is no rule of court which renders it obligatory on parties to make use of parchment; but such was the invariable practice which prevailed under the rule of Hil. term, 14 Geo. 3, in respect of affidavits verifying acknowledgments of fines and warrants of attorney to suffer recoveries. The same practice has been adopted under this act; but it is submitted that the reason of the practice as to the use of parchment does not apply here. An acknowledgment to bar dower operates only for a very limited period during the lifetime of the married woman, and the same durability in the material is not required as when the document operates so as to pass the fee simple in an estate. In all other respects the documents are quite regular, and the Court will not deem it necessary to issue a fresh commission to Toronto, in order that the practice (in this instance unnecessary) may be strictly complied with. The documents were presented to the officer before the commission expired; but in consequence of his refusal to receive them the time for its return has now gone by, and an extension of the time is therefore required.

By the COURT.—The affidavit and notarial certificate are required to satisfy the Court that the acknowledgment has been duly taken. In this case, which is merely an acknowledgment of a married woman to bar her dower, it is not so necessary that the affidavit should be on parchment as in the case of documents verifying acknowledgments which pass the estate in fee. The usual rule that documents of this nature must be on parchment may be in this instance relaxed, and the documents may be received and filed by the officer.

Will, Construction of — Description of Devises.

A testator, by his will of November 1845, devised an estate to his "dear wife Caroline;" he had been twice married,—in 1834 to Mary, in 1840 to Caroline; they both survived him, and he lived with the latter up to the time of his death in November 1845:—Held, that the words "dear wife" were not inapplicable to Caroline, and that she was entitled as devisee.

Ejectment for the recovery of a house and premises situate at No. 5, Osborn Street, Whitechapel.

The case was tried, before Wilde, C.J., at the sittings for Middlesex after last Michaelmas term, when it appeared that Caroline Gains, the lessor of the plaintiff, claimed as devisee of one John Gains, who died on the 20th of November 1845 leaving a will, dated the 5th of November 1845, which directed "As to all my freehold messuage or tenement situate No. 5, Osborn Street, Whitechapel, in the county of Middlesex, and also my ready money, household furniture, plate, &c., I give, devise, and bequeath the same and every part thereof unto my dear wife Caroline, her heirs, executors and administrators absolutely." The lessor of the plaintiff proved that she was married to the testator at St. Paul's, Islington, some time in the year 1840, and lived with him as his wife from that period up to the time of his death. The defendant then proved that the testator was married on the 3rd of March 1834 to one Mary Whitpen; that he soon afterwards left her; that she was now living, and therefore contended that the words of the devise, "my dear wife," must be taken to designate his first and lawful wife; and that she was entitled to the premises. The learned Judge directed a verdict for the lessor of the plaintiff, reserving liberty to the defendant to move to have the verdict entered for him; and now—

Hawkins moved for a rule to shew cause accordingly.—The only person who answers the description in the will is Mary, the testator's real wife. The lessor of the plaintiff, Caroline Gains, never having been his wife at all, cannot shew any title to the premises in Osborn Street.

[MAULE, J.—There is an old rule—veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis.]

It is not allowable to give extrinsic evidence to explain any word in a will, which of itself has a well known and well defined meaning: thus in Doe d. Brown v. Brown (1) no evidence was allowed to shew what the word "copyholds" meant. If there be a devise to children, and the testator leave only one legitimate child and others illegitimate, the latter will not take—Bagley v. Mollard (2). And a person described in a will as heir, if not really heir, will be excluded—Mounsey v. Blamire (3). In that case "heir" meant legal heir; in this "wife" means legal wife.

There can be no doubt that the testator meant to give the premises to the lessor of the plaintiff; but evidence of his intention is not admissible. Extraneous circumstances cannot alter or extend the unambiguous and plain words in this will; and as there is but one lawful wife, Mary, she is the only person legally designated and legally entitled to the premises. He referred also to Jarman on Wills, vol. i. 331, vol. ii. 134, Pitcairne v. Brace (4), and Doe d. Hiscocks v. Hiscocks (5).

MAULE, J.—I am of opinion there should be no rule granted in this case. The testator devises "to my dear wife Caroline," which is a devise to a certain person by name; the name is that of the lessor of the plaintiff; no competitor appears for it, and it is not suggested there is any other person to whom the testator contemplated it would apply. The question then arises, whether the lessor of the plaintiff, not being the legal wife, can take under the will, which describes her as "my dear wife." One of Lord Bacon's Maxims of the Law enlights us upon this subject: veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis (6), and one of the examples he gives by way of illustration is this: "So if I grant land Episcopo nunc Londinensi qui me erudit in pueritid, this is a good grant, although he never instructed me." No doubt, this rule, which used to be most strictly applied, has been relaxed in modern times when it can be shewn from what appears on the face of the will itself, that the testator meant another and a different person from the person named in the will; the reason is, in order that the real intention of the testator may be carried out; but in this case there is a struggle against the old rule that the name must prevail, not on the ground of the testator's intention having failed, but in order to get rid of a devise to a person by name who is and was intended to be named in the will. As there is no dispute that the testator intended that the lessor of the plaintiff should have the estate, I think that even if the words "dear wife" were inapplicable to her, still she would take as devisee; but that is not so. Caroline was his wife de facto; she lived with him up to the time of his death; he might have considered the first an invalid marriage, and it is clear that he insists upon the last marriage by his will. The description is not inapplicable altogether, but really and properly applicable in a certain sense, and that sense understandable by any one. An ordinary person would have said the testator had two wives: he calls Caroline his "dear wife," and it seems to me these terms are intelligible only when applied to the lessor of the plaintiff. Interpreting, then, the language of this will according to its proper acceptation, and the circumstances existing at the time of its execution, there can be no doubt what the testator intended; and it is equally free from doubt that he used apt words to effectuate his intention.

CRESSWELL, J.—I agree, for the reasons which have been fully stated by my Brother Maule. The judgment of Lord Abinger in Doe d. Hiscocks v. Hiscocks lays down the rule which we now act upon.

Insolvent Plaintiff—Patent Cause—Costs, Security for.

At the trial of an action for the infringement of a patent, the plaintiff obtained a verdict which was afterwards set aside, and a new trial granted. Before the second trial, the plaintiff became insolvent, and the defendants applied for security for costs:—Held, that in such case, the Court will not order a plaintiff to give security for costs, unless it can be fairly presumed that the action is adopted and promoted by his assignee.

This was an action for the infringement of two patents. The declaration consisted of two counts, to which the defendants pleaded, first, not guilty; and, secondly, that the plaintiff was not entitled to the patents. The action was tried, at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1843, when the plaintiff abandoned his right to the patent, an assignment of which was alleged in the first count of the declaration, and succeeded in getting a verdict on the second count. A rule nisi was granted to set aside the verdict then obtained, which was made absolute in Trinity term, 1844; the venue was then changed to Middlesex, and the plaintiff gave notice that he should proceed against the defendants on both counts of the declaration. No further steps had been taken in the action since Trinity term, 1844. On the 7th of November 1847 the plaintiff was taken in execution, at the suit of one Anderson, for the sum of 300*l.*; he was committed to prison on the 25th of November, and, on the 26th of December 1847, an order was obtained on Anderson's petition, under the 36th and 37th sections of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, vesting the insolvent's property in the official assignee. The plaintiff had given notice of trial for the sittings after Hilary term, and now

Channell, Serj. applied for a rule calling upon the plaintiff and his assignee to shew cause why the plaintiff should not give security for costs, and, in the mean time, all proceedings be stayed.—The expenses of this action will be very heavy, and the defendants have a good defence. Notice has been given of this application, and as the plaintiff is now insolvent, the defendants ought to have, and are entitled to a stay of proceedings till security be given for their costs—Denton v. Williams (1). There is a distinction between actions of contract and actions of tort in respect of a right to security for costs; and though this is an action of tort, still it is of such a nature that it would survive to executors, and may be proceeded in by the assignee.

[WILDE, C.J.—When assignees proceed to try a right in the insolvent's name for their own benefit, the rule is, they must then give security for costs. Does the assignee adopt this action?]

There is little doubt such will be the case, for though the damages recovered in the action would go to the insolvent, still the benefit of the right to the patent (if thereby substantiated), which would be of great value, would go to the assignees—Mason v. Polhill (2). In Denton v. Williams the Court ordered security for costs to be given without an affidavit that the action was prosecuted by the assignees; that was also an action of tort, and there is no distinction for this purpose between a bankruptcy and a voluntary or forced insolvency—Heaford v. Knight (3), Wray v. Brown (4).

[MAULE, J.—No man is to be estopped from his action on account of his poverty. If you make out that the plaintiff is not proceeding on his own account, then there is a reason for requiring security for costs.]

WILDE, C.J.—I see no reason for ordering the plaintiff to give security for costs, unless we were satisfied that the action was only prosecuted in his name for the benefit of other parties. Here no application has been made to the assignee or execution creditor to know whether they, or either of them, adopt the action, and, therefore, the first material on which to support this motion fails. And surely the Court is not to infer that the action will be prosecuted by the assignee; the presumption is the other way, for he might secure the benefit of the insolvent's patent rights by an easier and less expensive course than an action at law. In such an action the damages would be

The deed described the applicant as Mary, the reputed wife of A. B, otherwise Mary —, spinster. The certificate of the Commissioners was in the usual form, except that it described the applicant as "Mary, the reputed wife of A. B, otherwise Mary —, spinster." The affidavit of verification described the applicant as Mary, the wife of A. B, otherwise Mary —, spinster.

[WILDE, C.J.—Did she execute the deed as, and does she call herself, a married woman?]

Yes, she does; there is nothing but the unusual style of description of the party which induces the officer to decline to file the documents without an order from the Court. There seems to be some doubt in the minds of the Commissioners as to the validity of the marriage; but it is submitted, that as the description in the documents corresponds with the description in the deed, there is in reality no such departure from the prescribed forms as warrants their rejection.

The COURT directed the officer to receive and file the certificate and affidavit.

Fines and Recoveries Act—Certificate—Jurat.

It is not necessary to state in a certificate, under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 83, the specific place at which the acknowledgment of a married woman has been taken; it is enough if the deed appear to have been executed within the terms of the commission.

A British consul abroad has no authority per se to administer oaths verifying the documents required by this act; but if a public notary of the foreign country certify that by the laws of that country the British consul is competent to administer oaths, the certificate and other documents sworn before him will be received by the Court.

A special commission had been issued to three merchants at Madeira, or any two of them, to take the acknowledgment of a married woman, under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 83, which was certified to have been done at Madeira. The jurat to the certificate was in the following form:—

“Sworn in the island of Madeira, on the 27th of November, in the year of our Lord 1847. Before me, (Signed) “George Stoddart,

“Her Britannic Majesty’s consul, and authorized by the laws of the island of Madeira to administer oaths in the island of Madeira.”

On the same parchment was added the following certificate:—

“I, Servulo Nicolao Sowzao Drommond, notary public, &c. at Madeira, certify that Her Britannic Majesty’s consul, as such, is entitled to administer oaths in the island of Madeira.”

Cole now moved that the officer of the court might be directed to receive and file the above certificate, &c., which he had objected to do without the order of the Court.—It was suggested, first, that the certificate should have specified the place at which the acknowledgment was taken; but it is submitted, that the words “at Madeira” are sufficient, and that the place in the island where the commission was executed need not be now precisely defined. In re Shufflebottom (1) decides that a certificate stating that the acknowledgment was taken in Philadelphia is sufficient. The General Rules of this court of Hilary term, 1834 (2), do not direct how certificates of acknowledgment, taken under special commissions, are to be verified; those rules are to be confined to acknowledgments in this country, and the officer has adopted the practice with respect to acknowledgments taken abroad under this act, which prevailed in this court under the rule of this court of Hilary term, 14 Geo. 3. (3), relating to common recoveries. It has been held that the 6 Geo. 4. c. 87. s. 20, which authorizes a British consul at a foreign port to administer oaths, &c., does not give such consul power to act in cases of this nature, where there are native authorities to administer the oath—In re Eady (4); but as it appears here from the jurat, that the British consul can administer an oath in Madeira by the laws of that place, which fact is duly authenticated by the certificate of a public notary at Madeira, the spirit and intention of the act, as well as the practice of this Court, are abundantly satisfied.

Per Curiam.—We think the certificate of the notary shews that the British consul was authorized to administer the oath, and therefore the certificate, &c. may be received and filed.

Jan. 29. } GILBERTSON v. RICHARDSON.

Trespass—Declaration—Damages.

The defendant drove against the plaintiff's chaise, and the collision threw the person sitting in it on to the front part of the chaise, which caused the horse to kick and break the chaise. The declaration stated, that the defendant drove his chaise against the plaintiff's chaise, and thereby greatly crushed and broke to pieces the chaise of the plaintiff:—Held, that the trespass was a continuing trespass; that the plaintiff had properly alleged, and was entitled to recover all the damages occasioned by the collision.

Trespass. The declaration stated, that the plaintiff before and at the time of the committing of the trespass hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 22nd of June 1847, was lawfully possessed of a certain carriage, to wit, a chaise of great value, to wit, of the value of 50*l.*, and of a certain horse then drawing the same, in which said chaise the plaintiff was then riding in and along a certain public and common highway, and the defendant was then riding in a certain other carriage, to wit, a chaise then drawn by a certain other horse, which said last-mentioned chaise and horse were then under the care and management of the defendant, in and along the said highway, and thereupon the defendant then, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, with force and arms, &c. drove the said chaise, so then under his care and management, with great force and violence upon and against the said chaise of the plaintiff, and thereby then greatly crushed, broke to pieces, and damaged the said chaise of the plaintiff, and the said chaise of the plaintiff thereby then became and was rendered of little or no use or value to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was thereby then subjected to and incurred a great expense, to wit, 40*l.* in repairing the said chaise, to the plaintiff's damage, &c.

At the trial, before Coltman, J., at the Sittings in London, on this day, it appeared that the plaintiff had alighted from his chaise, in Oxford Street, to adjust some part of the harness, leaving R. T. sitting on the seat, when the defendant drove his chaise against the plaintiff's; the shock threw R. T. off the seat on to the splashing-iron in front, which then touched the horse (a high-spirited one) of the plaintiff, which thereupon kicked and broke the chaise, doing considerable damage thereto. The learned Judge told the jury that if the damage were occasioned by the wilful and negligent act of the defendant, they should find their verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount. The jury found for the plaintiff accordingly.

Bytes, Serj. moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, or to reduce the damages.—The question which should have been left to the jury was, would the horse have kicked if he had not been an unsteady horse? For if the unsteadiness of the horse were the real reason of the damage, the plaintiff would not be liable. Then, under this declaration as framed, the plaintiff can recover nothing but the damage which occurred at the time the plaintiff's chaise struck the defendant's chaise, and that amounted only to the sum of 2*d.* The damage done by the horse kicking might have been recovered in an action on the case, and perhaps in trespass if properly laid. The declaration states that the defendant drove against the plaintiff, and nothing more.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Suppose you drive against a carriage, knock off the coachman, and break his leg, what is the form of action?]

It is submitted that the proper form would be an action on the case. Scott v. Shepherd (1) shews that all damage consequential upon the trespass must be recovered in an action on the case.

MAULE, J. (2).—Scott v. Shepherd is a very different case from this, and furnishes no authority for this application. I have no doubt that the damage was contemporaneous with the act done; the trespass was a continuing trespass, and the learned Judge's direction to the jury was right, and no rule can be granted.

1848. } THORPE v. BARBER AND
Feb. 10. } ANOTHER.

Witness—Co-defendant, Admissibility of, in Action of Tort.

One of two defendants, in an action of tort, suffered judgment by default, and it was sought to call him at the trial to give evidence for his co-defendant:—Held, that the proposed witness was inadmissible; and that being a party to the record, interested in the event of the suit, he was not within the privilege of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85.

Trover for beans, peas, &c.

Plea,—by defendant Barber, not guilty by statute; the other defendant, Spall, suffered judgment by default.

This action was tried, before Coleridge, J., at the Spring Assizes for Suffolk, 1847, when it appeared that Spall, who was a constable, accompanied the defendant Barber to the house of the plaintiff to search for a lamb that had been stolen from Barber. Leave was given by the plaintiff to search his house for the lamb, which was not found there, but a large quantity of peas, beans, &c. were observed by the constable, who, suspecting they were stolen, took possession of them. Barber, the other defendant, procured a cart, in which the beans and peas were taken away; the plaintiff was taken into custody, examined before, and remanded by, the magistrate. No owner could be found for the beans, peas, &c., which were subsequently demanded of the constable, who refused to deliver them. At the close of the plaintiff's case, Byles, Serj. proposed to call Spall as a witness, not with a view to reduce the damages, but for the purpose of shewing the innocence of Barber, who, he alleged, merely acted in the transaction in aid and assistance of the constable. On objection taken, the learned Judge ruled that his evidence could not be received.

A rule for a new trial had been obtained by—

Byles, Serj., and now—

Couch shewed cause.—The learned Judge rightly rejected the witness at the trial. There is one case at Nisi Prius, Ward v. Haydon (1), in which Lord Kenyon decided that a defendant in trover, who had suffered judgment by default, could be examined on the part of his co-defendant; but in this case the jury are summoned to try and to assess the damages, whereas it does not appear that it was so in that case.

[MAULE, J.—That would follow as a matter of course, would it not?]

No; the plaintiff might have entered a nolle prosequi against Haydon, who was called as a witness; and then that decision is reconcileable with the true principle which governs the admissibility of witnesses. The act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85. does not affect this case; that act leaves the admissibility of parties to the record as witnesses just as it stood before the act passed. The case of Chapman v. Graves, reported in a note to Stevens v. Lynch (2), decides that a co-defendant in an action of tort, cannot be called for a plaintiff, and some expressions are there used by Le Blanc, J., which seem to approve of Lord Kenyon's ruling in Ward v. Haydon, but the opinion there unnecessarily expressed does not make Chapman v. Graves an authority here. In Mash v. Smith (3), Best, C.J. admitted a witness out of deference to the opinion of Lord Kenyon, at the same time expressing his doubt of the admissibility, and the reason for that doubt must prevail here: "The witness may give such a complexion to the case as to reduce the damages." That is exactly the case here, and that decision is in my favour. It is submitted that a defendant in an action of tort is quite as much interested in favour of his co-defendant as he is in an action of contract, and it is unnecessary to quote cases to shew that in the latter form of action a defendant who has suffered judgment by default is not admissible. The rules on the subject are laid down in Greenleaf on Evidence, p. 501, and in Phillipps on Evidence, vol. 1. p. 53. The reason for his exclusion is, that if the defendant, for whom he is called, obtains the verdict, the witness is also thereby discharged. The same result may occur in an action of tort, as appears from the case of Biggs v. Bengier (4), where a verdict having been found for one defendant on a plea which shewed that the plaintiff had no cause of action, the judgment was arrested as to the other, who had allowed judgment to go by default.

[COLTMAN, J.—In that case the justification appeared on the record; it could not do so here.]

It is true that in the case referred to, there was a special plea, upon which the defendant succeeded; in this there is only the plea of not guilty "by statute," but under that a defence might be set up which would go to the whole cause of action, and the jury would then be directed to find nominal damages only against the defendant. It was suggested that the witness would be examined respecting the innocence of his companion only, and not with a view to reduce the damages, but the two matters cannot be separated; they are mutually involved, and the alteration or addition of any fact, as it stood upon the plaintiff's case, would materially affect the damages. There is also direct authority to shew that the examination of a witness cannot be restricted to a single point; if called, he may be examined on every point connected with the case—Hawkesworth v. Showler (5). Besides, it cannot be said that Spall was not a party interested in the suit: the jury were to assess the damages against him; he was, therefore, entitled to appear by counsel; and if called would be enabled to give evidence directly in his own favour.

T. Sanders, in support of the rule.—The point to be decided is an important one, and since the time of Ward v. Haydon it seems to have been generally admitted, in all the cases, as well as laid down in all the text-books on evidence, that a defendant in an action of tort, who has suffered judgment by default, may be examined for his co-defendant. From the report of that case it is evident that Lord Kenyon considered the point a good deal before he decided it. The defendants obtained the verdict, and his ruling seems never to have been questioned, though the plaintiff had every interest to move the Court, had there been any grave doubts about the correctness of his ruling. The report also shews that no nolle prosequi had been entered against the defendant, who was a witness: if such had been the case, his name need not have been mentioned at all, and the question about his liability to future costs could scarcely have been alluded to. The case is also to be found in Peake's Additional Cases, p. 126, and no suggestion of a nolle prosequi there appears. In Mash v. Smith the witness was admitted; and it cannot, therefore, be considered a decision against this rule. It does not appear what became of the verdict in that case; and the report is so unsatisfactory that it cannot be considered of much weight either way. Chapman v. Graves really decided that a defendant, who had suffered judgment by default, in an action of tort, was admissible as a witness for his co-defendant, but not for a plaintiff. The learned reporter states the law thus in a note to that case: "In an action of trespass, if one of several defendants allows judgment to go by default, he is not a competent witness for the plaintiff, although he is for his co-defendants;" and Le Blanc, J. says, referring to Ward v. Haydon, and a similar case, before Wood, B., at Lancaster, "In those two cases the co-defendant was called to exculpate the other defendants; here it is proposed to call a co-defendant to inculpate the others, and therefore the witness is inadmissible." Chapman v. Graves has frequently been referred to with approbation—Brown v. Brown (6), Emmet v. Butler (7), Mant v. Mainwaring (8); and thus there are the opinions of three different Judges (at the least) in favour of the admissibility of this witness. Lord Denman's Act does not affect the case; the witness can only be rejected on the ground of interest—Worrall v. Jones (9); and it is submitted that a defendant who has suffered judgment by default is called against his interest when called for a co-defendant. There is no contribution in actions of tort as there is in actions of contract; and it is his interest to fix his co-defendant, if possible, in order to transfer the whole liability, which now attaches to the witness, to that co-defendant.

[MAULE, J.—There is sometimes contribution, and even more than that, in an action of tort. Suppose A. cuts down a tree, on the land of a third party, by the command of B: if a verdict be obtained against both A. and B. would be bound to indemnify A.]

That would be upon B.'s express or implied assumpsit, arising out of collateral facts; and not referable to the simple fact of a verdict against A. and B. jointly in an action of tort; whereas, in an action of contract, the verdict against A. and B. imports of itself a vested right of contribution inter se. It is not necessary to shew that in no possible event can a witness be interested, in order to render him admissible; if his interest be much less, or nearly equal, on one side, his evidence is admissible. It is said in Starkie on Evid. 3rd edit. p. 105, in order to exclude a witness "the interest must be a present certain vested interest," and "not uncertain or contingent." The defendant here is much more interested to fix his co-defendant, and thus be enabled to escape all liability, than to reduce the damages; or at any rate the latter are so contingent and uncertain that the chance of their reduction in amount is not so vested an interest before they are assessed as to exclude him.

He must pay everything unless his co-defendant is fixed; and no way of putting the case can shew more strongly his interest against the party for whom he is called. The principles upon which the defendant was admitted in Pipe v. Steel (10), shew that the co-defendant was admissible here; and in ejectment, which is in its nature an action of tort, a defendant who has suffered judgment by default is admissible as a witness for his co-defendant—Dormer v. Fortescue (11). Hawkesworth v. Showler does not apply: it was there proposed to call the wife of a defendant who had not suffered judgment by default; husband and wife are one and the same person, and examining the wife of a defendant is, in law, the same thing as examining the defendant himself; but in the judgment in that case Lord Abinger pointedly refers to, commends, and upholds the decision in Ward v. Haydon. The decision of the Judges in Biggs v. Benger is reported without any reasons; and there is an older case—Marler v. Eylett (12), which decides that a defendant, in an action of tort, will not be discharged, though his co-defendant plead a justification on the record, and obtain a verdict. This witness was not proposed to be called to prove that no right of action existed against himself, but to shew the innocence of the defendant Barber.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of opinion that the learned Judge was right in rejecting the witness. It is said in the text-books no doubt since the authority of Wood v. Haydon, that a co-defendant, in an action of tort, who has allowed judgment to go by default, may be called for the defence; but the cases are not uniform, for Mash v. Smith is an authority the other way; and it appears from a case decided by Burroughs, J., Webb v. Budd, referred to in Roscoe's Evidence, p. 191, that a similar witness was rejected by him. Webb v. Budd is a later decision than Mash v. Smith, and this leads me to think that communication had taken place between some of the Judges since the ruling in Mash v. Smith, and that Burroughs, J. was then intentionally supporting the opinion of Best, C.J. in preference to that of Lord Kenyon. Upon principle, it appears, the witness is inadmissible; he has the greatest interest in reducing the damages as low as possible; and it does not appear that Spall was to be called to give evidence on any point which was not necessarily involved and connected with the damages.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The witness proposed to be called was a co-defendant, and, being a party to the record, he would not be admissible if he were interested in the event, not being within the privilege of Lord Denman's Act. I think that Worrall v. Jones overrules Chapman v. Graves, and shews that his evidence could not be received. Suppose you try it, as you would upon the voir dire, thus, Is this witness admissible (without reference at all to what he is to prove) when nothing more appears than that he is upon the record? Clearly not, for Spall is interested to make the damages as small as possible. If we are allowed to look further than the record, and to inquire what the witness was called to prove here, the answer is, he is not called to prove that another person was jointly guilty with me, which would not perhaps have materially affected the amount of the damages, but he is called to shew that there was no ground of action to the plaintiff; that the corn, &c. had been lawfully removed, or that his co-defendant was so little in fault that the damages should be assessed by the jury at the smallest possible sum. It appears to me, therefore, that the witness was directly interested, and to a very great extent, for the acknowledged and direct tendency of his evidence was to bring the suit to as favourable an end as possible, both for himself and for his co-defendant. As far as the cases go, Worrall v. Jones overrules Chapman v. Graves. Ward v. Haydon was doubted in Mash v. Smith, and ruled against in Webb v. Budd at Nisi Prius, by Burroughs, J. Both principle, therefore, and authority, are in favour of the rejection of this witness.

(10) 2 Q.B. Rep. 733.

(11) Bull. Nisi Prius, 98, 285.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Whatever may have been the professed intention for calling the co-defendant, he was inadmissible as a witness, for his evidence must have affected the amount of the damages. I should be sorry to add to those inconvenient and anomalous cases, in which it has been decided that a witness may be called for one purpose, but not for another.

Elworthy*, to shew cause why the writ of attachment of contempt, issued forth against the said sheriff, pursuant to a rule made in the said cause on the 4th of November last, should not be set aside on payment, by the said sheriff to the said plaintiff, of his costs occasioned by the writ of attachment, and of this application.

Lush shewed cause.—The sheriff is not entitled to the relief prayed for; he was in contempt, and the attachment has been regularly issued. It appears by the affidavits that judgment had been obtained by Nathan against Elworthy, for 66*l.* 19*s.*, and a writ of fi. fa. was delivered to the sheriff on the 21st of July 1847; certain goods of Elworthy's were seized on the 22nd; the sheriff was ordered, on the 24th, to return the writ; on the 27th all the goods, except to the amount of 5*l.*, were claimed by one Wilmot, and there was a sum of 15*l.* 15*s.* due to the landlord for rent; on the 30th the sheriff took out a summons to interplead, which, after several adjournments, was finally settled on the 12th of August; the plaintiff then declined to accept an issue, and the claim was allowed. The sheriff ought to have made his return on the 2nd of August, but he waited until the 14th of September, and then returned nulla bona. The sheriff made no application for an enlargement of the time to make a return, and produced no affidavit before the Judge at chambers, on the 12th of August, to shew there were no other goods of Elworthy's in his bailiwick on which he could have levied, nor is there any such affidavit up to this time. The sheriff applied at chambers, on the 2nd of September, to set aside the order (of the 24th of July) to return the writ and all subsequent proceedings, on payment of costs, but Williams, J. refused to interfere.

The facts are all before the Court; and it is contended that the sheriff was bound to make a return before the 14th of September; he might have returned nulla bona præter. Cleaves v. Fisher (1) shews that a return in the form suggested was, in this case, necessary. The plaintiff has been prejudiced by the sheriff's neglect and delay; he was unable to issue a ca. sa., as he could not ascertain, till the return was made, whether the former writ had been rendered available. Elworthy might have had other goods than those claimed, and the sheriff might have had such other goods in his possession, in which cases the issuing a second writ would have been improper. By analogy of the cases on mesne process, under the old law, the sheriff is liable here.

Montague Smith, contra.—It appears upon the affidavit that the sheriff had difficult circumstances to contend with, and that it was necessary to apply to a special pleader to advise upon the return; this was done as soon as the sheriff understood he was required to make a return, which he did not anticipate after the interpleader summons was disposed of, and the plaintiff's claim abandoned. The most that the sheriff has been guilty of is a formal error, and the Court will, therefore, grant him relief. It is not suggested there were any other goods, or that the defendant has been prejudiced by the delay—The Queen v. the Sheriff of Essex (2).

WILDE, C.J.—It is generally understood in interpleader cases that the application relates to all the goods seized by the sheriff, that is, to all the goods of the debtor in his bailiwick. If the party who has put the sheriff in motion requires any further return he should say so, and give notice to the sheriff to that effect. There is nothing before the Court in this case to shew that the plaintiff has sustained any damage or suffered any inconvenience by the delay in the return, and the occurrence of that delay is, to a certain extent, explained by the sheriff. The attachment has been regularly issued, and the sheriff was clearly in contempt for not returning the writ earlier than the 14th of September. We think, however, the sheriff has been guilty of a formal default only, from which no ill effects have arisen to anybody. This rule, therefore, must be made absolute, and the attachment set aside on payment, by the sheriff, of the costs incident to these proceedings.

Stamp Act—Lease—Agreement, Construction of.

It was stated in an agreement, which amounted to a lease, that A. agrees to let certain premises to B. for two years, at the rent of 50l. a year; that B. shall have the right of purchasing the premises at any time during the term, it being understood that A. is possessed of the same premises for his own life, and the life of M, and the survivor of them:—Held, that a 30s. stamp was sufficient.

Held also, that by the agreement A. was bound to make out a title to the premises for the lives of A. and M, and the survivor of them.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated, that heretofore, to wit, &c., the defendant agreed to let to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff then agreed to take for two years, from the 9th of October 1844, at the rent of 50l. per annum, the house and premises, called Bremlow, then in the occupation of the plaintiff; and it was therein, in and by the said agreement in writing, also agreed between the said parties, that the plaintiff might, at his own expense, make such alterations to the house and premises as he might think proper, the same being improvements, and that the plaintiff should have the right of purchasing the said premises at the end of the said term of two years, for the sum of 600l., it being then understood by and between the said parties that the defendant was possessed of the said premises for his own life and the life of one Mrs. M, and the survivor of them. And the said agreement being so made, and in consideration thereof, and that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, then promised the defendant to perform all things in the said agreement contained on his, the plaintiff's, part to be performed, he, the defendant, then promised the plaintiff to perform all things in the said agreement contained on his, the defendant's, part, to be performed, and that he, the defendant, was possessed of the said premises for his own life and the life of the said Mrs. M, and for the life of the survivor of them, and that the said defendant would, if the plaintiff elected to purchase the said premises according to the said agreement as aforesaid, make and deduce to the plaintiff a good and valid title to the said hereinbefore-mentioned estate and interest of him, the said defendant, in and to the said premises; and the plaintiff avers, that he, confiding in the said agreement and promise of the defendant, did, to wit, on &c., take the said house and premises, &c. from the said defendant, and enter into possession and occupation thereof on the terms aforesaid; that during the said term, to wit, on &c., he, the plaintiff, gave notice to the defendant that it was his, the plaintiff's, intention to exercise his right of purchasing the said house and premises, &c., for the said sum of 600*l.*, in the said agreement mentioned, and that he would purchase, and that he then elected to purchase the said house and premises, &c. at that price, as in the said agreement mentioned; and the plaintiff then requested the defendant to make and deduce to him a good and valid title to the said hereinbefore-mentioned estate and interest of him, the defendant, in the said premises; and although reasonable time after the defendant had such notice, and was so requested to make and deduce to the plaintiff such good and valid title, had elapsed before the commencement of this suit, and although the plaintiff had always been ready and willing to pay the said purchase-money according to the said agreement, and has always performed all things contained in the said agreement on his part to be performed, yet the plaintiff says the defendant has disregarded his promise, and was not, either at the time of the making of the said agreement, or within a reasonable time after he had notice of the intention of the plaintiff to purchase the said premises according to the said agreement, or when the said purchase was to have been completed, or at any other time possessed of the said premises for his own life, and the life of the said Mrs. M, and for the life of the survivor of them, according to the true intent and meaning of the said agreement, and of his said promise. And the defendant, further disregarding his said promise, did not nor would within such reasonable time as aforesaid, or at any other time make or deduce to the plaintiff a good or valid title to such estate and interest in the said premises, according to the true intent and meaning of his said promise, by means whereof the plaintiff hath been deprived of all the benefits which would have been derived from the completion of the said purchase; and the plaintiff, confiding in the promise of the defendant, and intending to purchase the said premises according to the said agreement, did, during the said term, make divers alterations and improvements in the said premises, at his own expense, to wit, to the amount of 1,000*l.*, which are now, by reason of the said breach of promise of the defendant, wholly lost to the plaintiff, to the plaintiff's damage, &c.

Pleas—First, that the defendant did not promise in manner and form, &c.; second, that the plaintiff did not give notice to the defendant that it was his, the plaintiff's, intention to exercise his right of purchasing the said premises for 600*l.*, or that he would purchase, or that he elected to purchase at that price, according to the said agreement, modo et forma, &c. Third, that the plaintiff did not request the defendant to make and deduce to him, the plaintiff, a good and valid title to the said estate and interest of him, the defendant, in the said premises, as mentioned in the said agreement, in manner and form, &c. Fourth, that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to pay the said purchase-money according to the said agreement, in manner and form, &c. Fifth, that the defendant was, at the time of the making of the said agreement, and within a reasonable time after he had notice of the plaintiff's intention to purchase the said premises according to the said agreement, and when the said purchase was to have been completed, possessed of the said premises for his own life, and the life of the said Mrs. M, and for the life of the survivor of them, according to the true intent and effect of the said agreement and his said promise, &c. Lastly, that the defendant did within such reasonable time as aforesaid, make and deduce to the plaintiff a good and valid title to such estate and interest in the said premises as in the declaration mentioned, according to the true intent and effect of the said agreement and of his said promise, &c.

Issue was joined on all the pleas.

At the trial, before Coltman, J., at the Chester Spring Assizes, 1847, the plaintiff, in support of his case, put in the following agreement stamped with a 30s. stamp; its reception was objected to by the defendant, who contended it should also have been stamped with two 30s. stamps. The learned Judge admitted the document, and reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit:—

“Memorandum, that the undersigned, Thomas Warrington, agrees to let to the undersigned George Worthington for two years from the 9th of October last, at the rent of 50*l.* per annum, the house, out-buildings, gardens and field, at Bromborough, now in the occupation of the said George Worthington; and also agrees that the said George Worthington may, at his own expense, make such alterations and additions to the premises as he may think proper, the same being improvements. And that the said George Worthington shall have the right of purchasing the above premises at the end of or at any time during the term for the sum of 600*l.*, it being understood that the said Thomas Warrington is possessed of the same premises for his own life and the life of Mrs. Mainwaring, and of the survivor of them. And the said George Worthington hereby also agrees to the above terms. Dated the 7th of November 1844. (Signed) Thomas Warrington, George Worthington. Witness, Robert Hughes.”

It appeared that the defendant was not possessed of the estate mentioned in the agreement, but of a term of sixty-one years, whereupon the plaintiff rejected the title, and having made various improvements on the premises, brought the present action to recover the amount he had expended, with damages. The defendant contended that by the agreement he was not bound to convey the identical estate therein mentioned, and the learned Judge being of that opinion a verdict was entered for the defendant on the first, second, third and fourth issues, and for the plaintiff on the fifth and last issues.

A rule had been obtained, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why there should not be a new trial for misdirection.

Welsby shewed cause.—First, the plaintiff should have been nonsuited. The agreement was not properly stamped, and should not have been admitted. The legal effect of the document is twofold: it is a lease in præsenti to be computed from a day past, and an agreement to purchase distinct from the lease. Being therefore both a lease and an agreement it required two stamps of 30s. each—Wharton v. Walton (1).

[WILLIAMS, J.—In that case there was a distinct agreement, by a third party who had nothing to do with the lease, to guarantee the payment of money.]

Suppose the lease and the agreement to purchase were on two separate papers, each must be stamped.

[MAULE, J.—So must each covenant if on a separate skin.]

The revenue is not to be defrauded by a combination of two distinct things. The agreement to purchase here is not an accessory to the principal matter, the lease, as in Price v. Thomas (2).

[CRESSWELL, J.—This is not more than a covenant to renew, which is usual in leases, and which do not on that account require two stamps. The lease and the agreement to purchase are the consideration for the rent. If the lease were forfeited the right to purchase would be forfeited also.]

It is submitted that the only connexion between the agreement to purchase and the lease is that they are between the same parties, and on the same paper: each is complete by itself—Clayton v. Burtenshaw (3), Corder v. Drakeford (4).

[MAULE, J.—If the agreement to purchase were disannexed from the lease there would be no consideration for it.]

Secondly, the material issue is that on the first plea. There was no misdirection. The learned Judge said that the agreement amounted to an engagement by the defendant, that whatever interest he possessed the plaintiff might purchase it; and that is its true legal effect. The defendant was not bound to make out a good title and the identical title named. This case is not like those where the vendor agrees to sell and has no interest at all, in which case he would be liable; but here the defendant had an interest which, without fraud on his part, turned out to be a term instead of a freehold. The proof of his interest in the term was a substantial and legal compliance with the agreement, and therefore the verdict is right—Flureau v. Thornhill (5).

(1) 7 Q.B. Rep. 474; s.c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 321.

(4) 3 Taunt. 382.

Egerton, contra.—The single stamp was sufficient. The agreement contains only one contract, a demise; the option of purchase is ancillary to it, and forms part of the consideration for entering into the lease. Wharton v. Walton has been distinguished by the Court. Corder v. Drakeford only decides that the stamp must be referred to the principal object of the deed. Doe d. Phillippis v. Phillippis (6) and Nicholls v. Cross (7) are direct authorities in favour of the plaintiff. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

COLTMAN, J.—The stamp on the document received in evidence is sufficient. The agreement is on the one side for a lease for two years, with the option to purchase during the term, which together form the consideration; the engagement on the other side is to pay certain rent. Thus the connexion of the several parts is complete, and the object of the agreement indivisible. On the second point, I took an erroneous view of the effect of the agreement at the trial. It struck me then, that by its terms the defendant was not bound to make out the title which he thought he had at the time the agreement was made, but only such a title as he actually had in the premises. An agreement to purchase means, in the first instance, to purchase in fee, and the subsequent words are introduced into the agreement for the benefit of the vendor, in order that he may not be called upon to convey an estate in fee. The stipulation made by the defendant is, that he shall be required to convey (not an estate in fee, but) a particular estate for life, and this he has failed to perform. The rule for a new trial must be made absolute.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The agreement is to take certain premises for two years, at a rent of 50*l.* a year. The consideration for that rent is, that the plaintiff shall have the premises, and the option of purchasing them during the term. It is contended, that the agreement does not import that the defendant has an interest in the premises for two lives, because the earlier words are, "the said George Worthington shall have the right of purchasing the said premises at any time during the said term for 600*l.*," which mean purchasing such estate as he can get; but that cannot be, otherwise the plaintiff would pay rent on the chance of getting no estate at all. The agreement then says, "it being understood that the said Thomas Warrington is possessed of the same premises for his own life and the life of Mrs. Mainwaring, and of the survivor of them;" and I think the latter words have the effect of cutting down the estate to be purchased under the agreement to an estate for two lives, which, without those words, would mean that Worthington should purchase an estate in fee. They are not mere idle words, but important, and most important for the interests of the defendant: they mean that he has the estate for two lives, and for two lives only. That is put in issue by the plea of non assumpsit, which having been found for the defendant, there must be a new trial.

Practice—Judgment as in case of a Non-suit—Death of Co-defendant—Suggestion on the Record.

*In an action against four defendants, two died before issue joined, and issue was joined against the two survivors. of a nonsuit, unless the deaths of their co-defendants against whom issue has not been joined appear by suggestion on the record.

Semble—If, in such a case, the plaintiff fail to make up the record and enter a suggestion of the death, the course for a defendant to pursue is to call upon the plaintiff to do so, and if he fail, to apply for leave for the defendant to do it; and then (the suggestions having been entered) to move for judgment as in case of a nonsuit.

This action was commenced in 1839, against four defendants, Sturch, Hoskins, Wollaston and Shaw. In 1843 Shaw died, after having pleaded, but before issue joined as against him; Wollaston died in 1845, without having pleaded. On the 22nd of July 1840, issue was joined as against the defendants Sturch and Hoskins.

Crompton stated the above facts from affidavits, and moved, on behalf of Sturch and Hoskins, for a rule for judgment as in case of a nonsuit.—This rule cannot usually be applied for, unless the record has been completely made up. The record in this case has been complete as against the surviving defendants since 1840; it cannot, however, be perfectly completed without entering suggestions upon it of the deaths of the other defendants, but the duty of entering those suggestions devolves upon the party who is to take the next step, and is the duty of the plaintiff.

[WILDE, C.J.—How could you enter up your judgment now? The action is commenced against four; issue is joined against two only, and there is no explanatory suggestion on the record. If judgment were now entered it would not appear that the plaintiff had ever been in a position to try, and the statute only gives a defendant the right to judgment as in case of a nonsuit after issue joined, “if the plaintiff shall neglect to bring such issue on to be tried according to the course and practice of the Court.”]

The plaintiff is bound to make up the roll, and therefore should have entered the suggestions; he has failed to do this, and is, therefore, in default; he has not proceeded according to the course and practice of the Court to try the existing issues; and, therefore, the defendants are entitled to the benefit of the statute.

NEW SERIES, XVII.—C.P.

[MAULE, J.—After issue joined the proceedings are entered on record, and then follows the venire facias juratores, which is the act of the Court. But this record is not in a state to receive the venire, because issue is not joined against all the defendants, and there is nothing to explain this defect; the Court should be informed of the death of the parties, which must appear by suggestion on the roll, and then the venire issues in due course.]

[WILDE, C.J.—The presumption is, that the parties are alive. How does the plaintiff know they are dead? Would it not be the better course to call upon the plaintiff to bring in the roll and have the suggestions entered; or if he refuse, to ask for leave for the defendant to do it? The present motion could then be made, as the record would be completed.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—The 8 & 9 Will. 3. c. 11. does not say who is to enter the suggestion. If the plaintiff has not done all that he ought to do, in order to go to trial, he is in default without the statute 14 Geo. 2. c. 17.]

It is difficult to say how the defendants can call upon the plaintiff to bring in the roll, or how they can obtain a record to enter the suggestions upon. Since the New Rules there is no roll, and the defendants are not entitled to draw up the Nisi Prius record, which now constitutes the first formal entry of the proceedings.

WILDE, C.J.—There is always a roll or materials somewhere for making one. The deaths of these parties must come properly before the Court, on record, before the defendants can obtain what they ask for. If they are not in a position to shew that the necessary suggestions can be entered, they are not in a position to ask the Court to grant this application.

1848. } LINDUS v. BRADWELL.
Jan. 29. }

Bill of Exchange—Acceptance by Wife of Drawee in her own name.

A bill of exchange was drawn upon the plaintiff, and accepted by his wife in her name, she having authority to accept for him:—Held, that the plaintiff was liable on the bill as acceptor.

If a principal authorises an agent to accept a bill, such principal is liable as acceptor, though wrongly described by his agent in the acceptance.

Assumpsit. The first count of the declaration stated that on &c., one W. L. made his bill of exchange, and directed the same to the defendant, and thereby required the defendant to pay to the order of the said W. L. 30*l.*, two months after the date thereof; that the defendant afterwards accepted the said bill, and that W. L. then indorsed the same to the plaintiff, &c. Second count, that the defendant, on &c., was indebted to the plaintiff in 30*l.* on an account stated.

Pleas—First, as to the first count, that the defendant did not accept the said bill; second, as to the last count, non assumpsit. On which pleas issues were joined.

At the trial, before Maule, J., at the first sittings for Middlesex in Easter term, 1847, the bill of exchange mentioned in the first count was produced and read, when it appeared that it was directed to William Bradwell, accepted by M. Bradwell; and that the acceptance was written by Mary Bradwell, the defendant's wife. It was proved that the defendant's name was William David Bradwell; that he was called upon when the bill became due, and that he then said, "I suppose you call about that bill; I know all about it; it is a milliner's bill. Mrs. Reece, my wife's milliner." The bill was then shewn him; he looked at it, and said, "It is my wife's acceptance, but it is all the same thing; I have authorized her for this particular,—Mrs. Reece's for millinery." He also said, "There are several other bills besides this; I shall pay all of them in a week or ten days." It was submitted at the close of the plaintiff's case, by Talfourd, Serj. for the defendant, that there was no case to go to the jury, but the learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for 32*l.* 7*s.* (the amount of the bill, with interest thereon), reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for him on both or either of the issues.

A rule had been obtained accordingly, and also to shew cause why the damages should not be reduced to 30*l.* in the event of the Court deciding that the plaintiff could recover only on the second count.

Symons shewed cause.—It is contended, on the other side, that the facts proved at the trial negatived that the defendant's wife had any authority to accept this bill, and therefore that the plaintiff must fail on the first issue; and, next, that as the conversation related to a void bill, there was no evidence on the second issue. It is, however, submitted that the circumstances are explicit to shew authority in the wife to accept this bill for her husband, and that more satisfactory evidence could scarcely have been produced on that head. It is then much relied upon, as a fact in favour of the defendant, that his name does not appear as acceptor on the face of the instrument, and that, therefore, he is not liable to pay. Cotes v. Davis (1) is a case very similar to the present, and so is Prestwick v. Marshall (2); they decide that an indorsee who derives his title through a married woman, can recover against an acceptor, if the bill be indorsed by her and in her name with the consent of her husband. In Davis v. Clark (3), which will be relied upon on the other side, the acceptor was a stranger, and not named as drawee, and the instrument there declared upon was not a bill of exchange at all, and that decision does not apply.

Talfourd, Serj., Byles, Serj., and Swann, in support of the rule.—M. Bradwell means the defendant's wife; there is a distinction between bills of exchange and other written agreements; no person whose name does not appear on a bill as acceptor can be charged as such. Unnamed principals are in no case bound.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Suppose a drawee writes his acceptance in another name, is he not bound?]

It is submitted that he is not. The cases of Cotes v. Davis and Prestwick v.

Marshall are cases of indorsement merely. In Davis v. Clark, Coleridge, J. says, "The safe course is to adhere to the mercantile rule, that an acceptance can be made only by the party addressed or for his honour. Here the last is not pretended, and the first cannot be presumed." Those remarks are strictly applicable to this case; Polhill v. Walter (4) is to the same effect. There are three authorities which substantiate the proposition now contended for, namely, that a person whose name is not on the bill is not liable. In Pentry v. Stanton (5), cited in Story on Agency, p. 125, note 3, it was held that a person who drew a bill for goods bought on account of his principal, and signed it A. B. agent, was personally bound, and that the principal was not. In Leadbitter v. Farrow (6), Holroyd, J. says, "I apprehend that no action would lie on the bill, except against those who are parties to it." There the plaintiff knew that the defendant was agent for the Durham Bank, and that he drew the bill as agent, but as he signed it in his own name, he was held liable. Bull v. Morrell (7) is also in favour of the defendant; R. Parker, a member of a company, was there found not to have in fact accepted, and, therefore, was held not liable.

[MAULE, J.—The point did not necessarily arise in that case. The bill was drawn upon the directors, not upon the company, and Parker was not a director.]

There is no authority to shew that a person whose name is not on a bill or note is liable. Suppose J. to be the plaintiff in an action against A. B. the maker of a promissory note; could A. B. shew that he made the note as agent for John Smith? Clearly he could not: such an inquiry would be collateral, and, if once admitted, interminable in actions of this kind. If there was any evidence of any authority to the wife, it was to accept a bill drawn by Mrs. Reece, and not a bill drawn by W. L. Lastly, there is no evidence to go to the jury on the second issue. The admission is of a liability to Mrs. Reece on a bill, and therefore the defendant is not liable to the plaintiff for money due on an account then stated between them. The conversation related to the bill, and the bill alone; the bill was produced, and the defendant said, "I'll pay the bill;" that is no evidence on an account stated.

MAULE, J.—There was considerable discussion when this cause was tried, as to the defendant's being bound by his wife's signature; I then expressed no opinion upon the matter, but reserved leave to the defendant to move the Court upon the point. I think that, in this case, the defendant is bound. In the conversation that was proved to have passed between him and one of the witnesses, the bill on which he is now sued was produced; he looked particularly at the acceptance on it, and then considered it was a bill of exchange he was liable to pay, for after looking at it, he said, "It's my wife's acceptance; it makes no difference. I gave her authority for that particular." Then if the defendant admits his liability on the bill, he also admits those facts from the existence of which his liability arises. If a husband authorizes his wife to accept bills for him, in her name, upon principle such husband is liable to pay the bills accepted, and Cotes v. Davis is an authority to support that principle. The acceptance on a bill such as this need not be in any particular form; it must be in writing, and that is all the stat. 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 78. requires. Then if a husband gives his wife authority to accept a bill in her name for him, he means she may accept such a bill as this, or he means nothing at all. It is said that no person can be liable, unless his name be upon the bill; but suppose a party, whose name is on the bill as drawee, writes the acceptance on it with his own handwriting, in another and a totally different name, is he not liable? Suppose the defendant here, whose proper initials are W. D. B., had so accepted this bill, which is directed to him as W. B., would he not then have been liable? Suppose he had accepted it with his own hand, as M. B., how would it be then? In neither of those cases would the party be liable to pay, if the argument for the defendant is to be supported. The fact is, that in the cases supposed, the name of the party sought to be charged would appear on the face of the bill, and when it is urged that nobody but William Bradwell can accept this bill, I think so too. He has accepted it under the name of Mary Bradwell, the authority so to accept for him amounting to the same thing. The acceptance being in writing, the statute is satisfied; and I know of no principle which says such an authority is void.

CRESSWELL, J.—Cotes v. Davis goes very nearly the whole length of the case we are now deciding. There the indorsement by a married woman passed the property in a note, for which the husband's indorsement is necessary,—as appears from Barlow v. Bishop (8); and in Cotes v. Davis, Lord Ellenborough directed the jury that the husband's authority to his wife to indorse, and in the name by which she was known, might be fairly presumed. That doctrine is subsequently recognized in Prestwick v. Marshall, and Prince v. Brunetti (9). The jury have here found that the wife had authority to accept this bill. The defendant saw the bill, and expressed no dissatisfaction at the name by which he was therein described; he has therefore described himself by that name in the acceptance on this bill, and that acceptance is in writing, which is sufficient; this is not unlike the cases where partners in trade draw a bill, under the name of James & Co., when perhaps there is no person of the name of James in the firm. The defendant has consented to this acceptance as his acceptance, and he is, therefore, liable upon it.

WILLIAMS, J.—If there were any evidence, at the trial, to go to the jury to disprove the first plea this rule cannot be made absolute. It certainly would have been more in the usual course of business if the wife had written the husband's name as acceptor instead of her own; but he gave her authority to accept, and afterwards recognized the acceptance in the form she used; he is therefore liable to pay the amount.

Feb. 9. } CARD V. CASE.

Action on the Case—Mischievous Animals—Scienter, in issue under Not Guilty.

The declaration stated that the defendant wrongfully and injuriously kept a ferocious dog, well-knowing him to be ferocious; that the defendant kept his said dog so negligently that he bit and worried divers sheep of the plaintiff:—Held, that the plea of not guilty put in issue the scienter, which is a material averment in the declaration.

Case. The declaration stated that the defendant, theretofore, to wit, on the 18th of November 1846, and from thence until and at the time of the injury being sustained by the plaintiff as thereafter mentioned, wrongfully, wilfully, and injuriously did keep a certain dog of a ferocious and mischievous disposition, and dangerous to go at large, he, the defendant during all that time well knowing that the said dog was and during the whole of the said time continued to be of a ferocious and mischievous disposition as aforesaid, and that he was dangerous to be suffered to go at large, and during the whole of the said time it was and continued to be the duty of the defendant to use due and reasonable care and precautions in and about the safe keeping and management of the said dog. Yet the defendant, well knowing the premises, but not regarding the duty of him, the defendant, in that behalf as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on the 19th of November 1846, and whilst the defendant so kept and continued to keep the said dog so being and continuing to be of such disposition as aforesaid, did not and would not use such due and reasonable care and precautions in and about the keeping and management of the said dog, but on the contrary thereof so negligently did keep the said dog, that he wrongfully, injuriously and negligently suffered the said dog to go at large, and thereupon and by reason of the premises, and of the wrongful, injurious and negligent conduct of the defendant in so negligently keeping and using the said dog as aforesaid, and whilst the defendant so kept and continued to keep the said dog as aforesaid, and whilst the said dog was and continued to be of such disposition as aforesaid, to wit, on the said 19th of November 1846, the said dog did hunt, chase, drive, bite, and worry divers, to wit, fifty sheep and fifty lambs of the plaintiff of great value, to wit, of the value of 2*l.* each, by means whereof divers, to wit, twenty of the said sheep and twenty of the said lambs of the plaintiff of great value, to wit, of the value of 20*l.* then and before the commencement of this suit died and became of no value to the plaintiff, and the residue of the same sheep and lambs being also of great value, to wit, of the value of 2*l.* each, were and each of them was otherwise greatly terrified, damaged and injured, and rendered of little use or value to the plaintiff, to the damage of the plaintiff of 50*l.*, &c.

The defendant pleaded not guilty.

The facts stated in the declaration were proved at the trial, before Williams, J., at the Spring Assizes, 1847, for the county of Somerset, but the plaintiff failed to shew that the defendant's dog was vicious to the defendant's knowledge, whereupon the learned Judge nonsuited the plaintiff, reserving leave to move to have a verdict entered for him for 9*l.* 15*s.* (which was admitted to be the proper amount of damages), if the Court should be of opinion that the scienter was not put in issue by the plea of not guilty. A rule had been obtained accordingly, and now

Pashley shewed cause.—The nonsuit was right, the plea of not guilty puts in issue the scienter alleged by the plaintiff in his declaration, and it was necessary for him to prove that the dog was ferocious to the knowledge of the defendant, which he omitted to do—May v. Burdett (1), Jackson v. Smithson (2), Thomas v. Morgan (3).

The Court then called upon—

Crowder and Phinn, contra.—The general issue does not put in issue the facts alleged by way of inducement. Those facts are, that the defendant kept a ferocious dog knowing him to be ferocious. The pleading rule of Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. r. 4, says, "In actions on the case the plea of not guilty shall operate as a denial only of the breach of duty or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and not of the facts stated in the inducement," &c. The wrongful act here complained of is, that the dog bit the plaintiff's sheep. Declarations in actions of this nature are not usually framed as this is. It is alleged that upon the facts stated by way of inducement, it was the duty of the defendant to use due care and precaution in and about the safe keeping of the said dog.

[MAULE, J.—The allegation of the duty is immaterial, it is a mere inference of law. The foundation of the action is, you kept a dog knowing him to be ferocious.]

The New Rules lay down a principle, and it depends upon the form of the declaration what are the precise facts put in issue by not guilty. It never puts in issue the inducement, but the wrongful act only. "The inducement" in a declaration is that part which precedes the charge, which contains a statement of facts, out of which the charge arises, or which are necessary or useful to make the charge intelligible, as said by Tindal, C.J. in Taverner v. Little (4). It is not a wrongful act to keep a ferocious dog, knowing him to be ferocious; but it is wrongful to keep a ferocious dog negligently, so that he bites sheep; and those are the two facts traversed by the plea of not guilty.

There can be no right of action unless damage results, which shews that the damage occasioned by the biting is the real offence, and the only cause of complaint; the gist of the action is—the defendant kept the dog so negligently that he bit, &c.

[MAULE, J.—Then there are a host of cases against you—May v. Burdett and Jackson v. Smithson.]

The decision in May v. Burdett turned upon the pleadings. The objection was taken after verdict, and though the averment of negligent keeping was omitted from the declaration in that case and held of no consequence, still it must be remembered that after verdict everything is intended in favour of a declaration. In Jackson v. Smithson the Court gave no reasons for their judgment, and the objection there also was after verdict. In an action for debauching the plaintiff's daughter there is no right of action unless there be a loss of service; yet it was held in Torrence v. Gibbins (5) that the service was not denied by the plea of not guilty; and in Dunford v. Tratiles (6) it was held that the plea of not guilty only put in issue the negligence of the defendant's mariners in navigating his ship. Wright v. Lainson (7), Hart v. Crowley (8), Mummery v. Paul (9), and Taverner v. Little were also referred to.

[WILLIAMS, J.—Suppose a declaration allege that the defendant was in charge of a cart, and that he, by negligent driving, run over a man and broke his leg, what does not guilty put in issue?]

That is the case of Taverner v. Little: it puts in issue the negligent driving and the running over. So here, it puts in issue the negligent keeping and the biting.

[WILLIAMS, J.—No; the ownership of the cart is an innocent act distinct from the negligence. In this case if you satisfy us that it is an innocent act to keep a ferocious dog knowingly, then Taverner v. Little will apply. It is not an innocent act to keep a furious animal—May v. Burdett, Jackson v. Smithson.]

[MAULE, J.—In the New Rules inducement seems something unconnected with, and which is not in itself an unlawful act.]

COLTMAN, J.—In this case the plea of not guilty puts in issue the keeping the ferocious dog knowing it to be ferocious. The terms of the New Rules, applicable to actions on the case, are, "The plea of not guilty shall operate as a denial of the breach of duty or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant." The question then is, what is the wrongful act here? Looking at the words of the declaration, it might be said that keeping the dog negligently was the act complained of; but to understand the declaration to mean that would be to restrict the operation of its allegations to the narrowest limit, and to overlook the sense and spirit in which they are intended to be used. It was necessary to allege that the defendant knew the dog was ferocious in order to make the act wrongful; it is a material averment, and therefore put in issue by not guilty. If it were necessary to prove that the dog was kept negligently, then that would be put in issue by not guilty also; but May v. Burdett decides that the allegation of negligent keeping is wholly immaterial. I think the case of Wright v. Lainson is applicable, and in favour of the defendant. The sheriff's false return was in that case the act complained of; and in this case not the mode of keeping the dog, but keeping the dog knowing him to be a biter is the act complained of.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The effect of not guilty in actions on the case, as that plea is restricted by the New Rules, is to deny the wrongful act or omission alleged in the declaration. There may be many stated in the same declaration, and then not guilty would put them all in issue. This declaration alleges that the defendant knowingly kept a dog accustomed to bite, that he kept him negligently, and that the dog worried the plaintiff's sheep. The two cases of May v. Burdett and Jackson v. Smithson decided that the knowingly keeping a ferocious animal, and damage received from it, are sufficient to maintain the action without alleging any negligence at all. It is certainly stated in this declaration, that it became and was the duty of the defendant to use due care and precaution in keeping the dog; but that allegation does not make out that it was a material part of his duty so to do, they are mere idle words, and inserted as an inference of law. We decided the other day, in Brown v. Mallett (10), that stating in a declaration that which the plaintiff considers to be the duty of the defendant resulting from certain antecedent facts is not the proper subject of a traverse, and is not a material averment. Suppose, however, that the keeping negligently is an unlawful act, and a material averment, which is the most favourable supposition for the plaintiff, then the keeping knowingly and the keeping negligently are both in issue. That argument goes to shew that the negligence in keeping, coupled with ferociousness in the disposition of, an animal might be a cause of action; but no doubt there is a good cause of action here, because it is a wrongful act to keep a ferocious dog knowing him to be so, and the damages are the same whether he be kept negligently or not. I think it was necessary to prove the scienter, and therefore the nonsuit was right.

1848. } DOE d. BATHER v. BRAYNE
Feb. 10. } AND ANOTHER.

Practice. — Trial — Right to begin in Ejectment.

In ejectment the lessor of the plaintiff claimed under a will of the testator, dated the 23rd of September 1844. The defendant claimed under a subsequent will of the same testator, dated the 30th of December 1844. The defendant admitted that the will of the 23rd of September was a perfect will in every respect, and upon that admission claimed the right, and was allowed by the Judge, to begin at the trial:—Held, that the admission of the defendant was not an admission of the whole of the plaintiff's case, and therefore the right to begin had been improperly conceded to the defendant.

If it appears to the Court that the party entitled to begin at the trial has been deprived of that right, and that his cause has been thereby substantially prejudiced, a new trial will be granted.

This was an action of ejectment, tried at the Spring Assizes for the county of Salop, 1847, before Mr. Serj. Gaselee.

Upon the cause being called on for trial, the defendants' counsel stated that the lessor of the plaintiff claimed the premises mentioned in the declaration as devisee under a will properly executed, of the date of the 23rd of September 1844; and that the defendants claimed as devisees under a subsequent will executed by the same testator on the 26th of December 1844. The testator died on the 30th of December 1844, four days after the execution of the second will. The defendants' counsel admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict under the will of the 23rd of September, unless the defendants could establish a subsequent valid devise to them of the property by the will of the 26th of December, and upon that admission he claimed the right to begin. The counsel for the plaintiff insisted on his right to lay his own case first before the jury; but the learned Judge ruled that the defendants were entitled to begin, and they obtained a verdict.

Talfourd, Serj., having obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, upon the ground that the lessor of the plaintiff had been improperly refused the right to begin at the trial,—

Sir F. Kelly and Gray now shewed cause. —The Judge was right in his ruling, and both upon principle and authority the defendants were entitled to begin at the trial. They admit a perfect case on the part of the plaintiff, that the will of September was duly made and executed, and the estate devised thereby; upon those admissions (if no evidence were offered) a verdict must pass in the plaintiff's favour. The defendants then say, we have another subsequent will which we shall establish; it therefore lies upon them to begin and shew their case. It is a settled practice at Nisi Prius, that if no evidence is required to establish the case on one side, the other side is entitled to begin. Thus, it has been the law for more than half a century, that in an action of ejectment by the heir-at-law against the devisee under a will, if the heirship be admitted, the defendant begins—Goodtitle d. Revett v. Braham (1). So in ejectment by the devisee under a will against a defendant, who relies upon a codicil of a later date than the will, if the will be admitted the defendant begins—Doe d. Corbett v. Corbett (2) decided in 1813, and never since impeached. This is a third case: ejectment by devisee under a prior will, against the defendants, who are devisees under a subsequent will. There is no distinction in principle between this third case and the former; and therefore if the first will (under which the plaintiff claims) be admitted, the defendant is entitled to begin. It is to be observed, that the decision in Goodtitle d. Revett v. Braham goes somewhat further than the point now contended for, because there the plaintiff first proved his pedigree, the defendant then called witnesses, whose evidence was answered by witnesses on the part of the plaintiff, and still the defendant was held entitled to the general reply; but the case of Doe d. Corbett v. Corbett is in principle identically the same as that now before the Court, for the operation of a codicil in so far as it alters a former will is the same as that of a subsequent will. As regards the estate which is the subject of the codicil or the subsequent will, either of them is a complete revocation of the prior will. In Doe d. Chamberlayne v. Lloyd (3), which was a case between tenant and landlord, the landlord admitted the lease and was allowed to begin. In Doe d. Wollaston v. Barnes (4) Lord Denman mentions a case tried at Nottingham, in which he was counsel for the defendant, who claimed under a will; the plaintiff claimed under a prior will, which the defendant admitted, and was therefore allowed to begin. That is a conclusive authority for the defendant. The cases of Doe d. Warren v. Bray (5) and Doe d. Tucker v. Tucker (6) will be relied upon for the plaintiff, but in neither of those cases did the defendant admit the complete title of the plaintiff; and there is no doubt that the defendant before he can claim to begin must admit everything which prima facie would entitle the plaintiff to recover. In Doe d. Warren v. Bray, the defendant did not admit that the plaintiff was heir-at-law, which he claimed to be, and therefore the admission did not go far enough. In Doe d. Tucker v. Tucker, the defendant did not admit that the ancestor died seised; he relied upon a previous conveyance, and proposed only to make a conditional admission, which did not establish even a prima facie case.

[CRENSWELL, J.—There is a difference in this case and that where the heir-at-law is the lessor of the plaintiff; in the latter case the defendant admits absolutely that the lessor of the plaintiff is heir, and that the deviser died seised.]

[MAULE, J.—It is quite different in principle, whether you admit a case in omnibus, or whether you confess and avoid.]

There is nothing in the case of the defendants here inconsistent with the case admitted on the part of the plaintiff. Take the defendants' admission per se, and there stop, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.

[MAULE, J.—That will not do, because you say, I will call witnesses to contradict everything I admit; you do not admit that the lessor of the plaintiff continued devisee, and that he was entitled at the time of the death.]

The plaintiff is not called upon to shew that; he is not bound to prove a negative, and the non-existence of a subsequent will is no part of his case. The setting up of a second will would not contradict the plaintiff's title here any more than a will contradicts the title of the heir-at-law. The practice so long established is for the convenience of all parties, and to economize the time of the Court, which would be fruitlessly wasted in proving a case which was admitted. There are many cases on policies of insurance where the right to begin has been keenly contested, but they are not applicable here. In such cases there are frequently many special pleas, and the right depends on questions of nice and refined distinction; but this is a plain case of ejectment, and stands upon the principles applicable to actions of ejectment.

[MAULE, J.—Suppose this was a case of special pleading, how would the issue be then? How would the plaintiff set out his title, and what would the defendant admit?]

In the case of a codicil, as in Doe d. Corbett v. Corbett, the lessor of the plaintiff would allege title under the will, and that the testator died seised. The plea would set up a subsequent codicil, and then the issue would be on the defendant. That case and the present are quite undistinguishable. The parties in ejectment used formerly to be the real parties. The action of ejectment, as it at present exists, is of comparatively recent creation. The pleadings used to be special, and the titles of the contending parties appeared on the record (Lilly's Entries, p. 205, vol. 1.) The proceedings are now regulated by rules of court, which compel the defendant to plead "not guilty," and under that plea he can rely upon matter of title only. If it can be shewn that if the rules of special pleading were applied to this case, and by them the defendants could so plead as to take upon themselves the onus of proof, they are entitled to all the benefit of that now, though "not guilty" is in point of form, the only plea on the record. If this case had been under the ancient form of pleadings, the plaintiff would then have stated in the declaration (precisely what he states now, only the parties would be real persons,) "that the lessor of the plaintiff demised to him, by virtue of which demise he entered," &c.

[MAULE, J.—How would you plead to avoid an argumentative denial of the demise?]

By giving colour; the plea would be, "that the testator made a will, devising the estate to the defendant, and that the lessor of the plaintiff, claiming under colour of a previous will of the testator, entered and demised to the plaintiff," &c. On such a plea the plaintiff must have traversed the devise to the defendant, and the onus would thus be upon the defendant. There is a precedent of that kind in Rastell's Entries, p. 641, tit. 'Trespass, Executors,' 6. He also cited Rastell's Entries, tit. 'Eject. Firmæ.'

[MAULE, J.—It is usual in pleading to say that the testator died without having revoked his will. Why should not the plaintiff set out his real title?]

Because the action of ejectment is founded on a mere possession, and it would be surplusage for a plaintiff to set out his title. There never was such a declaration either now or formerly, and the precedents of declarations in ejectment were always as they now are.

[CRESSWELL, J.—By pleading as you propose, a defendant might always entitle himself to the right to begin, and therefore it may be that the application of the doctrine of special pleading to these cases is an incorrect test.]

There is nothing in the nature of things which decides that a plaintiff must always begin at the trial; the reason why he does generally begin is, because he is to prove something, but if that reason does not exist, then the defendant should begin. As the formal nature of the pleadings in ejectment does not disclose the merits of the case or the question really in dispute, the Judge should ascertain upon which party the proof substantially lies, and as a matter of convenience, as well as of justice, direct that party to begin at the trial. But further, unless some substantial injury has been sustained in consequence of the wrong party having been allowed to begin, the Court will not grant a new trial—Edwards v. Matthews (7). Geach v. Ingall (8) shews that if a wrong party be allowed to begin, the ruling of the Judge cannot be reviewed by a bill of exceptions. There must be some injustice, or the Court will not interfere—Ashby v. Bates (9); and the word "injustice" does not mean the denial of the abstract right of the plaintiff to begin, but injustice in the result of the trial in consequence of the mode pursued. Rolfe, B. there says, that "it would be a scandal to the administration of justice if the question of the right to begin at Nisi Prius were made per se a ground for granting a new trial."

Talfourd, Serj., Whateley, and Whitmore, in support of the rule.—A new trial has never been refused when the proper party to begin has been deprived of his right. In Ashby v. Bates it is said, by Platt, B., "I think it of the last importance that the discretion of a Judge as exercised at Nisi Prius should be most extensively revised by the superior wisdom of the Court from which the record emanates; and that any misdirection of his, by which injustice is worked, whether by placing a party in an unfortunate position from not having his case properly discussed before the jury, or in any other matter, should be equally subject to the jurisdiction of that Court." It is submitted that the plaintiff was materially injured by the course adopted at the trial, which course his counsel endeavoured to prevent, and that there must be a new trial. The argument on the other side seeks to invest the Judge with a power never before heard of; and it cannot be that the plaintiff is to be called upon to disclose his case, in order that the Judge may then ham, but the principle of the two cases is dissimilar, the analogy relied upon by Bayley, J. is fallacious; and as the plaintiff seems to have had no merits, the decision there given was not worth a contest. The cases of Doe d. Tucker v. Tucker and Doe d. Lewis v. Lewis (11) are in favour of the plaintiff; and on the broad ground that a plaintiff cannot be displaced from his proper position, and ousted of his right to begin at the trial, unless the defendant admits the whole of the plaintiff's case, it is submitted that this rule must be made absolute.

COLTMAN, J.—There are undoubtedly cases in favour of the course contended for by the defendants, and the cases of Doe d. Corbett v. Corbett and Doe d. Wollaston v. Barnes are entitled to great respect, although decided merely at Nisi Prius. At the same time it does not seem that there was any desire, or any possibility, to bring those decisions before the Court, and the parties respectively seem to have been satisfied with the decisions. It does not appear on which side the verdict was in the case referred to by Lord Denman in Doe d. Wollaston v. Barnes, or that there was any opportunity or wish to review the decision in that case; and if the plaintiff had succeeded there would have been no dissatisfaction. The reported cases appear to have been decided on analogies which do not apply here. When the contest is between the heir-at-law and a devisee their titles are perfectly independent; and when the heirship is admitted (which is in its nature indivisible) the case on the part of the plaintiff is admitted altogether, and he is entitled to a verdict unless that title is displaced by the proof of some new matter of fact. That case, however, is very distinct from this now before us. The plaintiff here claims as devisee, that is, he claims title under a good and valid will at the time of the death of the testator; the defendant proposes to admit only part of that title, and sets up another and a subsequent will; in fact, he says, "You are not the devisee, but I am." It is not necessary to say, whether in every case where the wrong party has begun at the trial, and where no mischief arises, we must interfere and send down the cause again to another jury. It seems to me that on this occasion the plaintiff has sustained great disadvantage by the course adopted (which he was then unable to prevent), and on that ground there ought to be a new trial.

MAULE, J.—Without stopping to consider and decide whether there is or should be a general rule that a wrong beginning induces a new trial, I think that here enough has appeared to shew that a wrong beginning has caused injustice, and therefore there must be a new trial. I think, notwithstanding the case of Doe d. Corbett v. Corbett, and the case referred to in Doe d. Wollaston v. Barnes, (which, as far as they go, are authorities in favour of a defendant's right to begin,) that in this case the defendants had no such right. Those cases were both decided at Nisi Prius, and it often happens at Nisi Prius that an acquiescence takes place between the parties; at any rate that seems to have been done in Doe d. Corbett v. Corbett. We do not know the history of the anonymous case referred to by Lord Denman in Doe d. Wollaston v. Barnes, and whether the party who began succeeded or not, or of any other particulars connected with that case we are not informed, which, in so important a matter, if we are to act upon that authority, should have been the case. Upon principle, allowing it to be settled that the devisee has a right to begin when the heirship is admitted, still that state of things is not analogous here, because here the defendants do not admit all that is relied upon as the title of the plaintiff. When the plaintiff is heir-at-law, his case is "I am heir and my ancestor died seised;" the other party says, "I admit all that." In this case the plaintiff says, "I am devisee;" the other party says, "No, I am devisee, you are not." The defendants say, "There is a will revoking your will, and therefore the will under which you claim is not in operation." Surely, then, the case they admit is no case at all; there is and can be no case, unless you import into it the fact that the will continued down to the time of the death: that which is called the admission of the defendants is a mere negative assertion—"You are not devisee." If you expand the statement on the record, as in special pleading, it is equally apparent that the plaintiff must begin at the trial. The plaintiff would state, "I am devisee;" the decide who shall begin. The plaintiff's counsel refused to do so at the trial, except in the usual and ordinary way, namely, by going to the jury. The plaintiff's counsel was prevented from so doing, and the defendants' counsel was then allowed to state the plaintiff's case, who was compelled to adopt a case which the counsel for the defendants chose to say was the plaintiff's case. The consequence was that a material difference was made in the proper position of the parties, and thus the case of the plaintiff was throughout substantially and injuriously affected. But in truth the admission made by the defendants was no admission at all. The plaintiff's case was an affirmative one; it involved no negation, it supported a continuing devise. The plaintiff's case was simply this: I am entitled as devisee under the last will and testament of the testator. If the defendants do not admit that, they do not admit the plaintiff's case, and the issue is upon him. The defendants do not admit that case or anything like it: they say, "The lessor of the plaintiff is not devisee, and the will under which you claim is as if it had never been made, because we set up a subsequent will, under which we are devisees, and by which all former wills are revoked." In order to entitle the defendants to begin, they should have admitted the whole case on the part of the plaintiff. It was an unimportant part of the case to admit the fact that a document was executed at some previous time; but that document did not become a will till the death of the testator, and if it was revoked before he died it never existed as a will, and the lessor of the plaintiff was never devisee.

[MAULE, J.—If the plaintiff begins and proves a first will only, and then the defendants set up a second will, can the plaintiff give evidence of expressions on the part of the testator to shew the impossibility, and inconsistency of the supposition of his having executed the later will?]

It is apprehended that he could not, as the expressions would not amount to a republication of the will. In this case it was the intention of the plaintiff to have given some evidence of that nature in laying his case before the jury. In the case between heir-at-law and devisee, the defendant admits the whole case of the plaintiff when he admits the pedigree, and that the lessor of the plaintiff died seised, and on that ground he is held entitled to begin. There are two or three Nisi Prius decisions which apparently seem to favour the argument, that in such a case as this the defendant shall begin; but when investigated they are not authorities to that extent, nor can hasty decisions at Nisi Prius be allowed to controul the indefeasible right of a plaintiff to begin, or to confer on a Judge at the trial a power of entering into a scrutiny of conflicting rights, of compelling admissions to be accepted, and of deciding which party is to begin. The case of Doe d. Chamberlayne v. Lloyd will serve to shew how inconvenient such a practice would be; for as between landlord and tenant, the right to begin would shift according to the admissions. Take a defendant (as tenant) who admits the plaintiff's (his landlord's) title, and relies upon a demise. The defendant then begins; but the landlord admits the demise and relies upon a forfeiture; whereupon the plaintiff recovers his right to begin, of which he is again deprived by the defendant admitting the forfeiture and relying upon a waiver. The case of Goodtitle d. Revett v. Braham is not satisfactory; it may be taken to decide that in a question between heir-at-law and devisee, if the heirship be admitted the defendant begins; but the rule there laid down as to the defendant's right to reply generally, would not at this day be contended for, and was overruled in Doe d. Pill v. Wilson (10). The point really decided in Doe d. Warren v. Bray is against the defendants, and the expressions of Vaughan, J., in giving judgment, cannot be supported to their full extent. The case of Doe d. Wollaston v. Barnes was wrongly decided according to the reasons there given; the issue was properly on the plaintiff, but as he obtained the verdict, the ruling was never questioned.

[MAULE, J.—We cannot consider that case immaculate in point of law.]

The circumstances of the case mentioned to have been tried at Nottingham are not anywhere recorded; it may be that the plaintiff there obtained the verdict, or consented to the course adopted at the trial. Doe d. Corbett v. Corbett was decided upon the authority of Goodtitle d. Revett v. Bra-

Trover for 200 pockets of hops.

The defendants pleaded twelve pleas, of which the following are material. Second plea, that the plaintiff was not at the said time when, &c., in the declaration mentioned, possessed as of his own property of the said goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, or of any or either of them, or of any part thereof, in manner and form, &c. Fifth plea, as to parcel of the goods in the declaration mentioned, to wit, as to forty of the said pockets of hops, the defendants say that before and thence until the plaintiff became possessed of such last-mentioned goods, and until and at the time of such sale thereof to him as hereinafter mentioned, certain persons carrying on trade under the name, style and firm of Mayor & Co. were possessed of the same as of their own property, and being so possessed, &c. afterwards and before the plaintiff became possessed thereof, to wit, on the 5th day of January 1847, casually lost the same out of their possession, and immediately thereupon and before the plaintiff first became possessed thereof, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the same came, by finding, into the possession of one Thomas Eyre, who immediately thereupon and just before the same time when, &c., in the declaration mentioned, sold and delivered the same to the plaintiff, who thereupon became and was thereof possessed as in the declaration alleged, whereupon immediately and at the said time when, &c., the defendants, as the servants and at the command of the said Mayor & Co., seized and took the said goods out of the possession of the plaintiff, and retook possession thereof to and for the use of the said Mayor & Co., and with the intent to deprive and divest the plaintiff of the property therein, and to revest the same in the said Mayor & Co., as they, the defendants, then did, and as they lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, which is the said conversion in the declaration mentioned, so far as the same relates to the said parcel of goods in the introductory part of this plea mentioned. Tenth plea, as to parcel of the said goods in the declaration mentioned, to wit, as to the said forty pockets of hops, the defendants say that before the plaintiff was possessed thereof, certain persons carrying on business under the name, style and firm of Mayor & Co., were possessed thereof as of their own property, and being so possessed, afterwards, to wit, on the 5th day of January 1847, casually lost the same out of their possession, and the same thereupon came, by finding, to the possession of one Samuel Bradley, who thereupon immediately lost possession of the same, and the same came, by finding, to the possession of one Thomas Eyre, who thereupon immediately and just before the said time when, &c., to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, sold and delivered the same to the plaintiff, who thereupon and thereby became and was possessed thereof, whereupon immediately and at the said time when, &c., in the declaration mentioned, the defendants, as the servants and at the command of the said Mayor & Co., seized and took the said goods out of the possession of the plaintiff, and retook possession of the same on behalf and to the use of the said Mayor & Co., with intent to divest and deprive the plaintiff of all property or possession thereof and therein, and revest the same in the said Mayor & Co., as they, the defendants, then did, and as they lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, which is the said conversion in the declaration alleged, so far as the same relates to the said parcel of goods in the introductory part of this plea mentioned.

The plaintiff joined issue on the second plea ; and replied to the fifth plea, that the defendants of their own wrong and without the cause by them in the said plea mentioned, committed the grievances in the declaration alleged, so far as the same relate to the parcel of goods in the introductory part of that plea mentioned. To the tenth plea a similar replication. Upon these issues were joined.

It appeared at the trial, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Spring Assizes, 1847, for the county of Surrey, that Mayor & Co. were originally possessed of the hops; that they then came into the possession of Bradley, then into the possession of Thomas Eyre, and that Thomas Eyre sold them to the plaintiff. The plaintiff relied upon a bond fide sale by Mayor & Co. to Bradley, by Bradley to Thomas Eyre, and by Thomas Eyre to the plaintiff. The defendants' case was, that Bradley fraudulently obtained the hops from Mayor & Co.; that Thomas Eyre received them of Bradley with notice of that fraud; and that they were bought by the plaintiff with knowledge of the frauds of Thomas Eyre and of Bradley.

The learned Judge told the jury that if there was a valid sale of the hops to Bradley, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Manning, Serj., in Easter term, 1847, obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.—He contended that the questions raised by the fifth and tenth pleas were:—were Mayor & Co. at any time possessed of the hops? and were the defendants acting as the servants of Mayor & Co. at the time of the alleged conversion? and further, that evidence of the plaintiff's title acquired subsequently to the possession of Mayor & Co. should not have been received, as such title was not specially replied.

Watson, Montagu Chambers and Kennedy, shewed cause.—There is no misdirection complained of on the second plea, which is "not possessed" as to the whole of the hops, and under that plea the plaintiff could shew his title to them. But it is submitted there was no misdirection at all, and that the replication ought not to have been special. The fifth plea alleges that Mayor & Co. were possessed of the hops before and until the time of the sale to the plaintiff; that before such sale they lost the hops; that the hops were immediately found by Thomas

Eyre, and that Thomas Eyre immediately sold the hops to the plaintiff, who then became possessed thereof, whereupon the defendants immediately, as servants of Mayor & Co., retook the hops, &c. The tenth plea alleges that Mayor & Co. were possessed of the hops before the plaintiff was possessed; that they lost the hops, which came by finding into the possession of Bradley; that Bradley immediately lost possession of the hops, which came by finding into the possession of Thomas Eyre, who immediately sold the hops to the plaintiff, who then became possessed thereof, whereupon the defendants immediately, as servants of Mayor & Co., retook the hops, &c. These two pleas are very similar in form; in substance they mean the same thing; and as the same arguments apply to both it is only necessary to allude to the tenth plea. The defendants contend that the only important question raised by that plea is, were Mayor & Co. possessed of the hops before the plaintiff was possessed of them? It is said the intermediate findings and sale are express colour which cannot be traversed by de injuriâ, and that if the defendants can shew that Mayor & Co. were possessed at any time before the plaintiff was possessed they would be entitled to the verdict. It is admitted that express colour in a plea cannot be traversed by the replication de injuriâ, and hence it is not material to discuss the cases of Comyns v. Boyer (1), Chambers v. Donaldson (2), and Cary v. Holt (3), referred to in moving for this rule, though so far as they go they are not authorities for the defendants. The plea of a defendant in trover in order to be a justification, must set up a good title at the time of the conversion. The tenth plea, if it be worth anything, must mean that Mayor & Co. were possessed at the time of the conversion; and though express colour be given, the party pleading must set up a good title at the time of the conversion—Leyfield's case (4), Stephen on Pleading, p. 239. The replication de injuriâ puts in issue everything which is material in the plea; if therefore the title of Mayor & Co. is alleged in the plea to have existed at the time of the conversion, that

The tenth plea, divested of all that is immaterial for the purposes of this argument, alleges that Mayor & Co. were possessed of forty pockets of hops before the plaintiff became possessed of them; it then gives colour (shewing a bad title in the plaintiff as against Mayor & Co. the rightful owners), which is not traversable, and states that the plaintiff became possessed of the said hops (under a bad title), whereupon the defendants, as servants of Mayor & Co., retook them. The title is shewn to be in Mayor & Co. before the plaintiff was possessed, and he ought therefore to have set out his title, how derived from Mayor & Co., and have specially replied a sale to Bradley, and so on to himself. Whenever a defendant has pleaded giving colour, the plaintiff must set out his title in the replication—Vin. Abr. tit. 'Colour,' Fenner v. Fisher (12).

[MAULE, J.—Down to what time do you say the title of Mayor & Co. is alleged in the plea? Is it not necessarily to be implied from the plea that they were entitled at the time of the conversion?]

The replication de injuriâ is negative only; it operates as a denial of the title of Mayor & Co. as expressly alleged in the terms of the plea, "that they were possessed before the plaintiff became possessed." That is what the plaintiff denies by his replication; and on a traverse negating the title set up by the defendants, he cannot shew affirmative matter, such as how his own title accrued. The plea does impliedly allege Mayor & Co.'s right of possession down to the time of the conversion, but the form of the replication does not put that in issue. He also referred to the Year Book, Easter term, Hen. 8. fol. 7. pl. 7, Rockwood v. Feasar (13), and Pim v. Grazebrook (14).

COLTMAN, J.—Notwithstanding the laborious argument in support of the rule, I think this is a very plain case. The tenth plea contains an allegation of title in Mayor & Co. before the conversion, and then it is said that the plea gives title to the plaintiff by way of colour; but unless the plea is to be understood as containing a statement of title in Mayor & Co. down to the time of the conversion, then it contains nothing but colour. There is some difficulty in saying what is colour and what is substance in these pleas. The rule is universal that the replication de injuriâ puts in issue all material allegations in the plea. The only material allegation that could avail the defendants here would be that Mayor & Co. were entitled at the time of the conversion: that therefore was put in issue, and has been found against the defendants by the jury. As to the question, whether the tenth plea was demurrable, we need not consider that now. It is conceded that the tenth and the fifth pleas are substantially the same, and the decision on one involves both. The verdict was right, and the rule must be discharged.

MAULE, J.—I also think the verdict is right. The same question is raised by the fifth and tenth pleas; and if they raise any question at all, that question must be, whether, at the time of the conversion the plaintiff was entitled to the hops? because if the plaintiff was, Mayor & Co. were not. If the tenth is a good plea, then the right of possession of the hops at the time of the conversion is put in issue. There may be a question whether the plea is good—whether it does allege, in unambiguous language, that Mayor & Co. were entitled at the time of the conversion? But if it does not state that, then it contains no justification at all, but is a mere statement of immaterial facts from the beginning to the end. Even in that case, the replication de injuriâ would put the whole of the facts alleged in the plea in issue, because where nothing is material, you cannot say one thing is more material than another; and the defendant would not be entitled to the verdict unless he proved the whole plea. I think the plea cannot now be taken to mean nothing; and then we must consider that it does contain the allegation that Mayor & Co. were entitled at the time of the conversion, and that is a good plea. Then, after being replied to you may throw overboard all the immaterial matter, and the plea is in substance "that at the time of the conversion Mayor & Co. were entitled to the goods, and authorized the defendants to take them." The plaintiff says, by his replication, that the defendants converted the goods without the cause alleged in their plea, and that replication is found for him by the jury. Now, that replication puts in issue everything material that is affirmed by the plea, whether it be matter of title or authority derived from the plaintiff. Whether they be facts of that class which would have rendered the replication demurrable, is of no consequence now; its operation is to put everything which is material in issue, and nothing more. My Brother Manning says, that the plaintiff cannot shew title in himself through Bradley, because that would be setting up affirmative matter under a negative replication. That is sometimes true; but the right test, as to the matter proposed to be proved being affirmative or not, is this: the replication being merely negative, the plaintiff can only shew matters which (whether affirmative or negative,) negative the matters alleged by the defendant in his plea. The distinction is not between affirmative and negative matters, but between matters in confession and avoidance of, and matters which negative, the plea. Take the case of an action of trespass; plea, a right of common invaded; replication de injurid,—the plaintiff could not, under that, shew he had a right of common also, but he might shew that the defendant had none. So if the plea set out title to land; replication de injurid, not demurred to,—the plaintiff under that form of replication could not shew a grant or right of way derived out of the estate of the defendant by way of confession and avoidance without pleading it; but he might shew that before the trespass complained of in the declaration, the defendant had parted with his estate in the land. It is the taking title out of the defendant rather than the shewing it in some one else, that is material. So here, the plaintiff may take the property out of Mayor & Co., which is a material allegation in the plea put in issue by the replication. He may shew that it is out of them by any media of proof he pleases, and the most effectual way of shewing that Mayor & Co. had not the hops at the time of the conversion, was by shewing they had parted with them before. That is affirmative matter certainly, but it is not matter in confession and avoidance; it negatives the averment contained in the defendants' plea. Taking it either way, the verdict in this case is right. If the plea is bad, and does not contain the allegation, then the plea amounts to nothing at all; if the plea is good, and does contain the allegation, that allegation was material, was put in issue by the replication, and was disproved, and so the rule must be discharged.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the plea is bad, it offers no justification for the act complained of, and cannot affect the verdict; if the plea be good, then it involves an allegation that Mayor & Co. were possessed at the time of the conversion; such allegation being material was put in issue by the replication, and disproved by the evidence.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Practice—Enlarged Rule, Service of.

In this Court, the party moving to enlarge a rule should serve the rule for enlarging it on the other party. And when a rule is enlarged by consent, the party whose interest it is to keep it alive must serve the enlarging rule on his adversary.

In this case a rule, which had been previously enlarged, was, on the last day of Michaelmas term 1847, further enlarged by consent. That rule was not served, and no one having appeared to shew cause against it, it was made absolute.

H. Hill moved to revive the rule, on the ground that there was some doubt as to the practice of this Court with regard to the service of enlarged rules, viz., whether it was necessary to serve them at all, and if so, which party was bound to do so. In Chit. Archb. p. 1191, it is said not to be the practice to serve enlarged rules, because both parties are before the Court.

WILDE, C.J.—As I understand the practice in this court, it is the duty of the party who moves to enlarge a rule to serve the rule for enlarging it on the other party; and that if the rule is enlarged by consent, the party whose interest it is to keep it alive should serve the enlarging rule on his adversary. If the party enlarging the rule does not serve a rule for that purpose, he is taken to have abandoned it. As in the present case there was a mistake with regard to the practice, the Court think that the rule may stand revived till a further day in term.

Held, that the attestation applied to the signature of all the sheets, and that the schedule was not admissible without the evidence of the attesting witness.

Debt, for money lent, for interest, and on an account stated.

Plea—Nunquam indebitatus.

The particulars of demand accompanying the declaration claimed the sum of 25*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*, due on two I O Us, and for interest, and for money lent. The venue was laid in Middlesex, then changed to Sussex, and afterwards brought back to Middlesex, on the usual undertaking, by the plaintiff, to give material evidence there. The defendant gave the plaintiff notice to prove the consideration of the I O Us.

At the trial, before Coltman, J., the plaintiff, for the purpose of proving that the I O Us had been given for money lent, offered in evidence a schedule of the defendant's, produced from the Insolvent Court in Middlesex, which contained in one sheet an admission of the debt for money lent on the I O Us. There were several sheets in the schedule, all of which were signed by the defendant, but the first only (which was not the one containing the admission), was signed by the attorney for the defendant, as attesting witness, and he was not called to prove the signature by the defendant. The Judge thought that the schedule was not admissible without the evidence of the attesting witness. A verdict was found for the plaintiff, but leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiff had not fulfilled his undertaking.

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly,—

Lush now shewed cause.—The objection raised is, that the attesting witness to the schedule, required by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 69, and by the general order of the Insolvent Court (Nov. 1, 1842), rule 4, was not called at the trial, and that therefore the schedule was inadmissible in evidence. The case of Bailey v. Bidwell (1) is directly in point. There, under a rule of the Court of Bankruptcy, similar to the rule in the Insolvent Court, the Court held it to be unnecessary to call the attesting witness. The schedule is offered here only as an admission by the defendant.

(1) 13 Mee. & Wels. 73; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.s.) Exch. 264.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Is there anything here to shew that the Insolvent Court had acted on this schedule? In the case in the Exchequer, the Court proceeded on the ground that the Bankruptcy Court had acted upon the document.]

There are memoranda on the schedule shewing the date of the petition, of the filing of the schedule, of the vesting order, and of the day appointed for the hearing. Proof that the document came from the Court, and proof of the defendant's handwriting, would have sufficiently established the admission by the defendant without calling the conventional witness. The first sheet only is signed by the attesting witness, and the plaintiff relied upon an independent sheet signed by the defendant.

[MAULE, J.—I think you would have some difficulty in getting on without the beginning of the schedule. I think it must be incorporated with what follows, and that the attestation on the first sheet must apply to the whole of the schedule.]

It is submitted that the case in the Court of Exchequer above cited governs the present.

[MAULE, J.—In Bailey v. Bidwell the allegation sought to be proved was, that the defendant had presented a petition the contents of which were not material, and not that he had made any admission. The Court there put their decision on the ground that the Court of Bankruptcy had acted upon the petition, which must have been evidence that the petition had been presented. are no provisions in the statute requiring the memoranda mentioned to be indorsed on the schedule.—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

MAULE, J.—I think, in this case, that the subscribing witness ought to have been called. In the case which occurred in the Court of Exchequer, the Court thought it was proved that the petition had been presented. That decision does not apply to the present case. The memoranda upon the schedule referred to by Mr. Lush were clearly no part of the proceedings, and it, therefore, must be assumed that they were never acted upon at all. It was necessary for the plaintiff to shew that this parchment had been signed by the defendant; and it was, therefore, most material that the circumstances under which the signature had taken place should appear, in order that it might be seen whether the statement had been made in such a manner as to make it evidence against the defendant. That is the object for which the attestation of a subscribing witness is required. The rule of the Insolvent Court directs, that there should be a subscribing witness, and describes what sort of person he should be. It directs that the schedule shall be signed by the petitioner in the presence of, and shall be attested by, his attorney. This shews that the law relating to subscribing witnesses ought to apply; that the matter was not to be left to the option of the parties, but that the document should have the particular safeguard specified in the rule. The natural consequence of the rule of court requiring such a signature is, that the ordinary practice should apply.

CRESSWELL, J.—I also am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. It is quite clear, that Mr. Lush's application to receive this schedule was a departure from the ordinary rules of evidence. The only reason adduced for making that application was founded on the case in the Court of Exchequer; but that case is distinguishable from the present. The Insolvent Court have made a rule that the schedule of the petitioner should be verified by an attesting witness, and there are no circumstances here to induce us to receive the schedule without one.

The Court will not hear a special case in which the parties have agreed that the Court may draw such inferences from the facts as a jury might draw, and that the case may be turned into a special verdict.

A special case was stated in this action, after issue joined and before trial, by consent of the parties, by order of Erle, J., under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 25. At the end of the case there was a clause empowering the Court to draw any inferences from the facts which a jury might have drawn, and reserving to either party the right of turning the special case into a special verdict.

Channell, Serj. and Peacock appeared for the plaintiffs; and Kinglake, Serj., with M. Smith, for the defendants.

MAULE, J.—I do not think we ought to hear this case. We are called on to decide both the law and the facts, and yet the facts must be found in a special verdict, so that a court of error would have to give judgment on a state of facts different from that on which we decide.

CRESSWELL, J.—Does the statute which authorizes special cases, also authorize special verdicts? How are the facts to be found? We may all agree to find for the plaintiffs or for the defendants, and yet we may draw different inferences of fact from the case.

MAULE, J. added—The act studiously avoids the mention of special verdicts. There is not here any absolute consent to a special case under the 25th section of the Law Amendment Act(1). It is only conditional. The parties have believed themselves to be under an agreement which does not exist; the case must therefore be passed over until they come to an agreement on which the Court can act.

(1) The 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 25. provides, "That it shall be lawful for the parties in any action or information after issue joined, by consent, and by order of any of the Judges of the said superior courts, to state the facts of the case in the form of a special case, for the opinion of the Court, and to agree that a judgment shall be entered for the

When an appeal from the decision of a revising barrister is called on, and the respondent does not appear, the appellant must prove the service of a ten days' notice on the respondent, or shew a sufficient excuse for the omission; otherwise the appeal must be struck out.

This was a consolidated appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the borough of Abingdon. The case was called on in Michaelmas term, when the respondent did not appear.

Alexander, for the appellant (Nov. 18).—I have no affidavit of service, as the appellant was given to understand that the respondents would appear. There are some special facts connected with the service of the notice, and the Court under the authority of Newton v. Moberley (1) will postpone the case, and this will enable the appellant to be prepared with an affidavit.

Alexander (Jan. 20) produced an affidavit, which stated that the ten days' notice required by the 64th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. had not been given in point of fact, but that the service of such notice had been waived by the respondents who had agreed to appear in support of their case.

WILDE, C.J.—It does not appear from the affidavit that anything was consented to be waived, except some formal matters which occurred before the revising barrister. The appellant now comes before us as if this were the first day for hearing appeals, and he asks for judgment in his favour, because the respondent does not appear.

He does not shew that the ten days' notice required by the act has been given to the respondent, and therefore the appeal must be struck out.

MAULE, J.—The proviso at the end of the 64th section of the 6 Vict. c. 18. gives the Court power to adjourn the hearing of the appeal upon reason assigned. When the Court is induced to depart from its usual course of proceeding, it always requires some good and valid reasons to be given for such departure; and with respect to this act of parliament, the grounds must be very substantial. Here there is no ground whatever for the application, and we must adhere to the terms of the act.

CRESSWELL, J.—Assuming the circumstances to be the same now, and considering the case as if it were the first day when it was called on last term (when I was not present) the first thing the appellant must do is to bring himself within the proviso of the 64th section, to be able to ask for a postponement; the affidavit produced is not sufficient to warrant the Court to grant a postponement; and, therefore, the appellant cannot be heard.

Parliament—6 Vict. c. 18. s. 17.—Borough Voter—Service of Notice of Objection.

The service of a notice of objection on a borough voter was stated by the revising barrister to have been made, by putting the notice and leaving it within the entrance door of the voter's place of abode between nine and ten o'clock of the night of the 25th of August:—Held, that the time and mode of service were insufficient; and that whether a notice of objection had been properly served is a question of fact to be determined by the revising barrister.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the borough of Bewdley, who stated the following

CASE.

At the Court, held on Thursday, the 20th of October, before the revising barrister for the borough of Bewdley, Charles Watson, of Bridge Street, in Stourport, within the said borough, objected to the name of Francis Pitt being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member to serve in parliament for the said borough, in respect of a house and land in the hamlet of Wribbenhall. The facts of the case were as follows:—William Taylor, on behalf of the objector, went to the house of the said Francis Pitt between nine and ten o'clock in the evening of the 25th of August last. He knocked at the door of the house several times and no person answered, he thereupon put a due notice of objection, signed by the said Charles Watson, within the house; and this was the only occasion on which he attempted to serve the said notice. I decided that this was not a sufficient service of notice of objection within the meaning of the 17th section of the stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, and therefore that the said Charles Watson was not entitled to call upon the said Francis Pitt to prove that he was entitled to be retained on the list of voters for the said borough, by reason whereof the name of the said Francis Pitt was retained on the list of voters for the said borough.

If the Court should be of opinion that the service was sufficient, then the name of the said Francis Pitt is to be expunged from the said list. But if the Court should be of opinion that the service was not sufficient, then the name of the said Francis Pitt is to be retained on the list. Signed by the revising barrister.

"I appeal from this decision.

"Charles Watson,

"Bridge Street, Stourport."

The case came on to be argued, in Michaelmas term last, when the Court were of opinion that the matter of appeal was not sufficiently stated to enable them to give judgment, and, under the power given by the 65th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, remitted the statement to the revising barrister that the case might be more fully stated.

The revising barrister thereupon returned,—“The above statement having been remitted by the Court to me the said, &c. to be more fully stated as to whether the service of the said notice of objection was made at the voter's place of abode mentioned in the list, and whether the said notice was left there, and also as to the ground on which I came to the conclusion that the facts found by me did not establish a sufficient service of such notice, I hereby find the following additional facts: namely, that the service of the said notice was made at the voter's place of abode mentioned in the list; that the said notice was put inside the said door which was the usual entrance door of the said house, and was left there. And I state and submit to the Court that the following was the ground of my said decision, namely, I was of opinion that the time and mode of the service of the said notice were unreasonable, and that some further attempt to leave the said notice with some person at the said house of the said F. Pitt ought to have been proved in order to satisfy the provisions of the said statute.

Gray, for the appellant.—The notice was properly served in compliance with the 17th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. The words of the act are that a person objecting "shall give or cause to be left at the place of abode." It prescribes no particular mode of leaving; and the case as amended finds that the notice was left at the place of abode, and that is sufficient. The notice is to be served on the 25th of August: that means at any time on that day; and the revising barrister had no power to limit the hours of the day, the whole of which is given by the act. If there had been any suggestion of fraud on the part of the objector, the service could not have been considered a good service; but there is nothing of that kind here.

Byles, Serj., for the respondent.—The Court are concluded by the finding of the revising barrister, who states as a fact that the service of the notice was an unreasonable service, and that is the same thing as no service at all. If it be a question which the Court will entertain, they will look at all the surrounding circumstances, and decide in accordance with the meaning and intention of the act of parliament. The words "left at the place of abode" do not mean any leaving: if it did, putting the notice down the chimney or in a drawer in the voter's house would be sufficient. The meaning is, that the notice shall be left in such a reasonable time and manner that the presumption is the voter will receive it. Neither was done here. The time was after business hours, when the voter was probably in bed; the mode, viz. putting it inside the door, was an improper mode; it might have been put under the door-mat. Notice of dishonour of a bill or a notice to quit, if served in the way here described, would not be held to be sufficient service. If it does not appear from the facts stated that the decision of the revising barrister was wrong, such decision must be affirmed—Watson v. Cotton (1).

Gray, in reply, contended that the facts as stated shewed that the service was not unreasonable. A service by the post is sufficient, and the delivery of letters is often after 9 o'clock at night.

WILDE, C.J.—The decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed. The 17th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. enacts, that service of the notice of objection will be sufficient if "left at the place of abode" of the party objected to. What does that mean? How must it be left? A bare leaving would not be sufficient; otherwise it might be put into a drawer, or left in an infinite variety of ways which the act would not sanction as any service at all. Clearly the notice must be left at the place of abode at such time and in such mode as to afford (at least) a cogent presumption that the person objected to will have a reasonable chance of receiving it. This being so, we are then driven to consider the time at, and the mode in, which the notice of objection was left in this case. Now the facts are, that the objector, between 9 and 10 o'clock, (beyond the hours when people are about,) put the notice inside the door of the voter's place of abode, as described in the list (and this may not have been his actual place of residence). There is nothing more done or attempted to be done by the objector. There is no proof by him that no person was in the house; probably there was, and then the notice should have been left with that person. The revising barrister says, he thought the time and mode of service were unreasonable, and we are of the same opinion. I also think that the sufficiency of the service was a question of fact for the decision of the revising barrister.

it to be unnecessary to call the attesting witness. The schedule is offered here only as an admission by the defendant.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Is there anything here to shew that the Insolvent Court had acted on this schedule? In the case in the Exchequer, the Court proceeded on the ground that the Bankruptcy Court had acted upon the document.]

work at them till July 1845, when he went away and left them. Before leaving, the plaintiff applied to the defendant for bricks to continue the work with, there being a few bricks and some rag stones then on the premises. The bricks were not supplied, and the use of the rag stones would not have been advantageous to the plaintiff. The defendant a few days after requested the plaintiff to return to the work. He refused to do so, alleging there were not any proper materials to carry on the work with.

The defendant contended that there was a mistake in the agreement in describing the houses as situate in South Street and Southampton Street, and that the word and had been inserted by mistake. He produced a receipt signed by the plaintiff, but written by himself, for payment for work done to houses in South Street, Southampton Street. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say on the first issue, whether the insertion of the word "and" in the agreement was a mistake, and whether the parties meant to describe the houses as situate in South Street, Southampton Street, or in South Street and Southampton Street. The jury found a verdict for the defendant on all the issues. A rule nisi for a new trial for misdirection had been obtained (1).

Pigott shewed cause.—The verdict on the second and third issues is decisive of the action, and therefore no new trial will be granted; but it is submitted that the jury were rightly directed on the first issue. It was necessary to give evidence to shew the particular locality to which the contract applied. The agreement by itself would apply to South Street in London or York. It was also competent for the defendant to shew that he had no houses in Southampton Street. Evidence of such a fact is not inconsistent with, or in contradiction of, the agreement, but in explanation of it, and it devolves upon the jury to say, considering all the circumstances before them, what was the real intention and meaning of the agreement—Hutchins v. Scott (2).

[MAULE, J.—You may shew that the parties meaning to use the words they did use were mistaken in the situation of the houses, but can you shew and Southampton Street was a mistake? Must you not seek relief in equity?]

In Rose v. Sims (3) it is said that Lord Tenterden allowed evidence to be given to shew that a bill of exchange for 13*l.* 19*s.* mentioned in an agreement, really meant a bill for 14*l.* 19*s.*

[MAULE, J.—Can you leave it to a jury to say whether there is a mistake in a written agreement?]

Lord Abinger says in Hutchins v. Scott, if No. 35 was intended, I am clearly of opinion that parol evidence was receivable to shew that the 38 was a mistake.

[MAULE, J.—But can you strike out anything altogether? What you have just read is only a dictum of Lord Abinger's.]

In cases under the Usury Laws, you may shew that too much or too little interest was inserted—Booth v. Cooke (4).

Humfrey and Partridge, contra.—It is a general proposition that parol evidence is not admissible to explain a written contract. It was shewn that the land in Southampton Street was "to let" at the time the contract was made. The body of the receipt was written by the defendant, and the jury ought not to have been asked to put a construction upon the clear and unambiguous words of an agreement. It is not for the jury, but for the Judge, to expound the contract; the only exception being when a particular sense is sought to be given to words of a generally received import—Neilson v. Harford (5). It is no answer to say that the Judge was of the same opinion as the jury, because the plaintiff might have tendered a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the Judge, and thus have got the judgment of a court of error on the construction of the instrument, whereas a court of error could now only decide whether the Judge should have left the question of construction to the jury. If wrongly left, it is a misdirection, and can only be remedied by a new trial.

[MAULE, J.—In Richards v. Murdoch (6), it was said that the Judge ought to have decided without evidence of opinion, as the jury decided after hearing such evidence, (which evidence ought not to have been admitted,) and the rule for a new trial was discharged on that ground.]

It is difficult to say that the insertion of the word “and” was a mistake; and it is not competent for a defendant to strike that word out of the agreement when trying an issue raised upon it. Suppose an action on a bond and non est factum pleaded, the bond is produced and agrees exactly with the declaration, could the defendant say the word “and” was inserted by mistake, and I am entitled to the verdict for a variance?

[MAULE, J.—Giving effect to all the words, may it not be said that evidence is admissible to shew that the words, though existing, fairly apply to the houses in South Street only?]

The plaintiff, at all events, is entitled to a verdict on the first issue, for he has proved the contract.

WILDE, C.J.—On further consideration, I think the question on the first issue should not have been left to the jury in the terms it was left to them, and that the verdict on that issue should be found for the plaintiff. There are many cases in which evidence may be admitted to shew what parties mean by their agreement; but there was no ambiguity requiring it in this case. It was proved that at the date of the agreement the defendant had houses in South Street only, and it was really unnecessary to leave to the jury any question of mistake in the agreement, for the language therein used is reconcileable to the intention of the parties; and construing the agreement as it stands, it means the houses in South Street. This rule will, therefore, be discharged without costs, on the defendant's consenting the verdict being entered for the plaintiff on the first issue.

—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 18.

In an action of ejectment, in which the ordinary consent rule had been entered into, the defendant obtained a verdict. In March 1846, a rule nisi for a new trial was obtained, and discharged in January 1847. The defendant died intestate in November 1846, and C. H, the defendant's son, was appointed administrator in March 1847. Afterwards, in the same month, judgment in the action was ordered by a Judge at chambers to be signed as of the 21st of April 1846, and on the 24th of April 1847, a rule nisi was obtained, calling upon the lessor of the plaintiff to pay to C. H, the defendant's administrator, the taxed costs of the action:—Held, that the consent rule in ejectment is a personal undertaking only; that the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 18. does not alter its personal character, and therefore the right to costs upon such rule does not survive to the personal representatives of the successful party.

Ejectment. The declaration was of Hilary term, 1846. The consent rule was in the usual form, and dated the 5th of February, in the 9th year of Queen Victoria.

The cause was tried, at the Spring Assizes for the county of Somerset, 1846, when the jury found a verdict for the defendant. In Easter term, 1846, a rule nisi was obtained for a new trial; and the case was argued on the 1st of June 1846. In November 1846 the defendant died; and on the last day of Hilary term 1847 the Court discharged the rule for a new trial. The defendant's attorney, notwithstanding the defendant's death, immediately signed judgment and gave notice of taxation of costs; but the Master, after hearing the parties, refused to tax the costs. On the 18th of March 1847 letters of administration were granted to C. H, the son of the defendant. On the 20th of March the defendant's attorney took out a summons before a Judge at chambers, to shew cause "why the judgment signed herein on the 10th of February last should not be struck out, and re-signed as of the 21st day of April last (1846), and why it should not be referred to the Master to tax the defendant's costs of this suit; [and why the lessor of the plaintiff should not pay the amount of such costs when taxed to C. H., the administrator of the defendant]." The learned Judge made an order in the terms prayed, as far as the word "suit," and wrote on the summons, "the part within brackets should be ground of motion in court for a rule."

An order was drawn up to tax the costs of the defendant, and the Master's allocatur for 68*l.* 12*s.* was obtained.

A copy of the consent rule and allocatur was served on the lessor of the plaintiff on the 17th of April 1847, and a demand of payment made, which not being complied with, a rule was obtained on the 24th of April as follows:—Upon reading the record of Nisi Prius in this cause, &c., it is ordered that the lessor of the plaintiff shew cause why he should not forthwith pay to C. H., as administrator of the defendant, the sum of 68*l.* 12*s.*, the amount of the Master's allocatur for the defendant's costs in the cause.

In Easter term, 1847, (May 24),—

Butt shewed cause.—The terms of the consent rule are personal only: "If upon the trial of the said issue the defendant shall not confess lease, entry and ouster, &c., the defendant shall pay costs to the plaintiff's lessor in that case, to be taxed by the Master. If, upon the trial of the said issue, the verdict shall be found for the defendant, then the lessor of the plaintiff shall pay the costs in that case to be adjudged." Thus it appears that on both sides there is only a personal obligation. The defendant relies upon the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 18, but that statute does not create any new liability; it only gives a more summary and extensive method of obtaining execution. Goodright v. Holton (1) was the only authority cited for the defendant, and that case can only be supported on the ground that there the costs were taxed by consent and by agreement of the parties. It is so explained in Adams on Eject- ment, p. 296, 4th edit., and Thrustout v. Bedwell (2) is a direct authority in my favour. The case in Barnes is always cited with the words "by consent" printed in Italics, shewing that those words are most material to explain the reason of the decision.

[MAULE, J.—In the Books of Forms, the rule is called "the common rule by consent." The latter words are necessary to describe the rule, and need not mean taxing by consent.]

[WILDE, C.J.—The judgment in the case in Wilson is given partly upon the ground that no action could be brought; but here, there was a judgment during the defendant's life upon which an action could have been brought.]

It is submitted that no action could have been brought here; and the reason of that case is therefore with me.

[WILDE, C.J.—The costs are taxed upon the consent rule, and the allocatur is made thereupon during the defendant's life: why would not that be a good foundation for an action by the administrator?]

The question is, is not the consent rule itself, which is the foundation of the liability, a mere personal obligation and nothing more? Subsequent circumstances cannot affect it. Judgment may be entered up for the defendant, but he cannot obtain his costs; for the judgment is not against John Doe, and the lessor of the plaintiff is therefore not liable to costs as upon a judgment—Williams on Executors, p. 1430, 2nd edit. Doe d. Pain v. Grundy (3) decides that the consent rule is merely personal, and the judgment in that case is the plaintiff's argument in this. (Hullock on Costs, p. 647, Tidd's Practice, p. 1243, 12th edit., and Wms. Saunders, vol. 2. p. 720, note a., were also referred to on this point.)

The case of Newton v. Walker (4) decides that a rule of court made against an intestate will not warrant an attachment against an administrator; and if the consent rule be a mere personal obligation, the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. does not apply. The 18th section enacts, "that all decrees and orders of courts of equity, and all rules of courts of common law, &c., whereby any sums or money or any costs, &c. shall be payable to any person, shall have the effect of judgments in the superior courts of common law, and the persons to whom any such monies or costs, &c. shall be payable, shall be deemed judgment creditors." But such enactment does not alter the nature of the liability, which was personal when created, and must ever remain so. If it be otherwise, it would be necessary, on a rule of this nature, to enter into the question whether or no the administrator had assets; and a decision on that question in this form would not bind the other creditors. Suppose there had been no death, and this were an application under this statute by the defendant himself, the rule could not be made absolute, because the consent rule is not within the act of parliament.

[MAULE, J.—The consent rule says, that in the event of the defendant not confessing, &c., he shall pay costs, to be taxed; and that in the event of the defendant's obtaining the verdict, the lessor of the plaintiff shall pay costs, to be adjudged. That means adjudged by the Master. The judgment would be against John Doe, but the rule steps in, and says the lessor of the plaintiff shall pay.]

Jones v. Williams (5) and Hodgson v. Paterson (6) are authorities to shew that as the money to be paid is not expressed in the consent rule itself, it is not a rule within the act. Lastly, the person against whom the application is made, is not a party to the record. This is not an application under a judgment, and, therefore, the applicant must proceed by scire facias, in the usual way—see the note to Underhill v. Devereux (7).

Montague Smith, in support of the rule.—The Court, in order to meet the justice of the case, will, if possible, make this rule absolute. The form of the judgment is, that John Doe take nothing by his suit, &c., and that the defendant recover against John Doe his costs, to be adjudged.

[MAULE, J.—If this were a common action a scire facias would be necessary.]

Yes; in order to make the lessor of the plaintiff a party to the record, and this is an analogous proceeding. Some application must be made to the Court under present circumstances, as the consent rule is a consent to pay, and no attachment can issue against a dead man. In the case of Thrustout v. Bedwell, the plaintiff died before the assizes; therefore the action abated, and then there could be no pretence for the defendant to recover. Besides, the judgment in that case is loose and unsatisfactory: it states the Court were of that opinion; but it does not say of which opinion urged in argument, and it was sufficient in that case to refuse costs, because the action had abated.

The explanation of the words "by consent" in Adams on Ejectment, on citing the case from Barnes, Goodright v. Holton, is not to be assented to: they do not mean taxed by consent, but taxed on the consent rule. If this rule be granted, a writ of fi. fa. will be issued at the suit of the administrator against the lessor of the plaintiff, and thus the defendant will get the benefit of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, which was passed to enlarge the powers of the Court in granting a remedy in cases of this nature.

[MAULE, J.—In Thrustout v. Bedwell the Court thought the contract was personal between the defendant and the lessor of the plaintiff; they thought that the true construction, and that it was so intended between the parties: but here there was a right to costs within the restriction of that case, as costs were adjudged in the lifetime of the parties.]

Just so: the Court have jurisdiction over the parties, and as judgment is entered nunc pro tunc the personal contract is satisfied. But it might be urged, looking to the subject-matter of this contract, that there is nothing to restrict it to mere personalty, because its intention is to give costs to the winning party, and in this view it is material to remember that in Thrustout v. Bedwell the party died before judgment. In Newton v. Walker the Court refused to grant an attachment against an administrator, but that decision does not interfere with the course now proposed to be adopted. It is a different case altogether, and possibly there is no method of obtaining costs against an administrator. That is not the question now before the Court; and there seems to be no reason and no principle against granting them now, and in the way asked for by this rule.

The following judgment was now (June 12,) delivered by—

WILDE, C. J.—This was a rule obtained by the defendant, calling upon the lessor of the plaintiff to shew cause why he should not pay to the defendant's administrator the costs, according to the terms of the consent rule in an action of ejectment, wherein the verdict passed against him.—[His Lordship recapitulated the facts of the trial, &c. as above mentioned, and proceeded]—It is settled by many cases that the liability of parties to pay costs on the consent rule is a personal liability which can be enforced by attachment, and the cases of Thrustout v. Bedwell and Doe v. Grundy, as also the books of practice, were referred to as establishing that position. A case reported in Barnes appeared, however, to be an authority the other way. The original documents in that case have been searched out by the direction of the Court, and it is found that that was not an application to the Court on the ordinary consent rule. The law was therefore settled prior to the statute of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; but it was contended that the 18th section of that act authorized this application. We think, however, that statute has no such effect: it gives no new power to the Court; nor does it render any persons liable to costs who were not so previously. That statute confers a new mode of enforcing the consent rule itself, but does not alter its personal character, and clearly gives no such authority as is here contended for. The terms of the consent rule give to a successful defendant the costs to be adjudged; and if that rule has not the effect of a judgment, the Court here has no power to order costs. When a rule of court has been obtained by which a certain sum of money is ordered to be paid, such rule has the effect of a judgment, as the cases of Jones v. Williams and Doe v. Amey (8) sufficiently shew; but a consent to pay costs, though expressed in a Judge's order, cannot be treated as a judgment—Thorne v. Neal (9). Where a party has simply undertaken to pay costs, such an undertaking cannot by the course now proposed be made equivalent to a judgment; but when there is an order of the Court in existence, such order can be made available against the party affected thereby, and enforced to its full extent. It has been before shewn that the act of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. imposes no new liability for costs, and we cannot make the order as prayed for by this rule.

Jan. 27. } WEST v. NIBBS AND WINDLEY.

Trespass—Distress by Landlord—Retainer and Sale of Distress after Acceptance of Rent in arrear—Pleading—New Assignment—Departure.

Trespass for seizing and taking away goods. Plea, that the defendant had demised a house to the plaintiff; that rent was in arrear; that the plaintiff fraudulently removed the goods to prevent a distress, and that no sufficient distress being left, the defendant seized the goods in question. The plaintiff new assigned, that after the defendant had seized the goods as in the plea mentioned, and after the plaintiff had paid the defendant the arrears of rent and costs of distress, and after the defendant had received the same in full satisfaction and discharge, and after the defendant ought to have restored the goods distrained, the defendant retained possession of the goods, and afterwards sold and disposed of them:—On special demurrer, held, that the new assignment did not sufficiently allege an act of trespass; that as the new assignment did not state that the acceptance of the rent took place before the impounding of the goods, it must be considered to have taken place afterwards; and that where a landlord after a lawful distress and impounding accepts the rent in arrear and costs of distress, he is not liable as a trespasser for retaining possession of the goods distrained, and selling and disposing of them.

The declaration was against two defendants, who severally in their pleadings; the new assignment was against one only, but was not specially demurred to as being a departure from the declaration on that ground:—Held, that such an objection could only be taken upon special demurrer.

(9) 2 Q.B. Rep. 726; s.c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 93.

The plea alleged under a videlicet 4l. 16s. to be the rent in arrear. The new assignment alleged, also under a videlicet, a payment of 4l. 15s., which was averred to be a sufficient sum to discharge arrears and costs, and to have been received in full satisfaction, &c.:—Held, a sufficient averment of the payment of the rent in arrear and costs.

Trespass. The declaration stated that the defendants on the 5th of February 1846, with force and arms, &c. seized, took and carried away certain goods, chattels and effects, to wit, ten bedsteads, &c. and twenty other utensils there found and being, of the plaintiff, of great value, to wit, of the value of 100*l.*, and converted and disposed of the same to their own use, and other wrongs to the plaintiff then did, against the peace of our Lady the now Queen, and to the damage of the plaintiff of 100*l.*

The second plea, pleaded by the defendant Nibbs alone, set out the defendant's title to a house; that he had demised the house to the plaintiff to hold for a quarter of a year, and so on from quarter to quarter, so long as the defendant and the plaintiff should respectively please, at the rent of 20*l.* 16*s.*, to be paid by thirteen equal payments in the year, one such payment to be made every four weeks; that by virtue of this demise the plaintiff entered into and continued in possession of the house until twelve weeks' rent became due, on the 19th of January 1846, and from then until the fraudulent removal hereinafter mentioned; that just before the said time when &c., and during the continuance of the demise to the plaintiff, to wit, on &c., a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 4*l.* 16*s.* for the rent aforesaid, for three periods of four weeks each of the said demise, ending &c., became and was due and payable from the plaintiff to the defendant, and continued due, in arrear, and unpaid; and that just before the said time when &c., and after the day on which the said rent became and was due and payable, and when the same was actually due, in arrear, and unpaid, and during the continuance of the said demise, and within thirty days next before the said time when &c., to wit, on the 1st day of February, A.D. 1846, the plaintiff fraudulently conveyed away, and carried off and from the said premises so then held and enjoyed by the plaintiff, as such tenant thereof to the defendant W. Nibbs as aforesaid, the said goods and chattels and effects in the said declaration mentioned, being the proper goods and chattels and effects of the plaintiff, to prevent the defendant W. Nibbs from distraining the same for the said rent so before and at the time of the said removal actually due, in arrear, and unpaid as aforesaid, the said goods and chattels and effects being then liable to be distrained for the said arrear, and for that purpose conveyed away and abstracted the said goods and chattels and effects in the declaration mentioned, without leaving any other goods or chattels on the said premises so held by the plaintiff as aforesaid, whereon the defendant could or might distrain for such arrear of rent as aforesaid; for which reason and because the said rent still remained due, in arrear, and unpaid, and because there was no sufficient distress upon the said premises so held by the plaintiff as aforesaid whereon the said defendant W. Nibbs could distrain for such arrear of rent, the defendant W. Nibbs in his own right, afterwards, and while the said rent so remained due, in arrear, and unpaid as aforesaid, and within thirty days next after the said goods and chattels had been so fraudulently conveyed away and carried off as aforesaid, and during the continuance of both the said demises respectively, to wit, on the day and year in the declaration mentioned, did take and seize and carry away the said goods and chattels and effects in the declaration mentioned, as a distress for the said arrear of rent, the same being then unpaid and in arrear, and did impound the same as such distress at a near and convenient place, as the defendant W. Nibbs lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, which are the trespasses whereof the plaintiff has above complained against the defendant W. Nibbs. Verification.

To this plea the plaintiff new assigned; and the new assignment stated that the plaintiff issued his writ, and commenced his said action thereupon, not for the said trespasses in the said second plea mentioned and thereby attempted to be justified, but for that after the defendant W. Nibbs had taken, seized, and carried away the said goods, chattels, and effects as in the said second plea is mentioned, and for the purpose in that plea mentioned, and after the plaintiff had paid to the said defendant W. Nibbs, to wit, on the 9th of February, in the year aforesaid, in satisfaction and discharge of the said arrears of rent in the said second plea mentioned, and of the costs and charges of the said distress in that plea mentioned, a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 4l. 15s., the same being then a sufficient sum to satisfy and discharge the said arrears of rent in the said second plea mentioned, together with all the costs and charges of the said distress in that plea mentioned; and after the defendant W. Nibbs had accepted and received the said sum of money in full satisfaction and discharge of the said arrears of rent in the said second plea mentioned, and of the costs and charges of the said distress in that plea also mentioned; and after the defendant W. Nibbs ought to have given up and restored to the plaintiff the said goods, chattels, and effects, so by the said defendant W. Nibbs seized, taken, and distrained, as in the said second plea is mentioned, and after the said 9th of February in the year aforesaid, the said defendant W. Nibbs retained possession of the said goods, chattels, and effects in the said declaration and second plea respectively mentioned for a long space of time, to wit, two days after the said 9th of February in the year aforesaid; and also after the said 9th of February in the year aforesaid, sold and disposed of the said goods, chattels, and effects in the said declaration and second plea respectively mentioned; which said trespasses above newly assigned are other and different trespasses from the said trespasses in the said second plea mentioned and thereby attempted to be justified. Verification.

Special demurrer, on the ground that the new assignment is a departure from the declaration, inasmuch as the acts of trespass charged in the declaration are only seizing, taking and carrying away, and the grievances newly assigned are only retaining possession, selling, and disposing; and also that it is doubtful whether the grievances newly assigned are a seizing, taking, and carrying away; and also that an act of trespass is an injury to the plaintiff's possession, and that the grievances newly assigned clearly imply that the defendant had the possession, because the grievance is that the defendant retained possession; and also that the grievances newly assigned are not substantive trespasses, but rather grounds for an action of detinue or trover, or on the case; and also that it is doubtful whether the new assignment intends to new assign the same trespasses as are mentioned in the declaration, or different trespasses.

Bramwell (Jan. 22, 1847), in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is against two defendants, but the new assignment is against one only. The new assignment therefore does not support the declaration. If a writ appears false by a plaintiff's own shewing it abates without a plea—Com. Dig. tit. 'Abatement,' (L). Suppose the cause goes down to trial, and the pleas of both defendants are found against them, is judgment to be entered up against the other defendant, or against this defendant, or against both?

[WILLIAMS, J.—Are you not tied down to the ground stated in your special demurrer? Would this be a ground of general demurrer? see Evans v. Elliott (1)].

[WILDE, C.J.—If the Court cannot give judgment on the declaration incorporating the new assignment, then it would seem clear it must be a cause of general demurrer.]

Secondly, as to the departure pointed out by the demurrer. The declaration complains of a trespass by "seizing, taking, and carrying away;" the new assignment by "retaining possession, selling, and disposing:" simply retaining goods is not a trespass.

[WILDE, C.J. referred to Evans v. Elliott.]

The statement in the declaration that the defendant took them could not be made, because the goods were in the custody of the law; the "selling and disposing" is not a trespass, and is a departure from the declaration. Again, the plea states that 4l. 16s. was in arrear and unpaid: the new assignment says, "after the plaintiff had paid the defendant in satisfaction and discharge of the arrears of rent, and of the costs &c. a large sum, to wit, the sum of 4l. 15s." That is a less sum than is in the plea alleged to be due; there was therefore no legal satisfaction of the rent due, and the agreement of the parties would not prevent the right of distress. Again, the plaintiff was not possessed of the goods; they were in the custody of the law, and an action of trespass will not therefore lie—Gulliver v. Cosens (2), which refers to Ancomb v. Shore (3). Though an unlawful detention may be an act of trespass, yet, in the present case, it could not, because the goods were impounded, and were therefore in the custody of the law.

[CRESSWELL, J. — The new assignment does not deny the impounding.]

Dowling, Serj. contra.—There has been no departure. In actions of tort, which are joint and several, a jury may find one defendant guilty, and the other not. The defendants here have severed in their pleas. The declaration comprised both a joint and several trespass. It is said that the new assignment shews only a detention; that it is a mere allegation of a continuance of possession, and does not constitute a trespass; but to keep a distress an unreasonable time is a trespass—Evans v. Elliott, Griffin v. Scott (4), Winterbourne v. Morgan (5), Ladd v. Thomas (6). Here, the new assignment states further, that the defendant sold and disposed of the goods, and this fact is admitted by the demurrer. The custody of the law ceased when the defendant received the rent.

[WILDE, C.J.—The resolution in The Six Carpenters' case (7) seems not to square with the cases you cite.]

With respect to the objection that 4l. 15s. is alleged to have been paid in satisfaction of 4l. 16s., the amounts in each case are not material. Both sums are laid under a vide licet; and as the defendant would not be bound by the precise sum he has named, neither is the plaintiff. A new assignment is not to be taken as admitting the facts stated in the plea—Brancher v. Molyneux (8).

Bramwell, in reply.—The goods were clearly in the custody of the law—Turner v. Ford (9).

[WILDE, C.J.—It is not in dispute that they were once in the custody of the law.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—I have some doubts whether on the pleadings it appears that the payment took place after the impounding.]

If there is any ambiguity, it ought to be taken most strongly against the plaintiff.

[WILLIAMS, J.—Suppose the impounding was all a fable, what course ought the plaintiff to pursue? A traverse of that fact would be an immaterial traverse.]

He might have said "before the supposed impounding." If after the impounding the goods are in the custody of the law, the defendant is not obliged to take them out of that custody. He also cited Com. Dig. tit. 'Pleader,' 3, (K) 23, 1 Wms. Saund. 347, b. It is said that the allegation of what is due is immaterial; it may be so, but the conclusion that it was a sufficient sum is an erroneous conclusion of law. There is no allegation by which the defendant could put in issue that it was a sufficient sum.

[WILDE, C.J.—The general principles of law appear to us to lead to the conclusion that the demurrer is sustainable. There is some difficulty in saying that a mere non-feasance can be made the subject of trespass. Here, the new assignment goes somewhat further, because it states that the defendant "sold and disposed of" the goods. Evans v. Elliott, however, appears to lay down that a wrongful detention amounts to a trespass. We will look into that case, but the present impression of the Court is, that the action is not maintainable for the mere detention, but that where the goods are held to be in the custody of the law the party must first take legal means to take them out of that custody. Trover or detinue might have been maintained, and therefore it was not essential to the party to bring his action of trespass.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—As to the new assignment not being a departure, on which the Court are agreed, it is to be borne in mind that all that is said is, that the declaration and new assignment may be read together, as the one explains the other. Here, all that is meant by the plea is, "I suppose you mean by your declaration the time when I took the goods by way of distress;" the plaintiff then says, "No; I mean the trespass by you and the other defendant, when you detained the goods after the payment in satisfaction."

The plaintiff is, therefore, just in the position in which he was before: it may happen he may be put to his election at the trial. I believe the Court is also unanimous in the opinion that the averment of the payment of the 4*l.* 15*s.* is sufficient.]

The judgment of the Court (10) was now delivered by—

CRESSWELL, J.—This is an action of trespass, in which the declaration charges the defendants with seizing, taking, and carrying away certain goods of the plaintiff, and converting and disposing of the same to their own use. The defendant Nibbs pleaded separately: first, that the goods were not the plaintiff's; secondly, that he had demised a house to the plaintiff at a certain rent; that a certain amount of such rent was in arrear; that the plaintiff fraudulently removed the goods in the declaration mentioned from the demised premises to prevent a distress for such arrears, whereupon, there being no sufficient distress on the demised premises, the defendant Nibbs took, seized, and carried away the said goods as a distress for the said arrears and impounded the same at a near and convenient place. As to the first plea, the plaintiff has joined issue. As to the second plea, he has now assigned that he brought his action not for the trespasses mentioned in the second plea, but for that after the defendant Nibbs had taken, seized, and carried away the goods as in the second plea mentioned, and for the purpose there mentioned, and after the plaintiff had paid the defendant Nibbs, to wit, on the 9th of February in the year aforesaid, in satisfaction and discharge of the said arrears and of the costs of the said distress, a certain sum, which was sufficient to satisfy and discharge the said arrears and costs, and after the defendant Nibbs had accepted and received the same sum in full satisfaction and discharge of the said arrears and costs, and after the defendant Nibbs ought to have given up and restored to the plaintiff the said goods so taken and distrained as in the second plea mentioned, and after the said 9th of February, the defendant Nibbs retained possession of the said goods for a long time, to wit, two days after the said 9th of February, and also after the said 9th of February sold and disposed of the said goods. To this new assignment the defendant Nibbs has demurred.

In support of the demurrer several objections to the new assignment were urged on the argument, and amongst them one which we think well founded, viz. that the grievances newly assigned do not constitute any ground for an action of trespass. The new assignment alleges that the payment and acceptance of the rent in arrear took place after the distress, but it does not aver that it took place before the impounding of the goods distrained; and we think, therefore, that it must be considered to have taken place afterwards. The question then is, whether, if a landlord, after a lawful distress and impounding, accepts the rent in arrear and the charges of the distress, he is liable as a trespasser for merely retaining possession of the goods distrained, and selling and disposing of them. As to the selling and disposing of them, although, under certain circumstances, the assuming a right to dispose of the goods of another may amount to a conversion of them sufficient to sustain an action of trover, yet it seems to us impossible to maintain that a man becomes a trespasser by the act of selling and disposing of the goods of another without authority, unless such sale and disposition be accompanied by some act of removal of the goods either by the vendor or vendee.

It remains therefore to consider only, whether the merely retaining possession of the goods as alleged amounts to an act of trespass. In The Six Carpenters' case, "it was resolved per totam Curiam, that not doing cannot make the party who has authority or licence by the law a trespasser ab initio, because not doing is no trespass; and therefore if the lessor distrains for his rent, and thereupon the lessee tenders him the rent and arrears, &c. and requires his beasts again, and he will not deliver them, this not doing cannot make him a trespasser ab initio." If then a landlord, who refuses a proper tender, is not to be regarded as a trespasser merely by reason of his non-feasance in failing to deliver up the distress, he being required so to do, it appears to us to follow that a landlord who has accepted the rent in arrear, &c. after the impounding, cannot be treated as a trespasser merely because he retains possession of the goods distrained (although his refusal to deliver them up to the tenant may amount to a conversion, sufficient to make the landlord liable in an action of trover). The case of Evans v. Elliott was relied on in the argument by the counsel for the plaintiff; but, although that case is an authority for the proposition, that where there has been a tender between the taking and the impounding, a detention after the tender is sufficient to satisfy the usual allegation in a declaration in replevin that the defendant took, &c. and detained, &c.; yet we do not consider that case as deciding that the mere retaining by the landlord of the goods distrained, after the tenant has gained a right to have them delivered up to him, will render the landlord liable to an action of trespass. Nor do we consider our present decision as conflicting with the case of Vertue v. Beasley (11). There a tender of the rent and costs had been made after the distress, but before the goods were impounded or removed. The landlord refused to accept it, and afterwards removed the goods, and it was held by Parke, J. that he was liable to the tenant in trespass for such removal. In that case the cause of action was not the mere retaining possession, but the wrongful removal of the goods after the tender. On the whole, we think the demurrer sustainable on the ground that the new assignment does not sufficiently allege any act of trespass. It therefore has become unnecessary to decide on the other grounds taken during the argument in support of the demurrer.

Jan. 18. } KINGDOM v. COX.

Contract, Construction of — Part Performance.

The defendant agreed to supply the plaintiff with 150 tons weight of iron girders, at a certain price per ton, and according to plans to be furnished by the plaintiff. Plans were furnished within a reasonable time from the date of the agreement, and at the same time fourteen tons weight of girders were ordered. Four months after the date of the agreement the fourteen tons were demanded; and other plans were furnished, and orders given for sixty tons more girders. The defendant then repudiated the contract:—Held, that the contract was entire; and that as the plaintiff had not furnished plans for the whole 150 tons within a reasonable time from the date of the agreement, he could not recover for the non-delivery of the fourteen tons, for which plans had been furnished within a reasonable time from such date.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated, that whereas on the 28th of November 1844, in consideration that the plaintiff would, at the request of the defendant, accept, receive and pay for the goods thereafter mentioned, upon the terms, &c. in that behalf mentioned, the defendant, by a certain memorandum in writing, then promised the plaintiff to supply him with cast-iron girders of the various sizes to be shewn in drawings to be provided by the plaintiff's architect, and to deliver the same perfect, at a price therein mentioned, and to use his (the defendant's) best endeavours to deliver fifty tons of the said girders on or before the 31st of December 1844, fifty tons more on or before the 28th of January 1845, and fifty tons more on or before the 31st of March 1845, provided the drawings for the first fifty tons were sent to the defendant within a certain time then agreed upon between them, to wit, within three days after the receipt of the said memorandum, and the drawings for the remainder within three weeks after the receipt of the said memorandum, payment to be made, &c. Averment, that although the plaintiff had always been ready and willing to receive and pay for the said cast-iron girders, and although the plaintiff did, within a reasonable time after the making of the said agreement, to wit, on &c., duly and according to the said agreement, provide and deliver to the defendant, who then received the same, fifty drawings specifying and shewing the numbers and sizes respectively of the girders which the plaintiff then required, &c.; and although a reasonable time had since elapsed, yet the defendant did not nor would within such reasonable time, or at any time before or since, supply the plaintiff with the said girders, &c.

Pleas—First, that the defendant did not promise in manner and form, &c. Issue thereon. Secondly, that the plaintiff did not, within a reasonable time after the making of the said agreement, provide or deliver to the defendant drawings specifying or shewing the numbers and sizes respectively of the cast-iron girders, which he, the plaintiff, required of and from the defendant in manner and form, &c. Issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Cresswell, J., at the sittings for Middlesex, after Michaelmas term, 1847. It appeared at the trial, that a contract as set out in the declaration was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 28th of November 1844; that some plans were sent to the defendant on the 5th of December, and that on the 16th of December 1844, the plaintiff gave him an order for thirty iron girders, about fourteen tons weight. The receipt of this order was acknowledged on the 19th of December, as follows:—

“Sir,—We duly received yours of the 16th, ordering two 12 ft. 6 in. girders for each house, making in all thirty, which will be finished on Saturday night. Be good enough to write us further instructions as to the next on receipt of this, as we shall be standing on Monday, as the pattern has to be altered we presume. Yours, &c.,

“W. C.”

There was some correspondence between the plaintiff and the defendant in February 1845, but nothing further took place till the 4th of March 1845, when the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, and declined to proceed under the contract. On the 13th of March the plaintiff's solicitors sent the defendant some new plans, an order for some more girders, about fifty tons weight, and required him to deliver the thirty girders which had been ordered on the 16th of December 1844. The defendant refused to comply. The price of iron in the market was much higher in March 1845 than in December 1844. The learned Judge left the following question to the jury: “Was the delivery of the plans to the defendant on the 13th of March 1845 a delivery within a reasonable time?” The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Channell, Serj. moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.—There were two orders given, one on the 19th of December, the other on the 13th of March. The learned Judge should have made a distinction with respect to the two orders in his summing up; the plans and drawings were delivered within a reasonable time, as far as regards the first order, and it was a misdirection to leave the question of reasonable time as an entire question to the jury. There is no objection to the ruling of the learned Judge, or to the finding of the jury on the second order; but as there is no plea of performance, the contract and breach of it are admitted; and if the plaintiff had a right to the girders ordered in December, he is entitled to a verdict on the second issue.

The defendant assumes that a delivery of all the plans is a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to demand any of the girders, whereas the true meaning of the contract is this,—the plaintiff is to deliver plans by a certain time, and then the defendant is to deliver girders by a certain time,—or, if the plans are not delivered at the specified time, then the girders are to be delivered within a reasonable time after the plans are received by the defendants—Kingdom v. Cox (1). The contract may be divided into three parts. The first part imposes an imperative obligation on the defendants to supply the plaintiff with goods according to plans to be provided by his architect. The second part shews the quantity of goods to be delivered, and fixes a time for the delivery, provided the plans are furnished at a given time. The third part fixes the mode and time of payment, &c. The first part of the agreement does not mention the quantity of iron girders to be delivered; the whole quantity comprised in the plaintiff's two orders would be about seventy-five tons, and there is no defence whatever in respect of the fourteen tons first ordered.

[MAULE, J.—Why do you divide the contract so scientifically into three parts? Let it speak for itself,—and then the defendant contracts to deliver 150 tons of iron at a wholesale price. Can the plaintiff enforce that as a contract for fourteen tons (a retail quantity) at the same price?]

cannot be treated as a trespasser merely because he retains possession of the goods distrained (although his refusal to deliver them up to the tenant may amount to a conversion, sufficient to make the landlord liable in an action of trover). The case of Evans v. Elliott was relied on in the argument by the counsel for the plaintiff; but, although that case is an authority for the proposition, that where there has been a tender between the taking and the impounding, a detention after the tender is sufficient to satisfy the usual allegation in a declaration in replevin that the defendant took, &c. and detained, &c.; yet we do not consider that case as deciding that the mere retaining by the landlord of the goods distrained, after the tenant has gained a right to have them delivered up to him, will render the landlord liable to an action of trespass. Nor do we consider our present decision as conflicting with the case of Vertue v. Beasley (11). There a tender of the rent and costs had been made after the distress, but before the goods were impounded or removed. The landlord refused to accept it, and afterwards removed the goods, and it was held by Parke, J. that he was liable to the tenant in trespass for such removal. In that case the cause of action was not the mere retaining possession, but the wrongful removal of the goods after the tender. On the whole, we think the demurrer sustainable on the ground that the new assignment does not sufficiently allege any act of trespass. It therefore has become unnecessary to decide on the other grounds taken during the argument in support of the demurrer.

The defendant agreed to supply the plaintiff with 150 tons weight of iron girders, at a certain price per ton, and according to plans to be furnished by the plaintiff. Plans were furnished within a reasonable time from the date of the agreement, and at the same time fourteen tons weight of girders were ordered. Four months after the date of the agreement the fourteen tons were demanded; and other plans were furnished, and orders given for sixty tons more girders. The defendant then repudiated the contract:—Held, that the contract was entire; and that as the plaintiff had not furnished plans for the whole 150 tons within a reasonable time from the date of the agreement, he could not recover for the non-delivery of the fourteen tons, for which plans had been furnished within a reasonable time from such date.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated, that whereas on the 28th of November 1844, in consideration that the plaintiff would, at the request of the defendant, accept, receive and pay for the goods thereafter mentioned, upon the terms, &c. in that behalf mentioned, the defendant, by a certain memorandum in writing, then promised the plaintiff to supply him with cast-iron girders of the various sizes to be shewn in drawings to be provided by the plaintiff's architect, and to deliver the same perfect, at a price therein mentioned, and to use his (the defendant's) best endeavours to deliver fifty tons of the said girders on or before the 31st of December 1844, fifty tons more on or before the 28th of January 1845, and fifty tons more on or before the 31st of March 1845, provided the drawings for the first fifty tons were sent to the defendant within a certain time then agreed upon between them, to wit, within three days after the receipt of the said memorandum, and the drawings for the remainder within three weeks after the receipt of the said memorandum, payment to be made, &c. Averment, that although the plaintiff had always been ready and willing to receive and pay for the said cast-iron girders, and although the plaintiff did, within a reasonable time after the making of the said agreement, to wit, on &c., duly and according to the said agreement, provide and deliver to the defendant, who then received the same, fifty drawings specifying and shewing the numbers and sizes respectively of the girders which the plaintiff then required, &c.; and although a reasonable time had since elapsed, yet the defendant did not nor would within such reasonable time, or at any time before or since, supply the plaintiff with the said girders, &c.

Pleas—First, that the defendant did not promise in manner and form, &c. Issue thereon. Secondly, that the plaintiff did not, within a reasonable time after the making of the said agreement, provide or deliver to the defendant drawings specifying or shewing the numbers and sizes respectively of the cast-iron girders, which he, the plaintiff, required of and from the defendant in manner and form, &c. Issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Cresswell, J., at the sittings for Middlesex, after Michaelmas term, 1847. It appeared at the trial, that a contract as set out in the declaration was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 28th of November 1844; that some plans were sent to the defendant on the 5th of December, and that on the 16th of December 1844, the plaintiff gave him an order for thirty iron girders, about fourteen tons weight. The receipt of this order was acknowledged on the 19th of December, as follows:—

“Sir,—We duly received yours of the 16th, ordering two 12 ft. 6 in. girders for each house, making in all thirty, which will be finished on Saturday night. Be good enough to write us further instructions as to the next on receipt of this, as we shall be standing on Monday, as the pattern has to be altered we presume. Yours, &c.,

[WILDE, C.J.—The plaintiff never asked for those girders till March.]

The defendant assumes that a delivery of all the plans is a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to demand any of the girders, whereas the true meaning of the contract is this,—the plaintiff is to deliver plans by a certain time, and then the defendant is to deliver girders by a certain time,—or, if the plans are not delivered at the specified time, then the girders are to be delivered within a reasonable time after the plans are received by the defendants—*Kingdom v. (1) 2 Com. B. 661; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 95.

WILDE, C.J.—This rule is moved for on the ground, that admitting the verdict to be right, which finds that the delivery of the plans on the 13th of March was unreasonable in point of time, still the verdict was not right, inasmuch as the non-delivery of the girders, for which plans were furnished in December, constituted a breach of the contract. It appears to me that no distinction can be made between the two orders. There is but one contract, the several parts of which are materially and mutually influenced by the quantity of goods contracted for, the time fixed for the delivery, and the price to be paid. No person can doubt, on reading it, that this is an entire contract. Then, may one side call on the other to execute such a contract in part, and complain of a breach of that part which he does call for, when he does not call, and does not intend to call, for the performance of the remainder of it? It is true that the plaintiff furnished some plans and ordered some girders in December 1844, but he did not furnish other plans within the stipulated time. The effect of that neglect was to discharge the defendant from the performance of the contract altogether. The plaintiff then calls for the delivery of the girders and orders more girders; but how can he call on the defendant to deliver girders and perform work under a contract at a time when the contract has ceased to exist? If a party contracts to deliver a whole quantity of goods at a certain price by a certain time, he cannot sue for the price till the whole is delivered; but if he delivers part, and such part is retained, he may sue for the price when the time for the delivery of the whole has expired—Waddington v. Oliver (2), Walker v. Dixon (3). So, here, this being an entire contract, the second issue means,—Did the plaintiff, or did he not, deliver plans within a reasonable time for the whole quantity of goods to be supplied according to the contract? The question left by the learned Judge to the jury was quite right, and no rule can be granted.

MAULE, J.—I am of opinion that the verdict ought not to be disturbed, and that it is right both in fact and law. Justice in this case coincides with the law, and both pronounce in favour of the defendant. The contract as I understand it is, that the defendants are to deliver not less than 150 tons of iron within a reasonable time, from the time when the plaintiff gives orders and furnishes plans for the articles to be supplied. The defendant is to have a reasonable time to execute the contract; the plaintiff is to have a reasonable time to give orders and to furnish plans, that is, a reasonable time from the date of the agreement. The defendant cannot be compelled to furnish any less quantity than that agreed upon. To suppose that they must deliver ten or twenty tons only at the same price for which they agreed to deliver 150 tons, would not be an enforcement of this contract, and would be an unreasonable and unjust construction of its terms. The contract is not to be artificially divided into parts, as the plaintiff contends; it must be taken altogether.

Venue, Change of—Banker's Cheque.

The venue in an action on a banker's cheque cannot be changed on the common affidavit.

The declaration in this case contained a count on a banker's cheque, and a count for goods sold and delivered. The venue was laid in London, and on the 4th of January it was changed from London to Bedfordshire on the common affidavit.

Talfourd, Serj., having (Jan. 12) obtained a rule nisi to discharge the rule for changing the venue,—

Byles, Serj. now shewed cause.—It is contended on the other side that the venue cannot be changed in an action on a banker's cheque. The rule formerly was, that when the action was upon a written instrument, the venue could not be changed on the common affidavit. But that rule has been qualified in modern cases. In the case of Mondel v. Steele (1), Parke, B., lays down the rule thus: "In this state of the authorities, we think that it cannot be laid down as a general proposition that the venue is not to be changed in actions on contracts appearing by the declaration to be in writing. There does not seem to be any principle and but little precedent in support of so extensive an exception to a general rule, which, in conformity with the statute law, is, that actions should be tried where the causes of action arise, and the exceptions to that rule should not be too readily extended. We think that in all actions on contracts, though in writing, except on specialties, bills and notes, the venue may be changed upon the usual affidavit being made." The question therefore is, whether a banker's cheque is a bill or note within the meaning of that rule. In Slade v. Trew (2), the venue was changed on the common affidavit, though the action was on a written agreement to pay a sum of money on a day certain, and if not then paid, to secure the same by mortgage. In Roberts v. Wright (3), the action was on an I O U, and the venue was changed on the usual affidavit.

[MAULE, J.—A banker's cheque is subject to the same rules as a bill of exchange.]

WILDE, C.J.—I think that the rule for changing the venue was irregularly obtained, and that the present rule should be made absolute. In Martin v. Daws (4), the Court of Exchequer refused to change the venue, upon the ordinary affidavit, in an action upon an award.

Stamp.—55 Geo. 3. c. 184.—Evidence.

In an action for money had and received, the defendant put in evidence the following document, written by the plaintiff, on the back of an unstamped receipt: "Balanced up to this day, as per cash-book, 19th of November 1845":—Held, that this document was admissible in evidence without being stamped.

Such a document is good primâ facie evidence to shew that, up to the day of its date, there was no debt existing between the parties.

Debt, for money had and received, goods sold and delivered, and on an account stated.

Pleas—Nunquam indebitatus; payment; and set-off. The cause was tried, before Maule, J., at the sittings for Middlesex, in Easter term, 1846, when it appeared that the defendant was servant to the plaintiff, who sought to recover the amount of various sums received by the defendant, on account of his master (the plaintiff). The defendant tendered in evidence a receipt for 18*l.*, signed by the plaintiff, which overtopped the sum proved by the plaintiff to be due to him. The receipt was objected to for want of a stamp, and was not admitted in evidence. The defendant then gave in evidence the following memorandum, in the handwriting of the plaintiff, on the back of the receipt:—

"Balanced up to this day, as per cash-book, November 19, 1845, S. F." (Signed by the plaintiff.) This memorandum was also objected to, for want of a stamp. The learned Judge overruled the objection; the memorandum was read in evidence, and the defendant obtained the verdict.

Kennedy had obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the grounds that the above document had been improperly admitted and that the verdict was against the evidence.

Joyce shewed cause.—The document is not a receipt for money, and does not require a stamp. Its effect is a simple acknowledgment that the accounts have been balanced, and it may have been that the defendant received money on that balance. The words of 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. sched. part 1. 'Receipt,' relied upon on the other side, do not include such a memorandum as this: "Any receipt or discharge, note, memorandum, or writing whatever, given to any person, for or upon the payment of money, which shall contain, import, or signify any general acknowledgment of any debt, account, claim, or demand, &c., whereof the amount shall not be therein specified, having been paid, settled, balanced, or otherwise discharged or satisfied, or whereby any sum of money, therein mentioned, shall be acknowledged to be received in full, or in discharge or satisfaction of any such debt, account, claim, or demand, &c., and whether the same shall be signed or not with the name of any person, shall be deemed to be a receipt for the sum of 1,000*l.* or upwards, and shall be charged with the duty of 10*s.*" An admission of payment made on an account current does not require a stamp—Clark v. Hougham (1). A memorandum at the foot of an account that it is correct was admitted without a stamp in Wellard v. Moss (2). It may be urged that the cash-book should have been produced; but that is in the plaintiff's possession, and if anything required explanation it was for him to make it clear. There was no evidence of any receipt of money after the 19th of November 1845; and the memorandum was fair and legitimate evidence to shew that up to that date everything had been adjusted.

Kennedy, in support of the rule.—The document objected to was a receipt, or else it proved nothing at all. If it be not a receipt, then there is no evidence to support the verdict, and there must be a new trial on that ground. The word "balanced" refers to something which does not appear in the memorandum itself: it referred to the cash-book, or possibly to what was written on the other side of the paper. If it referred to the cash-book, that should have been produced as the best evidence of the state of the account; and if it referred to the receipt, then it forms part of the receipt itself, and was inadmissible. If the document be receivable at all, it should only have been admitted de bene esse, and as requiring something to be added to make it a perfect document. No further evidence was given, and as it stands, per se, and unexplained, there is nothing to shew that it relates in any way to the cause of action declared upon.

WILDE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. There is nothing on the face of the document admitted in evidence to shew that it was given to any person as a receipt for the payment of any money, and, therefore, it did not require a stamp. As to the objection that there was nothing to prove that it related to the cause of action, there was only one account between the parties, and the plaintiff might have shewn (if such were the fact) that it referred to money transactions other than those declared upon. In the absence of any such evidence on the part of the plaintiff, the correct inference is, that the document does relate to the cause of action, which is the only matter to which it can be applied. The word "balanced" is ambiguous; it may mean "the sum due is ascertained," it may mean "the sum due is paid," or it may mean "the accounts between the parties are adjusted, and nothing is due:" and there was no evidence of any receipt of money by the defendant after the 19th of November 1845. It was for the jury to say what was the meaning of the word "balanced" in this document, and it was properly left to them by the learned Judge. There has been no affidavit of surprise; and I make no doubt that the conclusion arrived at by the jury was just.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

CRESWELL, J.—I agree. The memorandum did not require a stamp; it is not a receipt, but merely states that an account has been balanced up to a certain day, and the jury seem to me to have been well warranted in construing it as they have done. It is then said that the memorandum is connected with and forms part of the receipt written on the other side of it. It however appears to me that the juxtaposition of the two writings forms the only connexion between them.

Assumpsit. The first count of the declaration stated that whereas theretofore and before the commencement of the suit, to wit, on the 28th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1846, by a certain agreement then made by and between the plaintiff and the defendant, it was agreed that the defendant should take the plaintiff into his, the defendant's service, as clerk, to conduct his, the defendant's, business of a custom-house and shipping agent, at Southampton, for the space of six calendar months, for the sum of 60*l.*, being after the rate of 120*l.* for the year; and should also pay to the plaintiff at the expiration of each three months from the date thereof a sum of money equal to 50*l.* per cent. on the gross profits of all and any business the said plaintiff should introduce or cause to be introduced, through his connexion, to the defendant's business; and that at the expiration of the six months from the date thereof, should there be no just cause shewn to the contrary, the defendant thereby agreed to enter into a further agreement with the plaintiff, for a further engagement for the term of two years, at the annual salary of 150*l.* for the first of such two years, and 160*l.* for the second of such two years, and also to pay to the plaintiff a sum of money equal to 50*l.* per cent. on the gross profits on any business the plaintiff should have introduced, or should thereafter introduce to the defendant's business; and it was thereby further agreed that should there be any just cause shewn why a further agreement should not be entered into between the parties, the defendant should continue to pay to the plaintiff for the space of twelve months from the date of the said agreement (though the plaintiff should not be in the service of the defendant after six months from the date of the said agreement,) a sum of money equal to 50*l.* per cent. on the gross profits of the business introduced by the plaintiff; and it was thereby further agreed, that all sums of money received from the said business introduced by the plaintiff should be considered profits, except upon payments which had been actually made in reference to the business itself, office rent, clerks' salaries, or any other expenses but those named, not to be deducted from the profits. And the plaintiff further says, that afterwards, and within one calendar month after the making of the said agreement, to wit, on the 22nd day of October, in the year of our Lord 1846, the terms thereof were by another agreement made on the day and year last aforesaid by and between the plaintiff and the defendant altered and varied in manner following; that is to say, it was by the last-mentioned agreement agreed that, with the exception of such overland agency business as the defendant was then in possession of, the defendant should pay to the plaintiff a sum of money equal to 50*l.* per cent. on the gross profits, without reduction for expenses except as aforesaid on all such baggage business, as was then in the defendant's possession as aforesaid, and the defendant also thereby gave his free consent to the plaintiff to permit him, the plaintiff, to conduct the wine agency business of one Henry Fenner, trading under the name, firm, and description of Messrs. Henry Fenner & Co. of London, on his, the plaintiff's, own account; and it was thereby further agreed that the defendant was not to receive any part of the profits which should arise therefrom; and it was also thereby further agreed, that the plaintiff should pay to the defendant one-half of the office rent, to take date from the 24th day of December then next, the rent of which was then 50*l.* per annum. And the plaintiff says, that theretofore and after the making of the last-mentioned agreement, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, in consideration that the plaintiff at the request of the defendant then promised the defendant to perform and fulfil all things in the said first-mentioned agreement contained, except so far as the same was altered by the second-mentioned agreement, and all things in the second-mentioned agreement contained on his part to be performed and fulfilled, the defendant then promised the plaintiff to perform and fulfil all things in the said first-mentioned agreement contained, except so far as the same was altered by the second-mentioned agreement, and all things in the said second-mentioned agreement contained on his part to be performed and fulfilled; and the plaintiff further says, that he did after the making of the first-mentioned and before the making of the second-mentioned agreement, to wit, on the day and year first aforesaid enter into the service of and become clerk to the defendant, at and upon the terms in the said first agreement mentioned and therein contained, until the making of the agreement secondly above mentioned, and from thence until the expiration of six calendar months from the date of the first-mentioned agreement (which had elapsed before the commencement of this suit), he continued in the said service upon the terms in the said agreements respectively contained, except so far as the said first-mentioned agreement was varied by the agreement secondly above mentioned, to wit, until the 28th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1847, and although he, the plaintiff, at the expiration of the said space of six calendar months from the date of the said first-mentioned agreement (to wit), on the day and year last aforesaid, was ready and willing and offered to enter into such further agreement for two years, at and upon the terms hereinbefore in that behalf mentioned, and then requested the defendant to enter into such further agreement, and although no just cause was then shewn to the contrary, and although the gross profits of the baggage business, insurance agency business, and other business transacted by the defendant, at Southampton aforesaid, other than such overland agency business as the defendant was in possession of at the time of making the said second agreement, from the said 22nd day of October, in the year of our Lord 1846, up to the expiration of the said term of six months, amounted to a large sum, to wit, the sum of 500*l.*, yet the defendant, not regarding his said promise, did not nor would when requested as aforesaid, or at any time afterwards, enter into such further agreement as aforesaid, but on the contrary thereof then wholly refused so to do; and the plaintiff further says, that the defendant did not nor would, though requested so to do, pay to the plaintiff 50*l.* per cent. upon the aforesaid gross profits, nor any part thereof.

The second count stated that whereas also theretofore, and at the time of making the agreement thereafter mentioned, the plaintiff had been for the space of six calendar months, and then was in the service of the defendant as clerk, and as such clerk had conducted, and was then conducting the defendant's business of a custom-house and shipping agent at Southampton, thereupon afterwards, to wit, on the 29th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1847, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, would continue in the service of him, the defendant, as clerk, to conduct his, the defendant's, business of a custom-house and shipping agent at Southampton aforesaid, for the term of two years, he, the defendant, then promised the plaintiff to continue him in such service for the said term of two years, and to pay him the annual salary of 150*l.* for the first year, and 160*l.* for the second year's service, and (with the exception of such overland agency business as the defendant was then in possession of,) also to pay to the plaintiff a sum of money equal to 50*l.* per cent. on the gross profits (without deduction for expenses, except when payments should have been actually made in reference to the business itself) on all baggage business, insurance agency business, and on all and every business whatsoever transacted by the defendant at Southampton aforesaid, during such term of two years as aforesaid, save and except only on such overland agency business as was then in the defendant's possession as aforesaid; and although the plaintiff, confiding in the said promise of the defendant, did continue in the service of him, the defendant, as clerk, upon the terms aforesaid, for a long space of time, to wit, until the 13th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1847, which had elapsed before the commencement of this suit, and although the plaintiff has always been ready and willing, and then offered to continue in the service of the defendant for the residue of the said term of two years, upon the terms aforesaid; yet the defendant, not regarding his said promise, did not nor would continue the plaintiff in the service of him, the defendant, as clerk for the said term of two years, but, on the contrary thereof, afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, and before the expiration of the said term of two years, then wholly refused so to do, and then discharged him, the plaintiff, therefrom, and hath from that time hitherto wholly neglected and refused to retain or employ the plaintiff in his said service, and by means thereof he, the plaintiff, hath lost and been deprived of all the salary, profits, and advantages which he otherwise might and would have derived and acquired from being continued in the said service of the defendant for the residue of the said term of two years, and the plaintiff hath been and is by means of the premises still wholly unemployed.

On the 8th of January 1848, an order was made, by Coltman, J., to strike out so much of the first count as refers to the first breach, at the costs of the plaintiff, on the ground that that part of the first count and the second count were for the same subject-matter.

A rule nisi having been granted to rescind that order,—

Peterson now shewed cause.—The order ought to stand. In this case there is a violation of the rule of Hilary term, 4 Will. 4, No. 5, as both counts evidently refer to the same agreement. James v. Bourne (1) may be relied upon on the other side; but in that case there were two distinct causes of action, the one on a sea risk, the other on the common law liability of carriers to take care of goods at a wharf.

Lush, in support of the rule.—In recent cases the stringency of the rule as to several counts has been relaxed. Gilbert v. Hales (2) is an example. In trover, counts for conversions before and after a bankruptcy have been allowed. Counts on a warranty of a horse, and for money had and received, have also been allowed. James v. Bourne is a decision in favour of the present application.

MAULE, J.—In that case the two counts could not be said to contain but one contract; but in the present case there might have been but one. On the whole, I think that the order of Mr. Justice Coltman was right.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. We cannot help taking notice that the two counts are for the same subject-matter, and introduced in order to avoid a difficulty with regard to the legal effect of the agreement.

1848. { COX AND ANOTHER v. GLUE.
Jan. 13, 18. { THE SAME v. SAINT.
                  { THE SAME v. MOUSLEY.

Trespass—Subsoil—Surface—Possession—“Close.”

The plaintiffs were seised in fee of a close, but other persons had the right to the exclusive possession of the surface of it during a portion of the year:—Held, that the plaintiffs, as owners of the subsoil, might maintain trespass against persons who had dug holes through the surface into the subsoil during that portion of the year:—but that for an injury committed during such portion of the year, which affected the surface only, the plaintiffs could not maintain trespass.

The word “close” in a declaration in trespass includes the subsoil as well as the surface.

These were actions of trespass, and the pleadings were the same in all of them.

The first count of the declaration stated, that the defendant, on the 10th day of October, A.D. 1846, and on divers other days, &c., with force and arms, &c. broke and entered certain soil of the plaintiffs, the said soil being the soil of and belonging to a certain close, called the Siddals, situate in the parish of St. Peter, in the county of Derby, and with feet in walking and with divers horses, mares, and geldings, and also with the wheels of divers carriages, carts, and waggons then subverted, trampled upon, tore up, damaged, and spoiled the said soil of the plaintiffs, and also then made divers, to wit, 100 holes in the said soil of the plaintiffs, and then forced divers, to wit, 100 posts, 100 tent-pegs, and 100 stakes into the said soil of the plaintiffs, and there in the said soil of the plaintiffs, then fixed the same posts, pegs, and stakes.

and then put, placed, and erected divers, to wit, ten wooden erections, ten tents, ten stalls, ten booths, and ten tables, upon, and affixed the same to the said soil of the plaintiffs, and kept and continued the said posts, tent-pegs, stakes, erections, tents, stalls, booths, and tables, so there respectively forced, fixed, put, placed, or erected and affixed as aforesaid, without the leave or licence, and against the will of the plaintiffs, for a long space of time, to wit, for the space of six hours next following the said time of the fixing, forcing, putting, placing, erecting, and affixing of the same respectively as aforesaid, and thereby and therewith, during all the time aforesaid, greatly incumbered the said soil of the plaintiffs, and hindered and prevented the plaintiffs from enjoying the same. Second count, that the defendant afterwards, on the 23rd day of October, in the year of our Lord 1845, with force and arms broke and entered a certain close of the plaintiffs, the same close being the said close called the Siddals, situated and being in the parish aforesaid, and subverted the earth and soil of the said close, and made holes and forced posts in, and affixed booths, &c. to the said close, &c. and thereby, &c.

Pleas—First, not guilty; second, to the first count, that the said soil of and belonging to the said close, &c. was not the soil of the plaintiffs, &c.; third, to the first count, that the said soil in which, &c. was at, &c. the soil and freehold of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Derby, wherefore the defendant, as their servant, broke and entered, &c.; fourth, to the second count, that the said close in which, &c. was not the close of the plaintiffs; fifth, to the second count, that the said close, &c. in which, &c. was the close, soil, and freehold of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Derby, wherefore the defendant, as their servant, broke and entered, &c.

The replication joined issue on the first, second, and fourth pleas, and traversed the third and fifth.

The causes were tried, at the Spring Assizes for Derbyshire, in 1846, before Patteson, J. and a special jury. It appeared that the close in question, called the Siddals, was within the manor of Derby, and that the plaintiffs, and those through whom they claimed, had from time immemorial taken the fore-crop of grass, and had the exclusive possession of the close from the 14th of February to the 6th of July in every year; and that from the 6th of July to the 14th of February the burgesses of the borough of Derby turned in their cows, sheep, calves, and horses upon the close, and occupied it exclusively during that period. The plaintiffs had gates, with locks, which they removed from the close on the 6th of July, and which were replaced by other gates, belonging to the burgesses, which remained there till the 14th of February. It was further proved that the corporation had been in the habit of giving permission for holding the county races on the close between the months of July and February. The races were discontinued for some years, but were revived in August 1845, when the defendants, in the actions of Cox v. Glue and Cox v. Saint, with the consent of the corporation, erected booths, the posts of which went through the surface of the close into the subsoil. The plaintiffs claimed to be seised in fee of the soil and freehold, and so entitled to maintain an action of trespass. For the defendant it was contended that the soil and freehold were in the corporation, and that the plaintiffs were only entitled to take the forecrop of grass, and, at all events, that they had not, at the time of the trespass, sufficient possession to enable them to maintain trespass. The learned Judge directed the jury (in the first action), that the soil and freehold were in the plaintiffs, and asked them to say whether the burgesses had exclusive possession from the 6th of July to the 14th of February. The jury found a verdict in these terms: "The parties in occupation respectively, namely, the Coxes, from the 14th of February to the 6th of July, and the burgesses for the remainder of the year have the power of bringing their action for trespass; but if any damage is done to the freehold, we consider the plaintiffs have sufficient possession to bring an action at any time." The facts in the case of Cox v. Saint being exactly similar to those in Cox v. Glue, a verdict for the plaintiffs with 40s. damages was entered by consent, leave being reserved to the defendant in each of those actions to move to enter a verdict in his favour on the second and fourth issues. In the case of Cox v. Mousley, it appeared that the defendant had merely gone to the races on horseback. It was agreed that the learned Judge should decide the question, whether the defendant had committed any trespass affecting the soil below the surface of the land; and his Lordship being of opinion that he had not, a verdict was entered for the defendant on the plea of not guilty as to the first count, and on the second and fourth issues, and for the plaintiffs on the other issues.

In the two first cases a rule nisi having been obtained to enter a verdict for the defendant, pursuant to the leave reserved,—

Whitehurst and Humfrey (Jan. 13), shewed cause.—The direction of the learned Judge was right. There could be no doubt that the plaintiffs were seised of the fee, and the only difficulty was, whether at the time of the trespass they had sufficient possession of the subsoil to enable them to bring trespass. The burgesses had only a "profit à prendre," and not an estate in the land. They had only a right to take the herbage by the mouths of particular cattle.

[MAULE, J.—The jury have found that the corporation had an exclusive right of possession so as to exclude the plaintiffs themselves, and that in respect of that right they could bring an action of trespass.]

If the burgesses entered for any other purpose than feeding their cattle, would not an action lie? The real question is whether, supposing the corporation to have exclusive possession of the surface, the landlord may not maintain trespass for an injury to the subsoil. It has been held in several cases that where a person has exclusive possession of a profit à prendre, it amounts only to an easement—Pitt v. Chick (1). The cases on this point are collected in the notes to Potter v. North (2).

[M. D. Hill, contra.—If the defendants had merely a profit à prendre, I admit they have no case.]

The case of The King v. Churchill (3) shews that this is only a profit à prendre. What estate do the burgesses claim? They cannot have a right to exclude the owner of the fee for all purposes. For instance, in case of a flood and damage to the close, as they are not bound nor entitled to repair, could they exclude the owner from going on the land to do so?

[MAULE, J.—If I have a field, and you have a right of way over it, have I not exclusive possession of it?]

M. D. Hill, Clarke, Serj., and Waddington, contra.—The two counts of the declaration are in effect the same. The close and the soil of the close are the same thing; and as the jury have found that the plaintiffs were not possessed of the soil of the close, they cannot retain their verdict. It is not enough that they had a partial right. If a party claims a close and proves only a right to prima vestura, the issue must be found against him—Stammers v. Dixon per Lord Ellenborough (4). The case of The King v. Churchill cited on the other side is no authority here. The decision there was, that commoners were not individually rateable to the poor in respect of their privilege to put cattle on the common; but that does not decide that the corporation might not have been rated. The case of The King v. the Mayor, &c. of Sudbury (5) was one where a corporation was rated under similar circumstances. The latter decision is in accordance with the older authorities. In Burt v. Moore (6) Lord Kenyon says, "I am perfectly satisfied, that although the defendant was restrained by the agreement to a certain mode of occupation, he is to be considered as the occupier of the land; and being entitled to the sole use of the land is also entitled to maintain trespass." So also, in Wilson v. Mackreth (7) and Hoe v. Taylor (8), cited there by Aston, J., in which latter case it was assigned for error that trespass quare clausum fregit would not lie because the soil was not granted, and the Court held that it did lie in respect of herbagium and pastura. In Lewis v. Branthwaite (9) it was held, that the tenant of mines had possession so as to maintain trespass against a party who broke through the subsoil without breaking through the surface. Lord Tenterden there says, "He who has the surface has the subsoil. It seems to me that the copyholder has possession of the subsoil, although he has no property in it."

[MAULE, J.—Lord Tenterden does not mean to say that possession of the surface and possession of the soil may not both subsist separately.]

Primá facie the possessor of the surface has the possession of the subsoil, although some one else may shew that he has property in it.

[MAULE, J.—Primá facie possession of the surface is evidence of possession of the soil; but the present argument is, that if nothing but the possession of the surface appeared, the jury should have been directed to find that the fee was in the corporation.]

In the case of Cox v. Mousley a rule nisi having been obtained to enter a verdict for the plaintiff on all the issues,—

M. D. Hill and Waddington now (Jan. 18,) shewed cause; and—

Whitehurst appeared in support of the rule.

WILDE, C.J.—With regard to the cases of Cox v. Glue and Cox v. Saint, in which it was found that the defendants were entitled to the exclusive possession of the surface, but that the plaintiffs were entitled to the subsoil, it seems to me that the ruling of the learned Judge was right. The possession of the surface may be in one person, and the possession of the subsoil in another. The question of possession is one of fact, which may have to be decided from various circumstances. It may be derived under a grant, or it may be inferred from long enjoyment, which would presume a grant. In the present cases it is found that the burgesses had the right to take the herbage by the mouths of certain cattle, and it is not found that they had any other right whatever. It was unnecessary, therefore, for the owner of the soil to part with more than the possession during the time of the enjoyment of such right. If, then, the owner can grant possession for a certain time and a certain limited enjoyment, and can at the same time retain all the right to the possession of the subsoil, what are the materials here from which to draw the conclusion that the plaintiffs have granted more than was necessary for such limited enjoyment. Here, all that the burgesses ever enjoyed was the possession for a portion of the year, and there is no fact to shew that the owner of the soil ever granted more. There is no doubt that different strata of the soil may be the subjects of different rights. It may sometimes be a question of difficulty to determine to what depth different parties may be entitled; but that difficulty does not arise here, because it must be taken that the jury have found that the holes were made to such an extent as to interfere with the subsoil which remained in the plaintiffs. What is there, then, to prevent the owner of the subsoil from bringing an action of trespass? He had both the fee and the possession,—the latter, because all that he had not granted remained in him, and there was nothing to shew that he had granted more than the herbage, reserving all other rights as full, and open to the same remedies, as if he had never made any grant at all. On the whole, therefore, I think the Judge was quite right, and taking the finding of the jury to be that the exclusive possession was in the burgesses for the purpose of enjoying the herbage, and the exclusive possession of the subsoil in the lord, it seems to me that the verdict was properly entered for the plaintiffs, and that the rule in the first two actions should be discharged. The other case of Cox v. Mousley is much more free from doubt. Trespass is an action for an interference with the possession. Here, it is expressly found that the right of possession of the surface at the time of the trespass was out of the plaintiffs, and it was therefore quite clear, that they could not maintain any such action in respect of the defendants having trampled down the surface of the field. There was no evidence of the defendant having done any injury except to the surface. The verdict, therefore, was rightly entered for the defendant, and the rule in this case also ought to be discharged.

MAULE, J.—I also am of opinion that the rules ought to be discharged. In the first two actions there was evidence to shew that the seisin in fee was in the plaintiffs, but there was also evidence on behalf of the defendants, on which it was insisted that for a portion of every year the corporation was entitled to the possession of the surface at any rate. The conclusion of the jury was, that the plaintiffs were seised in fee of the subsoil at all events, and that the corporation was entitled to the exclusive possession of the surface for a particular portion of the year.

The learned Judge at the trial directed that under these circumstances a verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs, and decided, as it appears to me, that if a person is entitled to the subsoil, and another person digs holes in that soil, the former is entitled to a verdict on a count stating that the defendant broke and entered the close of the plaintiffs. The description "close" was sufficient to include the subsoil as well as the surface; and in an action of tort, generally speaking, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict if he prove a part only of the tort alleged. Here then, as the plaintiff had the exclusive possession of the subsoil he was entitled to recover in trespass, although the corporation had the right of possession of the surface. The case of Cox v. Mousley is very clear. The question raised there is, whether the plaintiffs can maintain trespass against the defendants for simply riding on the surface which is in the possession of other persons. The terms of the finding are quite clear to shew that the exclusive possession of the surface was in other persons, and that the plaintiffs themselves might be excluded. The plaintiffs, therefore, could not maintain trespass under those circumstances.

CRESSWELL, J.—In Cox v. Glue and Cox v. Saint the substantial question was, whether the jury were warranted in finding that the plaintiffs were in possession of the subsoil. It is true that the Judge seems to have led the jury to that conclusion; but there appeared quite evidence enough to support that finding. The jury also found that the trespass committed was a trespass to the subsoil, and therefore, the plaintiffs were clearly entitled to maintain the action. As to the only other question, namely, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the present declaration, I entirely agree with my Brother Maule that the declaration is sufficient. With respect to Cox v. Mousley there seems to me to be no doubt at all, the jury having found that the plaintiff was not in possession of the surface at the time when the trespass was committed.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first two cases a question is raised as to the nature of the estate of the burgesses in the land, and it seems to me it must be taken to be equivalent to the right to prima vestura, or prima tonsura. That being so, the question is, whether the owner of the soil may not bring an action for the digging of holes into the subsoil. I think he clearly can, and the only action he can maintain for such an injury is trespass quare clausum fregit. As to the other case there can be no doubt, and I agree with the Court that the rules ought to be discharged.

1848. } PILBROW v. PILBROW'S ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY AND Jan. 19, 21. } CANAL PROPULSION COMPANY.

Pleading—Deed—Covenant—Company; Incorporation of, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.—Issue—Matter of Law.

The first count stated that by a deed made between the plaintiff and the defendants, who were described as a "company registered and incorporated after a deed of settlement had been executed under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110," the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff 15,000*l.* as soon as conveniently could be out of the money raised by the first calls or instalments on the shares of the company. Breach—That although divers instalments were paid, out of which the company might have paid the money, they had not done so. The second count set out articles of agreement stating that the plaintiff had sold his patents to the company, and contained a covenant that the company should pay him 15,000*l.* in cash as soon as conveniently could be done out of the money raised on the first instalments or calls on the shares. Breach—That though the company could have raised the money, and a reasonable and convenient time for paying it had elapsed, yet they had not paid the plaintiff.

3rd plea to the first count—That the deed of settlement was obtained by the fraud of the plaintiff.

4th plea to the first count—That the registry and incorporation were obtained by fraud.

8th and 18th pleas—That the company was formed under a deed of settlement in which the plaintiff was a party, by which it was agreed that the plaintiff was to be paid out of the first instalments after paying the necessary expenses of the company, and that no instalments, &c. had been received sufficient to pay the expenses and the 15,000*l*.

21st plea—That the company was not incorporated by charter or act of parliament, nor was the same "duly and lawfully" registered and incorporated.

22nd—That at the time when the company obtained a certificate of complete registration, the company was not formed by deed or writing under the hands and seals of the shareholders as required by the statute:—

Held, that the 2nd count was good on general demurrer, and the breach properly assigned; that the 3rd, 4th, 8th and 18th pleas were bad on demurrer; that the 21st plea was bad, because the defendants were estopped from denying the fact of incorporation, and if that fact was not in issue, then the plea was bad because it raised a question of law; that the 22nd plea was bad for similar reasons.

Covenant. The first count of the declaration stated that, theretofore, to wit, on the 11th of June A.D. 1845, by a certain deed then made between the plaintiff of the one part, and the said company therein described as registered and incorporated in pursuance of an act of parliament made and passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled, "An act for the registration, incorporation, and regulation of joint-stock companies," of the other part, which said deed was then sealed with the seal of the said company, and was then signed by three of the directors of the said company, to wit, the Right Hon. Arthur Algernon, Earl of Essex, George Buckley Bolton, and Francis John Lambert, reciting that her present Majesty Queen Victoria, by letters patent, under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom, bearing date the 17th of May 1844, granted unto the plaintiff, his executors, administrators and assigns, the sole and exclusive licence, power, privilege and authority of making, using, and vending for the term of fourteen years an invention in "certain improvements in the machinery for a new method of propelling carriages on railways and common roads, and vessels on rivers and canals within England and Wales, and Berwick-upon-Tweed;" and that in pursuance of a proviso contained in the said letters patent, a specification of the said invention was duly in-rolled by the plaintiff in her Majesty's High Court of Chancery, on the 16th of November 1844, and that by letters patent under the seal appointed by the treaty of union to be kept and used in Scotland instead of the Great Seal thereof, bearing date the 13th of November 1844, the like exclusive privileges in respect of the use of the said invention were granted to the said plaintiff, his executors, administrators and assigns, to be enjoyed and exercised by him and them within Scotland, and that by letters patent under the Great Seal of Ireland, bearing date the 16th of January 1845, the like privileges in respect of the use of the said invention were granted to the said plaintiff, his executors, administrators and assigns, to be enjoyed and exercised by him and them within Ireland; and that in pursuance of provisoes respectively contained in the said several letters patent for Scotland and Ireland, specifications of the said inventions had been or were intended to be forthwith duly made and inrolled by the plaintiff; and further reciting that the said company had been duly formed under a deed of settlement, bearing date the 22nd of May then last past, for among other things the working of the said several patents for the United Kingdom, and the said company had been registered and incorporated under the provisions of the aforesaid act, and the capital of the same consisted of 600,000*l*. divided into 60,000 shares of 10*l*. each; and further reciting that it had been agreed between the plaintiff and the said company that the plaintiff should grant to the said company a licence for the exclusive use of the said several patents for the United Kingdom, during the remainder of the several terms of years of such patents respectively in manner thereafter mentioned, and should also enter into such covenants as were thereafter contained for granting to the said company licence to use and practise all other improvements in the invention aforesaid, which should be made or invented by the plaintiff, and whether the plaintiff should obtain a patent or patents for such inventions or not; and that in consideration of such grant and covenant the sum of 15,000*l*. in cash should be paid to the plaintiff, so soon as conveniently could be after the execution of these presents, out of the money raised by the first instalments or calls on the shares of the said company, —it was witnessed, that in pursuance of the said agreement in that behalf, and in consideration of the premises, the plaintiff did thereby give and grant unto the said company and their successors full and freeliberty, licence, power, privilege, and authority to use, exercise, and put in practice the said patent invention throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland during all the remainders then to come and unexpired of the respective terms of years granted by the said respective patents for England, Scotland, and Ireland, for their use and benefit; and the said company, for themselves and their successors, did thereby covenant with the plaintiff, his executors and administrators, that they the said company, or their successors, should and would pay, or cause to be paid, to the plaintiff the said purchase-money of 15,000*l.* out of the money raised by the first instalments or calls on the shares of the said company, as aforesaid, as by the said deed, reference being thereunto had, will, among other things, more fully appear; and the plaintiff says, that although he hath at all times since the making of the said deed, performed and fulfilled all things therein contained on his part and behalf to be performed and fulfilled, and although divers instalments or calls on the shares of the said company were, before the commencement of this suit (to wit) on the 1st day of July, A.D. 1845, paid to the said company, out of which the said company might and ought to have paid the said sum of 15,000*l.*, and the said company, in part performance of their said covenant, have paid to the plaintiff a small part thereof, to wit, 1,000*l.*, and although a convenient and reasonable time for the payment of the residue of the said sum of 15,000*l.*, since the making of the said deed and since the payment of the said instalments or calls to the said company had elapsed before the commencement of this suit, yet the said company, not regarding their said covenant, have not paid the said residue of the sum of 15,000*l.*, or any part thereof, but have hitherto wholly refused and still do refuse to pay the same or any part thereof.

Second count—that whereas also afterwards, to wit, on the 12th day of June, A.D. 1845, by certain articles of agreement in writing then made between the plaintiff of the one part, and the said company therein described as registered and incorporated in pursuance of an act of parliament made and passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of her Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled, 'An act for the registration, incorporation, and regulation of joint-stock companies,' of the other part, which articles were then sealed with the seal of the said company, and were then signed by three of the directors of the said company, the said Earl of Essex, George Buckley Bolton, and Francis John Lambert, reciting that her present Majesty, Queen Victoria, by letters patent, &c., granted unto the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the sole and exclusive licence, power, privilege and authority of making, using, and vending for the term of fourteen years an invention, &c., within England and Wales, and Berwick upon-Tweed; and that, in pursuance of a proviso contained in the said letters patent, a specification of the said invention was duly inrolled by the plaintiff in her Majesty's High Court of Chancery, on the 16th day of November 1844; and that, by letters patent under, &c., bearing date, &c., the like exclusive privileges in respect of the use of the said invention were granted to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators and assigns to be enjoyed and exercised by him and them within Scotland; and that by letters patent, &c., the like privileges in respect of the use of the said invention were granted to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to be enjoyed and exercised by him and them within Ireland; and that in pursuance of provisoes respectively contained in the said several letters patent for Scotland and Ireland, specifications of the said inventions had been or were intended to be forthwith duly made and inrolled by the plaintiff; and further reciting that the said company had been duly formed under a deed of settlement, bearing date the 22nd day of May then last past, for the purchase and working of the said several patents for the United Kingdom, and any other patents which could or might be obtained for the invention aforesaid, in any foreign country, place, or kingdom, and for the granting licences for the use of all such patents at home and abroad; and the said company had been registered and incorporated under the provisions of the aforesaid act, and the capital of the same consisted of 600,000*l.* divided into 60,000 shares of 10*l.* each; and further reciting that the plaintiff had offered to sell absolutely to the said company the said several patents for the United Kingdom, and the benefit and advantage of the same respectively, free from incumbrances, at or for the price or sum of 15,000*l.* in cash, and 4,500 shares in the said company, upon each of which shares the full sum of 10*l.* was to be considered as paid up, and the said company were willing to purchase such patents upon the terms aforesaid, so soon as the same could by law be effected and an act of parliament should have been obtained authorizing the said purchase by the company; and that in the mean time, and until such act of parliament could be obtained, it had been proposed that the plaintiff should grant to the said company a licence for the exclusive use of the said several patents during the remainder of the several terms of years of such patents respectively, which had been done by an indenture of licence, bearing date and duly executed the day before the date of the said agreement; and further reciting that the plaintiff and the said company were desirous of entering into such agreement, in respect of the premises, as was thereafter contained,—it was witnessed that for effectuating the said desire, it was thereby agreed and declared between and by the parties to those presents, and the plaintiff did for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators (but so far only as the covenants and agreements thereafter contained, were to be observed or performed by or were applicable to the plaintiff or his heirs, executors, or administrators), thereby covenant with the said company and their successors, and the said company did, for themselves and their successors (but so far only as the covenants and agreements thereafter contained were to be observed or performed by or were applicable to them or their successors), covenant with the plaintiff, his executors and administrators in manner following; that is to say, that whensoever the said company or their successors should apply for an act of parliament to enable them to purchase and take a conveyance of the said several letters patent for the United Kingdom, then the plaintiff, his executors or administrators, should and would upon the request of the said company or their successors, and whether such application to parliament should be made in the next session thereof, or at any time thereafter, join and concur with the said company or their successors in the said application, and sign the petition for the said intended act, and testify his consent thereto, and to all such other acts and deeds for facilitating and promoting the success of such application and assisting the said company and their successors therein, and procuring the said intended act to be passed into a law, as by the said company and their successors, or their counsel in the law, should be advised or desired and required, and should and would immediately after the said intended act should be passed, and so soon as the same could or might lawfully be done, convey, and assure the said several patents for the United Kingdom unto the said company and their successors; or at the option of the said company, the said patents might, without any further consent of the plaintiff, his executors or administrators, be vested by the said act, in the said company and their successors, for their absolute use and benefit, and that the sum of 15,000*l.* in cash should be paid to the plaintiff as soon as conveniently could be done, after the execution of the said articles, out of the money raised by the first instalments or calls on the shares in the said company, as by the said articles, reference being thereunto had, will (among other things) more fully appear. Breach, that although the plaintiff hath at all times, since the making of the said articles, performed and fulfilled all things therein contained on his part and behalf to be performed and fulfilled, and although the said company, within a convenient and reasonable time after the execution of the said articles of agreement (to wit), on the 1st day of September, A.D. 1845, *could and might by calls and instalments on the shares of the said company have raised the said last-mentioned sum of 15,000*l., and a convenient and reasonable time for raising the said money, and paying the same in cash to the plaintiff, from and after the execution of the said articles of agreement had elapsed long before the commencement of this suit, and although the said company have, in part performance of their last-mentioned covenant, paid to the plaintiff a small part of the last-mentioned sum of 15,000*l.* (to wit), 1,000*l.*, yet the said company, not regarding their last-mentioned covenant, have not paid the residue of the said last-mentioned sum of 15,000*l.*, or any part thereof, but have hitherto wholly refused, and still do refuse to pay the same or any part thereof, &c.

Pleas—Third, to the first count, that the said deed of settlement in that count mentioned and referred to, was obtained by the fraud, covin and misrepresentation of the plaintiff and others in collusion with him. Verification. Fourth, to the first count, that the registry and incorporation of the said company, recited in the said deed in that count mentioned, were obtained by the fraud, covin, and misrepresentation of the plaintiff and others in collusion with him. Verification. Eighth, to the first count, that the said company was formed by and under a certain deed of settlement in the said first count mentioned and referred to, and that such deed of settlement bears date (to wit) the 22nd day of May, in the year of our Lord 1845, and was and is made between the several persons whose names are thereunto subscribed, and whose seals are thereunto affixed, and one of which said persons was and is the said plaintiff of the first part, the Right Hon. Arthur Algernon, Earl of Essex, and George Buckley Bolton of the second part, and Francis John Lambert of the third part, (profert); and that thereby, after reciting as therein is recited, each of them the said parties whose names and seals were thereunto respectively set and affixed, save only the parties thereto of the second part, did for himself and herself, and his and her heirs, executors, and administrators respectively, and as to and concerning only the acts, deeds, and defaults of himself and herself respectively, and his and her heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant, declare and agree with and to the said parties thereto of the second part, as trustees on behalf of the said company in manner expressed, among others, in the several clauses thereafter and hereinafter contained, that is to say, that a capital of 600,000*l.* be raised by the issue of 60,000 shares of 10*l.* each;

that the directors might proceed and carry on the business of the said company although all the said 60,000 shares had not been subscribed for; that to carry on the business of the company it should be lawful for the directors from time to time as they might deem expedient, to make such call or calls on the shareholders for the payment of such instalment on their shares in the capital of the company, beyond any call or calls then already paid, as the directors should from time to time think necessary, until the whole thereof should be paid, and which instalment or instalments each and every of the parties thereto, his executors and administrators should duly pay accordingly; provided, nevertheless, no more than 1*l.* per share should be called for at any one time, and that after any calls should have been made, twenty-one days at least should elapse before any further calls should be made; that none of the shareholders in the said company should in any way interfere or intermeddle in the affairs or concerns thereof, except so far as they might be authorized so to do by virtue of the said deed of settlement; that the directors should as soon as conveniently could be after the complete registration of the said company cause to be satisfied out of the funds of the said company all the costs, charges, and demands upon the said company for business already done on account of the said company, and which on the day of the date of the said deed of settlement should remain unsatisfied, including the costs and charges incidental to the formation of the said company, and the costs and expenses of and relating to the preparing and executing the said deed, and should also pay or cause to be paid to the plaintiff with and out of the money received from the first calls on the shares of the said company, after providing thereout a sufficiency to meet the necessary expenses of the said company, the said sum of 15,000*l.* in cash. Averment, that from the time of the execution of the said deed of settlement hitherto, no calls or instalments on the shares of the said company have been raised, or paid to, or received by the said company, or by any persons on their account, sufficient to satisfy the necessary expenses of the said company, according to the true intent and meaning of the said deed and the said sum of 15,000*l.*, or any part thereof. Verification. Eighteenth plea, a similar plea to the second count. Twenty-first plea, that the said company was not incorporated by any charter or act of parliament, nor was the same duly and lawfully registered and incorporated according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and in the said deed and articles of agreement respectively mentioned, at the respective times of the making of the said deed and articles of agreement in the declaration mentioned or either of them. Verification. Twenty-second plea, that the said company was a company requiring a certificate of complete registration within the true intent and meaning of the said act of parliament in the declaration firstly above mentioned, and that at the time of the obtaining a certificate of complete registration by the said company, the said company was not formed by a deed or writing under the hands and seals of the shareholders therein, or any of them, in pursuance of the provisions of the statute in such case made and provided, and in the said declaration firstly above mentioned, nor was there at any time any such deed of settlement of the said company as is required by the said statute. Verification.

General demurrer to the third and fourth pleas.

Replication to the eighth plea, de injuriâ.

Special demurrer to the eighteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-second pleas.

Special demurrer to the replication to the eighth plea.

F. Robinson (Jan. 19), for the plaintiff.—The third and fourth pleas, which allege that the deed of settlement and the registration and incorporation of the company were obtained by fraud, are bad. They do not shew on whom the fraud was practised; and in order to make them good answers to the declaration it would be requisite to shew that because the plaintiff was implicated with others in fraudulently procuring the deed and the registration and incorporation of the company, the contract declared on, which the company entered into subsequently and for a good consideration, was invalid. [He was then stopped on those pleas.]

As to the eighth and eighteenth pleas, these pleas set out certain stipulations contained in the deed of settlement, to which the plaintiff was a party, and state that no calls have been raised since the execution of the deed sufficient to satisfy the necessary expenses of the company and the said sum of 15,000*l.* The deed on which the plaintiff has declared cannot be controuled by the antecedent deed of settlement. That principle is recognized in Patmore v. Colburn (1). The pleas state only that no sufficient money has been raised since the execution of the deed. Money might have been raised before, and might at that time have been in the hands of the company's bankers.

As to the twenty-first and twenty-second pleas, the twenty-first plea alleges that the company was not incorporated by any charter or act of parliament or duly and lawfully registered or incorporated according to the statute. It is confined to the time of the making of the deed and the agreement. There are various objections to it. One of them is decisive. The plea is not one of "nul tiel corporation" as it ought to have been been, but traverses certain special means of incorporation. For all that appears, the corporation might be a foreign one; which would be recognized in this country, as in the cases of The Dutch West India Company v. Van Moses (2), and The National Bank of St. Charles v. De Bernales (3). The plea does not shew that the registration was defective. It alleges that the company was "not duly and lawfully registered," which is a conclusion of law. It should either simply have denied the registration, or have shewn how it was insufficient—Hume v. Liveredge (4), Webb v. James (5), Ransford v. Copeland (6). The defendants seem to insist that a mistake in the registration avoids the incorporation. It is the duty of the registering officer to see that the proper steps mentioned in the statute have been taken before granting a certificate of complete registration. Besides, an irregular-city in the registration would not avoid the incorporation. An act of a public officer may be good though done irregularly. In The Margate Pier Company v. Hannam (7), where goods were seized under the warrant of a Justice of the Peace who had not taken the proper oaths, it was held that the distress was not void so as to make the parties levying it trespassers. Cook v. Henson (8) recognizes the same doctrine. Again, the defendants are estopped from taking this objection, because the deed in question, to which they are parties, expressly recites that the company had been registered and incorporated—Bowman v. Taylor (9), Hill v. the Manchester and Salford Water-works (10). The twenty-second plea states that there was no deed of settlement at the time of the certificate of complete registration, or at all. The defendants therefore say that they are not now a corporation, which they are estopped from doing, as they have been sued, and are now in court as a corporation—Bro. Abr. p. 28, pl. 'Corporation of the Lombards of London.'

Bovill, contra (Jan. 21).—As to the third and fourth pleas, without the deed of settlement there could not have been any incorporation under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 7, nor could any deed have been made on which the plaintiff could sue, nor any fund been raised out of which he could be paid. It was impossible to allege that this deed had been obtained from the defendants, because they did not then exist. At all events, the difficulty arising on the third plea as to the parties from whom the deed was obtained, does not apply to the fourth.

[WILDE, C.J.—The company are parties to the fraud, and they now wish to get rid of the deed.]

[MAULE, J.—Your argument is, that the deed and the registration and incorporation founded on it are void. But a deed is not void because it has been obtained by fraud. The party upon whom the fraud has been practised may treat it as void or not, but the party committing the fraud is bound by it.]

(10) 2 B. & Ad. 544.

As to the eighth and eighteenth pleas, the deed of settlement contained a stipulation to pay out of a particular fund. The calls could be raised only by means of that deed; and there is no doubt from the reference contained in the second deed that it was executed for the purpose of carrying out the former one.

[WILDE, C.J.—The second deed might be intended to modify the first, and the second amounts to an undertaking that the calls shall be sufficient to pay the 15,000*l.*]

As to the twenty-first plea, it is said that the parties are estopped by the recital in the deed; but the recital and the allegation in the plea are not quite the same. The plea introduces the words "duly and lawfully," and to create the estoppel strictly the plea and the recital ought to agree substantially. It has been argued that the plea does not shew that this was not a corporation by foreign law, but the recital in the deed states that it was a corporation by act of parliament, and the plea denies that it was such a corporation.

[CRESSWELL, J.—You profess in the plea to deny that there was any sort of incorporation, whether by statute or otherwise, and Mr. Robinson argues that you do not do what you profess.]

The next question is, whether the words "duly and lawfully" were properly introduced into the plea. In the case of Hume v. Liversedge the plea was that there was no proper affidavit. That was too general. Other cases were cited on this point, and the objection in them seems to have been on the ground of too great generality in form. In the case of a specification it would surely be a good plea to say that it was not "duly" inrolled; so in the case of an annuity, that a memorial was not "duly" inrolled.

[WILLIAMS, J.—I understand the argument on the other side to be founded not so much on the question of generality, as on the ground that the issue attempted to be raised refers a matter of law to the jury.]

In the instances of a specification and of a memorial there is matter of law left to the jury. In almost every issue there is matter of law involved which requires the direction of the Judge. In Muntz v. Foster (11) the declaration, which was for infringing a patent, stated the inrolment of the specification; and the plea set out a further specification and the inrolment of it, and stated that there was no other, and that thereby the former specification had become void. The argument for the plaintiff was, that this was an argumentative denial that the specification had been duly inrolled. Maule, J. said, "Suppose the declaration to have set out a good specification, and to have averred that the plaintiff had caused the same to be duly inrolled, and the plea to have set forth another specification, and to have alleged that the defendant had inrolled the latter and no other, would not the plea clearly have been bad?" It would seem, therefore, that "not duly inrolled" is the proper plea in such a case. The most ordinary case of a traverse analogous to the present is in actions on bills of exchange, where the common form is that the defendant had not "due notice."

[CRESSWELL, J.—That does not at all advance your case. To make it analogous, you must suppose the averment in the declaration to be one of "notice" only, and that in the plea one of "no due notice."]

[MAULE, J.—Your argument seems to be, that because issues of fact may involve matter of law, therefore you may plead matter of law.]

The statement in the plea is an allegation of fact; and if the traverse had been simple, the same points would have been raised.

[MAULE, J.—The construction of your plea is this, that there was a registration, but that it was not a due registration. Now that is matter of law only.]

At all events, the second count of the declaration is bad. The breach is, that though the company could have raised sufficient money by calls or instalments on the shares, to pay the 15,000*l.* in cash to the plaintiff, they did not pay him that sum. Now, the second deed contains no distinct independent covenant to pay the money, but only shews that there being a probability of a certain fund existing, the plaintiff was to be paid out of that fund when raised. The raising of the money is a condition precedent to the payment—Pontet v. the Basingstoke Canal Company (12).

(12) 3 Bing. N.C. 433; s.c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 177.

[MAULE, J.—The words in the covenant are not "money to be raised," but "money raised."]

No covenant to raise sufficient funds can be implied from the deed. The most recent cases as to the implication of covenants are Aspdin v. Austin (13), Dunn v. Sayles (14), Gwillim v. Daniel (15), and Quarrington v. Arthur (16). The principle to be derived from these cases is, that where any covenants are expressed, none are to be implied. In actions on policies of insurance, in which the directors stipulate to pay out of the funds of the company, the declaration always alleges the sufficiency of the funds—Andrews v. Ellison (17). The deed does not shew that the company had even the power to raise the money. And the declaration should have distinctly shewn how the duty to raise the money had arisen—Max v. Roberts (18).

F. Robinson, in reply.—As to the twenty-first and twenty-second pleas there is a conclusive answer. It is assumed, in the first place, that if there were informalities in the registration there was no corporation under the act; but the 25th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. constitutes the company a corporation on its complete registration. Although the registrar may not have been right in giving the certificate of registration, yet quod fieri non debet factum valet. The cases cited as to putting allegations involving matter of law in issue are clearly distinguishable from the present. Here, the question of law is distinctly put in issue. The only real point which remains is, whether the second count of the declaration puts the true construction on the deed. This construction is consistent with the evident and reasonable intention of the parties. There is no necessity for cases on the point. In Pontet v. the Basingstoke Canal Company, the party claiming from the company relied on a particular security, and in Andrews v. Ellison on a particular fund. The cases of Aspdin v. Austin and Dunn v. Sayles were decided expressly on the intention of the parties. The Court always looks to the intention of the parties. In Otway v. Holdips (19) it was held that where the condition of a bond was to pay as soon as a bill of costs should have been stated by two attorneys to be chosen by the parties, a refusal to appoint one was a forfeiture. In The Duke of St. Albans v. Ellis (20), where a lessee covenanted to plough all, &c., except a rabbit warren, he was held liable in covenant for ploughing the rabbit warren. In Lord Shrewsbury v. Gould (21) there was a covenant by the lessee at all seasons of burning lime to supply the lessor and his tenants with lime for improvements at a stipulated price, and it was held that there was an implied covenant to burn at such seasons. It is said that the second count does not shew a duty or breach of duty. The duty declared on is to pay the money, not to raise the fund, and that is very distinctly stated.

WILDE, C.J.—I think that the objection to the declaration in this case cannot be upheld, and that the pleas referred to are bad. The second count, which is the part of the declaration said to be bad, sets out articles of agreement, stating that the plaintiff had offered to sell to the company his patents and inventions, and that this contract was to be executed when an act had passed, which would make the sale legal; but in the mean time that an exclusive licence was to be granted by the plaintiff to the defendants, which had accordingly been done, so that the plaintiff had parted with all his beneficial interest in his patents, and the defendants had received all that they were ever to receive as the consideration for a certain sum of money. The agreement proceeded to set forth a covenant that the sum of 15,000*l.* in cash should be paid to the plaintiff as soon as conveniently could be done out of the money raised on the first instalments or calls on the shares of the said company. A question is made as to the effect of that covenant,—whether it is to be construed as absolutely binding the company to pay the 15,000*l.* at all events, or whether it is subject to the condition of the money being raised, and creates a liability in that event only. By the deed, which is set out in the second count, it appears that the plaintiff had done all that he had to do. The words of the covenant are to the effect that the company will pay out of the money raised. Does that mean the money to be raised or already raised? It will be observed that the expression used is consistent with the fact of the money being actually in hand; and there is an entire absence of matters which would have been inserted in the agreement, if the money had not been raised? If that had been the case, would not the agreement have shewn by whom and how and whence the money was to be raised? It appears to me that the absence of every circumstance that was necessary to secure to the plaintiff his payment according to the agreement, is very strong evidence to shew that to be the true construction; and there is nothing in the agreement to controul it, for it does not follow, because money was to be raised afterwards by calls, that none had been raised before. But supposing this was a covenant by the company to pay out of money to be raised, how does the case in 2 Mod. apply? That was an obligation to pay money on a bill of costs being stated by two persons chosen by the parties, and though no bill was stated, the refusal of one party to appoint an arbitrator was held a forfeiture, making the money payable. It seems, indeed, as if the plaintiff, being uncertain what construction would be put on the deed, introduced this averment to shew that the money had become payable at all events. Collecting the intention of the parties from the contents of the agreement, I think this was an absolute covenant, on the part of the company, to pay out of the money which they had raised, or, at all events, which they ought to have raised. As to the pleas, all but the twenty-first and twenty-second, were disposed of during the discussion. The twenty-first plea states that the company was not incorporated by charter or act of parliament, or duly registered according to the form of the statute. It appears to me that the answers to the argument in support of each plea are complete. The declaration states that the company was registered and incorporated according to the act, and the plea is, that it was not duly and lawfully registered and incorporated. For the plaintiff it is said, that if this plea denies the registration and incorporation, the defendants are estopped from making that defence; and, in order to get rid of the estoppel, it is said, on the other side, that the plea does not mean to deny the facts of registration and incorporation, but that they were duly and lawfully done. If that be so, the intention was to raise matter of law, and so the plea is bad in form. I think these are the correct answers. Many cases were cited of facts put in issue, which involved matter of law, but no authority could be cited to shew that matter of law alone can be put in issue. The same objection applies to the twenty-second plea. It is also very ambiguous whether the plea meant to deny the fact of registration, or some one of the many things required by the act previous to registration. Therefore the judgment must be for the plaintiff.

(19) 2 Mod. 266.

MAULE, J.—I also think that the plaintiff should have judgment. The second count in effect states the sale by the plaintiff to the defendant for 15,000*l.*; and then there is the covenant in question, which it is insisted is not accompanied by a covenant to raise money. I do not think there is such a covenant. But no breach of duty to the plaintiff would have arisen, though the company had not made the calls, if they had paid the plaintiff the money. The impression on my mind is, that the true sense of the declaration is, that there was a simple covenant to pay, and that it points out a fund from which the money is to be paid, but that it does not make the raising of the fund a condition precedent to the payment. A covenant to pay by a banker's acceptance would not be a covenant to obtain a banker's acceptance. The highest this covenant can be put at is, that it is a covenant to pay, provided the company shall be in receipt of money in respect of calls sufficient to pay the 15,000*l.*; and then the case of Otway v. Holdips is an authority to shew that it is enough to aver that the defendants could have raised the money if they had thought fit. The 21st and 22nd pleas are so bad that they seem to have no goodness in them. I entirely concur in what has been said against them by the Lord Chief Justice; and the main ground is, that the one expressly, and the other impliedly, admits that the company had obtained a certificate of complete registration, and that the act of parliament puts that certificate in the same position as a patent incorporating the company. Whether the corporation is by prerogative or by the legislature, there is equally an exercise of creative power. In the present case, there are certain things to be done to guard against the undue issuing of a certificate; but on the issuing of the certificate, the company becomes indisputably a corporation. The pleas are defective in substance for not shewing anything to controvert the effect of the certificate.

CRESSWELL, J.—The question on the declaration is the simplest possible. There is a certain sum of money to be paid out of the calls. The money is not paid at all. The company may please themselves about raising money on the calls; but at all events, they were bound to pay as soon as conveniently might be, and surely a convenient time has elapsed, when they might have raised the money, and have not done so.

Greenwood, for the defendant, applied for a rule nisi to change the venue from London to Devon.—The affidavit alleges special grounds for the motion, viz. that nearly all the witnesses on both sides reside in Devon, and that the expenses will be extravagantly increased by trying the cause in London. The pleadings have not as yet proceeded farther than the delivery of the pleas, but as the Court cannot fail to see, on looking at the pleadings which are annexed to the affidavits, what the issues will be, this motion will be granted—Dowler v. Collis (1), and Cotterill v. Dixon (2).

Per Curiam.—The rule is, that this motion cannot be made till after issue joined. The reason for it is a good one, for no person can tell what witnesses will be required till the issues to be tried are known. When the pleadings are incomplete, how can a defendant undertake to inform us where the witnesses reside? And how can he expect the Court to act upon such information? This application is manifestly premature.

Prescription — Pleading — Traverse — Duplicity.

Case by reversioner for digging and widening a channel. Plea, that H. and previous occupiers of G. Mill as such occupiers had for twenty years enjoyed a watercourse, and had for twenty years as such occupiers of right scoured and widened the channel as often as was required. Replication, traversing the enjoyment of the watercourse and the scouring and widening of right for twenty years.

On special demurrer, the replication was held good, the quasi prescription in the plea not being severable.

Semhle—That the plea would have been bad if it had stated the right to scour and widen, without shewing for what purpose it was enjoyed.

Case. The last count of the declaration stated that N. D. was possessed of certain closes as tenant to the plaintiff, the reversion thereof belonging to the plaintiff; and that the defendant dug, excavated and widened a certain channel or leat in and through the said closes, thereby injuring the plaintiff's reversionary interest.

Ninth plea to the last count—That before and at the several times of the committing of the alleged grievances in that count mentioned, William Higman was and still is the occupier of a certain close and tenement called Gimble Mill, near to the said closes, in the said last count mentioned; and that the channel or leat in that count mentioned had been, and was during all the time in this plea mentioned connected with a like channel or leat leading from the said channel or leat in the said last count mentioned, unto, into and through other closes beyond the said closes in the said last count mentioned, and lower down the stream hereinafter mentioned, and thence unto, into and through the said closes and tenement called Gimble Mill, and thence unto, into and through other closes farther down the stream of water hereinafter mentioned, and beyond the last-mentioned close and tenement, and which last-mentioned channel or leat so connected with such first-mentioned channel or leat during all the time in this plea mentioned remained and were one connected channel or leat. And the defendant further saith, that the water from time to time being and flowing in and along the said channel or leat, in the said last count mentioned, hath run and flowed, and hath been used and accustomed to run and flow, and of right ought to have run and flowed, for the full period of twenty years next before the commencement of this suit, and still of right ought to run and flow without interruption, and as of right, into, through, over and along the said several closes and tenements, and in and along the said one connected channel or leat hereinbefore mentioned, from certain other closes beyond the said closes in the last count mentioned, and higher up the stream of the said water unto, into and through the said channel or leat in other closes beyond the said closes and tenements in the said last count mentioned, and lower down the said stream, and thence unto, into and through the said channel or leat in the said close and tenement called Gimble Mill aforesaid, and thence to other closes and tenements beyond that close and tenement and lower down the said stream. And the defendant further saith, that the said W. Higman, whilst such occupier as aforesaid, and all other prior occupiers for the time being of the said close and tenement called Gimble Mill have, and each of them hath, as of right, and without interruption for the full period of twenty years next before the commencement of this suit, had, used and actually enjoyed, and have been used and accustomed to have and use and actually enjoy as of right and without interruption, and of right ought to have had, used, and actually enjoyed as of right and without interruption, and the said W. Higman at the said several times when, &c. of right ought to have had, and used and actually enjoyed as of right and without interruption, and still of right ought to have and use, and actually enjoy as of right and without interruption for himself and themselves, whilst occupiers of his said close and tenement called Gimble Mill, a stream and watercourse, and the water thereof flowing in, through, along, and over the said several closes and tenement, and in and along the said one connected channel or leat herein-before mentioned, for the purpose of supplying the said close and tenement called Gimble Mill with water, and for the benefit and advantage of the occupiers of the same close and tenement, and for mining and other useful purposes therein as to the same close and tenement belonging and appertaining. And the defendant further saith, that the said W. Higman, whilst such occupier as aforesaid, and all other prior occupiers for the time being of the same close and tenement called Gimble Mill, have and each of them hath as of right and without interruption for the full period of twenty years next before the commencement of this suit so scoured and amended, and have been used and accustomed as of right and without interruption, and ought as of right and without interruption to scour and amend, and the said W. Higman at the said several times when, &c. as of right and without interruption ought, and still as of right and without interruption ought himself and themselves with his and their servants and agents, whilst occupiers of the same close and tenement called Gimble Mill, to scour and amend, the said stream and watercourse, channel or leat in the said last count mentioned, when and as often as the same required and requires scouring and amending, as to his said close and tenement called Gimble Mill belonging and appertaining. And the defendant further saith, that the said stream and watercourse, channel or leat in the said last count mentioned, being before and at the said several times when, &c. foul, choked up, miry, and out of repair, and then requiring to be scoured and amended, the defendant as the servant of the said W. Higman, and by his command, at the said several times when, &c., being reasonable times in that behalf, scoured and amended the said stream and watercourse, channel or leat, and in so doing, at the said several times when, &c., did necessarily and unavoidably on the occasion aforesaid, and for the purpose of scouring and amending the same stream and watercourse, channel or leat, and because the same could not otherwise have been scoured and amended, a little dig, excavate and widen the said channel or leat in the said last count mentioned, doing no more damage to the reversion of the plaintiff in the last count mentioned, on the occasion aforesaid, than was necessary and unavoidable for the purpose aforesaid, and without digging, excavating, or widening the same channel or leat beyond the proper size and dimension thereof during the time aforesaid, or more or otherwise than the same had during all the time aforesaid been, and been used and accustomed to be dug, excavated and widened when the same and the said stream and watercourse required scouring and amending, and were scoured and amended as aforesaid during the time aforesaid, which are the same alleged grievances in the said last count mentioned. Verification.

Replication to the ninth plea, that the said W. Higman, whilst such occupier as in the said ninth plea alleged, and the prior occupiers for the time being of the said close and tenement called Gimble Mill, have not, as of right and without interruption for the full period of twenty years next before the commencement of this suit, had, used and actually enjoyed, nor been used and accustomed to have and use and actually enjoy as of right and without interruption, nor of right ought the said W. Higman, at the said several times when, &c., or any of them, to have had and used and actually enjoyed, as of right and without interruption, for himself and themselves, whilst occupiers of the said close and tenement called Gimble Mill, a stream and watercourse, and the water thereof flowing in, through, along, and over the said several closes and tenements in the said ninth plea in that behalf mentioned, or in and along such supposed connected channel or leat, as in that plea mentioned, for the purposes in the said ninth plea in that behalf mentioned, and that the said W. Higman, whilst such occupier as last aforesaid, and the prior occupiers for the time being of the same close and tenement called Gimble Mill, have not, as of right and without interruption, for the full period of twenty years next before the commencement of this suit, scoured and amended, nor been used and accustomed, as of right and without interruption, to scour and amend whilst occupiers of the said close and tenement called Gimble Mill, the said stream and watercourse, channel, or leat, in the said last count mentioned, when and as often as the same required or requires scouring and amending, as to the said close and tenement called Gimble Mill, belonging and appertaining in manner and form, &c.

Special demurrer on the ground that the replication was double and multifarious.

T. Jones, in support of the demurrer.—The ninth plea sets up a justification for the acts complained of in the last count, on the ground that Higman was entitled to the watercourse through the closes, and being entitled to the watercourse was entitled to scour the channel. The replication is double, as it puts in issue both the right to the watercourse and the right to scour the channel. The plaintiff ought not to have put both these allegations in issue, unless he could shew that they were incidental to, or necessarily contained in, each other. There is nothing in the plea to connect them; and they may be quite independent. It would be enough for the defendant to prove the right to scour, and the right to the watercourse would be immaterial.

[MAULE, J.—I think the plea means that the right to the watercourse gives the right to scour. The defendant might have had the right to the watercourse, and to have some other person to scour the channel.]

There are no words connecting the right to scour and amend with the right to the watercourse.

[WILLIAMS, J.—Your construction makes the averment of the right to the watercourse insensible.]

[MAULE, J.—This is a plea under Lord Tenterden's Act, substituted for an allegation of immemorial usage. In the case of a grant of the rights to go on a close and to scour, the grant should be so pleaded.]

In the case of a grant or prescription the plaintiff would reply by denying the deed or prescription. The reason why the plaintiff might dispute everything mentioned in a grant is that the issue would be on non est factum, which would put the whole deed in issue. This is a substantial statement of a right to scour.

[MAULE, J.—You must take it as a right to scour as incident to the right to the ditch.]

Where a plaintiff is not in a condition to reply de injuriâ, he must select some allegation, and if he put the defendant to the proof of more than is necessary then the replication is bad, as in Regill v. Green (1), Thurman v. Wild (2), Moore v. Boulcott (3). The right to scour and drain being the substantial right claimed, the defendant ought not, according to the doctrine in those cases, to be put to the necessity of proving his right to the watercourse.

M. Smith, contra.—This is an entire prescription; and must be proved as laid, though the allegation be unnecessarily large. If the two parts are separated, the plea has a totally different meaning. This cannot be simply an easement. If the defendant claims the right to scour, independent of the right to the watercourse, then it is a "profit à prendre," and the plea should have been one of thirty years' enjoyment under another section of the act.

[MAULE, J.—You can hardly call digging a hole, without taking anything away, a "profit à prendre." It is rather a "perte à souffrir."]

The case of Richards v. Fry (4) shews that you cannot sever a plea of this sort, and take one part as sufficient. In Bailey v. Appleyard (5), Little Dale, J. said, that a plea of a right to turn cattle into the locus in quo, without saying for what purpose, was bad. Where then the purpose is stated, surely the whole can be traversed. It is admitted, that for many purposes, if immaterial matter be included in a traverse, it will be bad; but here it is necessary to refer to the first part of the plea in order to sustain the second. A contract may consist of many parts, and you may traverse the whole, and so of a prescription. Where the whole of a traverse sets up but one answer, it may put several matters in issue—Bell v. Tuckett (6), Pim v. Grazebrook (7).

T. Jones, in reply.—Richards v. Fry only shews that where a plea sets up a right of common in a que estate, it cannot be treated as averring only possession of a right of common. Bailey v. Appleyard is equally inapplicable. Littledale, J. there says only that the plea shewed no purpose for which the cattle were turned on the close.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Here you state a right to scour the ditch, and you should shew for what purpose you scour it.]

The defendant contends he was entitled to have the ditches clean. All that Mr. Justice Littledale says is, that some easement should have been stated, of which definite proof could have been given.

MAULE, J.—I think that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. It appears to me that the replication properly traverses a quasi prescription set up in the plea. The plea must be understood to be a plea of one single prescription; and the rule is, that when a prescription is pleaded, although it may be larger than was necessary to justify the matter complained of, the plaintiff not only may, but must, traverse the whole of it, and upon that traverse the defendant must prove every part of it. A plea of prescription is equivalent to a plea of a grant. In the case of a plea setting up a grant of a number of things, although one of them would constitute a sufficient defence, the defendant must nevertheless prove the whole of the grant as stated. In pleading such grant or prescription, it is not necessary to plead more than is required for the defence, but if more be pleaded the whole must be traversed. That applies to the case of a prescription before Lord Tenterden's Act. To apply the principle to the present case, it seems to me that since Lord Tenterden's Act this plea must be taken to be a plea of the enjoyment of one right. It may consist of a number of things existing by one deed or enjoyment equivalent to the presumption of a deed, and where it is alleged altogether it may be treated as one thing. The present plea is, that certain persons who occupy Gimble Mill enjoy the watercourse as connected with their close, and have also during all the time of their occupation scoured and widened the channel as often as was required as appurtenant to the close. It is said that this is to be understood as a plea of two separate prescriptions, the one of a right to enjoy the watercourse, which is no defence to the action, the other to scour the watercourse as often as it requires scouring generally without reference to the close. Supposing that to be the possible meaning of the allegation, yet in the present state of the pleading what I understand the plea to mean is, that during twenty years those who have occupied have enjoyed the benefit of the stream of water, and the right of going on the plaintiff's land and clearing out the stream as often as was necessary, as appurtenant to the close, the necessity of repairing being considered in reference to the previously stated right to the watercourse. Apart from the right to the watercourse there would be no assignable limits by which to judge whether the channel required repair or not. That is a strong reason for considering this as all one allegation, and not two separate ones. Supposing a party in justifying a trespass pleaded a right of common for horses, and a right for cattle, and a right for sheep, all that would be but one right. That is much the same as the present case, except that here there is a connexion between the two rights, arising from the allegation of the right to repair as often as was necessary for the occupation of the close. That of itself is enough to shew that the defence relied on is one right.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only difficulty seems to arise from the ambiguity in the plea. It may be construed as setting up one right or two. I think the true construction of this plea is, that the right of scouring is connected with the right of enjoying the watercourse. Therefore the plaintiff was not only right in traversing the whole allegation, but was bound to do so. Morewood v. Wood (8) is an authority to that effect.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I understand the argument for the defendant to be, that the effect of the replication is to compel the defendant to prove more than he is bound to prove. I agree that, according to the rule of pleading, if it does so the replication is vicious. It is said that the rule is violated, because the sense of the plea is that there was one right, namely, the right to scour, and that the replication calls on the defendant to prove an immaterial allegation. I agree that though idle and immaterial matter may not be ground for demurrer, yet if two constructions can be put on a plea, one of which gives effect to the whole, and the other rejects a part as idle and immaterial, the former is to be adopted. But I entertain a very strong opinion that if this idle and immaterial matter, as it is now called, had been omitted, the plea would have been bad on special demurrer for not setting out with sufficient certainty the nature of the right, so as to shew whether it was such as the law would allow.

Feb. 12. } ARMSTRONG v. CHRISTIANI.

Bill of Exchange—Notice of Dishonour.

The plaintiff gave the defendant this notice of dishonour:—"I am the holder of a bill drawn by you on L. M. M. for 98l. 15s., which became due yesterday, and is unpaid; and I have to state, that unless the same is paid to me immediately, I shall proceed against you without delay for the amount. Amount of bill 98l. 15s., noting 5s., total 99l."—Held, that the word "noting" must be taken as part of the notice; that it implied presentment and non-payment; and that the notice was therefore sufficient.

Assumpsit by the indorsee of a bill of exchange against the maker. The material plea was, that the defendant had not had due notice of the non-payment by the acceptor.

At the trial, before Coltman, J., at the Croydon Summer Assizes, 1847, it was proved that the defendant had received the following notice from the plaintiff:—

"20, Lawrence Lane, 5th January 1847.

"I am the holder of a bill drawn by you on L. M. Mendelssohn for 98l. 15s., which became due yesterday, the 4th inst., and is unpaid; and I have to state, that unless the same is paid to me immediately, I shall take proceedings against you without delay for the amount.

"I am, Sir, yours most obediently.

"Amount of bill 98l. 15s. Noting 5s. Total 99l."

The notice was addressed to "Mr. John Christiani, Sherborne Lane;" and it was proved that the clerk who delivered it to the defendant stated, at the time, that it came from the plaintiff.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

A rule nisi having been obtained to set aside the verdict, and to enter a nonsuit.

Duncan now shewed cause.—The question in this case is, whether the defendant gave the plaintiff a sufficient notice of the dishonour of the bill. The notice proved gave a sufficient description of the bill, and shewed that it had been presented and not paid, and that the defendant looked to the plaintiff for the amount. The words in the notice sufficiently identify the bill, although it is not stated that the bill was ever accepted—Shelton v. Braithwaite (1), Rowlands v. Springett (2). In the next place, this notice sufficiently shews that the bill has been dishonoured, and that the holder looks to the defendant for payment under the rule laid down in Solarte v. Palmer, per Tindal, C.J. (3), which requires that this information should be given either in express terms or by necessary implication. In Hedger v. Steavenson (4), Parke, B. and Alderson, B. said, that if they were to be bound by the precise expression of "necessary implication," a strict construction should not be put upon it. And Parke, B. says (5), "It seems to me enough if it appear by reasonable intendment, and would be inferred by any man of business, that the bill has been presented to the acceptor, and not paid by him." In that case a notice that a bill had been "returned unpaid," with a claim of 1s. 6d. for noting, was held sufficient. The word "noting" has a specific meaning among mercantile men, and implies that there has been a presentment and non-payment. In Grugeon v. Smith (6), the words, "returned with charges," were held to give notice of dishonour. A notice that a bill had been returned unpaid, and requesting that the defendant would pay the amount forthwith, was held insufficient in Boulton v. Welch (7); but Parke, B., in Hedger v. Steavenson, says, that he thinks that case was not rightly determined. The facts in that case, at all events, were different from the present, as there was not there any mention of "noting." In Messenger v. Southey (8) a notice that mentioned "expenses" was held insufficient; but, as Alderson, B. observed, in Bailey v. Porter (9), in that case there was no intimation given that the defendant would be looked to for payment.

Montagu Chambers, in support of the rule.—The notice was bad, in the first place for not sufficiently identifying the bill, nor shewing that it had ever been accepted or indorsed by the defendant, or stating in substance that the defendant was liable to the holder. In Hartley v. Case (10), which has never been overruled, Abbott, C.J. took the objection to the sufficiency of the notice, that it did not even say that the bill had been accepted. In modern practice the strictness of the old form of protest has been departed from. The protest set out all the particulars of the bill; but, at all events, it is the duty of the holder to shew in the notice why he calls upon the party to pay. The second is the more important objection. This notice does not give the defendant the requisite information as to the dishonour of the bill. It is quite consistent with the body of the notice, that the bill has never been presented and payment has never been refused. In Hedger v. Steavenson the words "returned unpaid," and in Grugeon v. Smith, the words "returned with charges" were relied on. Here the word "returned" does not occur. In Phillips v. Gould (11), a letter stating that a bill of exchange "lies at my office unpaid," was held not to be a sufficient notice.

(11) 8 Car. & Pay. 355.

[CRESSWELL, J.—All the Court are of opinion that the word "noting" must be taken as part of the notice.]

It does not follow that the word must mean that expenses had been incurred in consequence of the dishonour of the bill.

COLTMAN, J.—This case cannot be distinguished from Hedger v. Steavenson and Grugeon v. Smith. The words "with charges" and "noting" must both imply that before the notice was given there had been a presentment and a refusal to pay.

MAULE, J.—I also think that the notice was sufficient. In both the cases of Hedger v. Steavenson and Grugeon v. Smith it was alleged that charges had been incurred, and that could not have taken place unless there had been a presentment. The proceeding is one well known among mercantile men. Here the word "noting" occurs, and the meaning of it must have been perfectly understood.

CRESSWELL, J.—I think the case is quite free from doubt. A person dealing with bills of exchange must be supposed to know the meaning of the word "noting" as well as of the word "presentment."

Plea—That after the making of the said writing obligatory, and before the commencement of this suit, &c., the plaintiff brought and commenced an action against J. Heffer and H. Hales in the Court of Queen's Bench, for the recovery of the said alleged debt, &c., and the plaintiff, afterwards, to wit, on the 30th of June 1842, recovered in the said action 924*l.* 1*s.*, for debt and costs; that afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, and "according to the practice of the said court," to wit, on the 29th of October 1842, the plaintiff caused to be issued out a ca. sa. against Hales, directed to the sheriffs of London, and returnable on the 15th of November, &c.; that afterwards, and according to the practice of the said court, to wit, on the 29th of October 1842, the said writ was delivered by the plaintiff to the said sheriffs, &c.; and that the said Hales, before the time for rendering himself "according to the practice of the said court and the said condition," to wit, on the 14th of November 1842, was "according to the practice of the said court," taken and arrested by the said sheriffs, under the said writ, and was then kept and detained in execution, in custody, under and by virtue of the said writ, at the suit of the said plaintiff, upon the said judgment so recovered as aforesaid, and according to the practice of the said court, which practice then and before, and at the time of the making of the said writing obligatory, existed until and after the return day of the said writ of ca. sa., for a long space of time thereafter, to wit, hitherto; of all which premises the plaintiff afterwards, &c. had notice, and that from the time of the recovery of the said judgment until the said Hales was so taken and arrested under the said writ of ca. sa. as aforesaid, the said Hales was always ready and willing to render himself to the custody of the gaoler of the said court, according to the practice of the said court and the said condition of the said writing obligatory; and that by reason of the said Hales having been so taken and arrested, and kept and detained in execution as aforesaid, and of the premises aforesaid, the said Hales was, "by the practice of the said court, exonerated and discharged from rendering himself to the gaoler of the said court, according to the said condition;" and that the defendant and the said T. Cope, by reason, &c., were as such sureties as aforesaid, "by the said practice of the said court, exonerated and discharged from rendering the said Hales to the gaoler of the said court, according to the said condition," &c. Verification.

Special demurrer, on the ground that the plea was ambiguous, and did not shew a performance of the condition or an excuse for the non-performance.

This plea was pleaded pursuant to leave granted by the Court (1), after judgment for the plaintiff on demurrer to a former plea. The former plea stated that Hales was always ready to render himself, but was prevented by the plaintiff from so doing, in the manner in the plea stated (2).

Butt (Parnell was with him), in support of the demurrer.—The plea as now amended is as bad as the original one, and upon similar grounds. In the first place, the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench cannot alter the condition of the bond; and, secondly, if the facts amount to a performance of the condition, performance should have been alleged. The plea is ambiguous and double. The practice of the court, if relied upon, should have been stated. This Court cannot take judicial notice of the practice of another court, as was decided in the previous judgment in the present case. The plaintiff cannot traverse the statements in the plea as now pleaded.

Talfourd, Serj. (Ogle was with him), in support of the plea.—This purports to be a plea in excuse, shewing that Hales was exonerated from performing the condition of the bond. The former plea was ambiguous, not shewing distinctly whether the defendant relied on a surrender by Hales, or on the ground that Hales was prevented from surrendering.

[MAULE, J.—The allegation here is, that by the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench, the defendant was by the arrest exonerated from rendering Hales. You wish to bring the plea under the doctrine in Co. Litt. p. 206 a, that when the performance of the condition of a bond is rendered impossible by the act of the obligee, then the obligor is exonerated from performing the condition. But does this plea shew that the performance was impossible? It does not allege that it was impossible for Hales to render himself; but that, by the practice of the court, he was not bound to do so.]

[MAULE, J.—The doubt in the case is,

whether you should not have said that Hales did surrender by the practice of the court, or that the plaintiff, by suing out the writ, made it impossible for Hales to surrender. There is no objection to that, except that which was taken by Mr. Butt, that the practice should have been stated, and this case brought within it. This doubt exists in my mind as to the practice of the Queen's Bench, whether a party taken on a ca. sa. could say "I surrender." If you can ascertain the fact, and plead the matter either as a surrender, or as shewing an impossibility to surrender, that may be sufficient. There being a difficulty as to this, perhaps the only plan may be to state that by the practice of the court, and the act of the plaintiff, it became impossible to surrender.]

The Court can see from the plea that it was impossible for Hales to surrender, as he was in the custody of the sheriff.

[WILLIAMS, J.—Suppose you had stated the facts in the plea, and proceeded to say, "per quod it became impossible for Hales to surrender."]

If that were an inference of law, it would not be traversable. But the Court, on the argument on the former demurrer, held that allegation to be one which might be traversed.

[MAULE, J.—A traversable averment does not become less traversable by the introduction of a "per quod," but a "per quod" may introduce matter of law. In Pryce v. Belcher (3), words following the word "whereby" were held to be sufficient averment of matter of fact. But a statement that "thereby it became the duty" would be an allegation of law. I think the defendant ought to have leave to amend on the same terms as formerly. For the sake of making the matter more clear I threw out a suggestion as to the proper form of plea, but that of course was a mere suggestion.]

Per Curiam.—The defendant is to have leave to amend, on payment of costs; otherwise, there will be judgment for the plaintiff.

Insolvent Debtor—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.—
Set-off—Pleading—Replication of Discharge, generally.

Debt. Plea, set-off. Replication, that after the set-off had become due, the plaintiff, by an order of the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors, was duly discharged, according to a certain act of parliament made and passed in the first and second years of her Majesty, intituled, &c., from the said set-off, without this, that the said order and discharge still remain in full force:—Held, that the order and adjudication and discharge would be a legal answer to the plea of set-off, if properly pleaded. But that the 91st section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, which allows the discharge to be "pleaded generally," only applies to a plea and not to a replication, and that the replication was therefore bad in form, for not sufficiently shewing that the plaintiff was entitled to his discharge under the statute.

Debt for the price and value of work done and materials provided, for interest, and upon an account stated. Second plea, set-off of 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* for work and labour as a surgeon and apothecary, and for medicines and other necessary things found, provided, and administered by the defendant for the plaintiff, and for goods sold and delivered, and upon an account stated. Replication, that after the sum of 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, parcel of the sum of money stated in the second plea of the defendant to be due and owing from the plaintiff to the defendant, had become due and owing from the plaintiff to the defendant, to wit, on the 31st of March, A.D. 1843, by a certain order then made, &c. by the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, held at the court-house in Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, in the county of Middlesex, the plaintiff, then being an insolvent debtor in actual custody, and a prisoner in the debtors prison for London and Middlesex, in the city of London, was duly discharged according to a certain act of parliament made and passed in a certain session of parliament, holden in the first and second years of the reign of our Lady the now

Queen, "for abolishing arrest on mesne process in civil actions, except in certain cases, for extending the remedies of creditors against the property of debtors, and for amending the laws for the relief of insolvent debtors in England," of and from the said sum of 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, parcel, &c., without this, that the said order and discharge still remain in full force. Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning several causes of demurrer, and amongst others, that the replication did not shew how or in what manner the plaintiff was discharged from the said sum of 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, or that the plaintiff was in any manner entitled to relief under or by virtue of the said act of parliament, or that the plaintiff had in any manner complied with the provisions of the said act, or that the plaintiff had given the proper notices required by the said act, or that the plaintiff had inserted the said sum of 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, or any sufficient description thereof, or of her debts due and owing to the defendant in his schedule, as such insolvent debtor.

The following judgment was now (Feb. 16) delivered by—

WILDE, C.J.—[His Lordship stated the pleadings, and continued:]—Upon the argument the several grounds of demurrer were discussed, and the defendant also insisted, by way of general demurrer, that the replication was bad in substance, inasmuch as the discharge of the plaintiff, under the Insolvent Debtors Act, had not the effect of extinguishing the debts then owing by him so as to prevent their being available by way of set-off, but that the benefit to which the plaintiff was entitled under the act of parliament, and the order of adjudication and discharge set out in the replication, was his discharge from prison, the protection of his person from future arrest, and the protection of his after-acquired property from liability to seizure under writs of execution founded upon judgments upon debts owing before the order of discharge; and it was contended, that notwithstanding such order of discharge, the creditors may avail themselves of any legal mode or remedy to obtain satisfaction of their debts, not expressly taken away or prohibited by the statute, and especially that such debts may be pleaded by way of set-off in any action brought to recover any demand which subsequent to the discharge may have accrued due to the insolvent from the creditor.

As the Court is of opinion that the replication is bad, upon the ground urged in the demurrer, that it does not set out the several matters necessary to shew that the plaintiff was entitled to his discharge under the statute, and that he had duly complied with the requisitions of the statute, it will only be necessary to advert to that cause of demurrer, and to the objection taken to the replication in point of substance, that is, that the effect of a discharge under the statute is not to extinguish the debts owing by the insolvent, or to discharge the insolvent from his debt in any sense which precludes the defendant from pleading a set-off in respect of the debt due to him from the plaintiff before his discharge. The effect of the discharge under the Insolvent Act, the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, depends upon the construction of sections 75, 87, 90, 91. By section 75. it is enacted,—That after the examination of the prisoner, as in the act directed, it should be lawful for the Court, upon the prisoner's swearing to the truth of his schedule, and executing the warrant of attorney therein mentioned, to adjudge that the prisoner should be discharged, and entitled to the benefit of the act, as to the several debts and sums of money due or claimed to be due to the persons claiming to be creditors, and other persons mentioned in the section, at the time of the making the vesting order before referred to in the act. This section does not give a discharge from the debts, or state what the benefits are to which the debtor is to be entitled. The 87th section enacts,—That before any adjudication shall be made with respect to the prisoner, he shall be required to execute a warrant of attorney to the assignee for the amount of the debts in the schedule, and that if at any time thereafter it should appear to the satisfaction of the Court that such prisoner should be of ability to pay his debts, or any part thereof, or that he has died leaving assets, that the Court might permit execution upon such judgment to be taken out for such sum of money as, under all the circumstances of the case, the Court should order; such sum to be distributed rateably among the creditors, as directed by the act, and such further proceedings might be had upon such judgment as to the Court should seem fit, until the whole of the debts and costs should be paid and satisfied. By section 90,—No person who should have been adjudged entitled to the benefit of the act should be imprisoned upon such judgment, or with respect to any debt or sum of money or costs, with respect to which such persons should have become so entitled, or for or by reason of any judgment, order, or decree for payment of the same, but that upon every arrest or detainer on any such judgment, or for or by reason of any such debt, judgment, order, or decree for payment of the same, the insolvent was to be discharged by any Judge of the court out of which the process might issue. By section 91. it is enacted,—That no writ of f. fa. or elegit should issue on any judgment obtained against a prisoner who should have so become entitled to the benefit of the act for any debt or sum of money in respect to which the person should have become so entitled, except upon the judgment entered up under the act; and that if any suit or action should be brought, or sci. fa. issued for any such debt or sum of money, or upon any new contract or security for the payment thereof, or upon any judgment obtained against or acknowledged by such person, it should be lawful for such person, his heirs, executors, or administrators, to plead generally that such person was duly discharged according to the act, by the order of adjudication made in that behalf, and that such order remained in force, without pleading any other matter specially, whereto the plaintiffs might reply generally, or reply any matter which might shew that the defendant was not entitled to the benefit of the act, or was not duly discharged under the same.—Such are the sections relating to the discharge of the debtor.

Some ambiguity arises in regard to the extent of the benefit which the statute intended to afford to the insolvent debtor.

It is limited in terms to a discharge from prison, to being exempted from any action in respect of any antecedent debt or judgment, and to the protection of the goods of the debtor from the process of execution in respect of such former debts. But it is to be observed, before the debtor is entitled to his discharge he is required to give a judgment to the assignee of the Court, so that a judgment is in effect obtained for the benefit of every creditor for his debt. It would appear to be somewhat severe to leave the creditors individually in possession of remedies against the future effects of the insolvent, and to leave the insolvent exposed to the fullest remedy against both his person and effects under the judgment in addition. Further, this judgment so given is under the controul of the Court, and can only be made available for the general benefit of the creditors by distribution, and the debtor can only be coerced under the judgment to the extent of his ability to pay, established to the satisfaction of the Court from time to time. It will be observed further, that not only both the insolvent's person and his future effects are protected against actions and judgments in respect of the schedule debts, whether such judgments are obtained before or after the discharge, but also against both actions and judgments founded upon new contracts relating to the schedule debts, and the insolvent is entitled to plead his discharge in a general form in bar of any such action. It appears, therefore, that although the debt is not in terms extinguished on the insolvent's discharge therefrom, yet laborious care seems to have been taken to exclude and bar all means by which the debtor who has given up the whole of his property could, in respect of his former debts, be coerced in any way by the creditors individually, or his future effects in any way made liable to the payment of the scheduled debts. The reasons are obvious for not extinguishing the debt, such as to preserve liens, remedies against sureties, and also to enable the creditors to set off these debts against cross demands on the part of the insolvent debtor; but it is not obvious why so much care should be taken to exclude the remedies expressly mentioned in the act, and all apparent means of creditors obtaining preferences, and that others should be left open to the creditor, by which the apparent general intention of the statute might be defeated, that is, the protection of the insolvent's future property, and to the exclusion of individual preference out of the insolvent's future effects. It must, however, be admitted, as before stated, that the debt is not extinguished, nor the insolvent in terms discharged from it; and, accordingly, it has been held, that the insolvent's future effects may be distrained for rent which accrued due prior to the discharge.

But although the insolvent is not expressly discharged from his debts, or protected against every possible mode by which payment or satisfaction may properly be obtained, it remains to be considered whether the debt referred to in the plea can be made available by way of set-off. Upon this question it is necessary to refer to the statute by which the right of set-off is given, and the decisions upon it. The statute is the 2 Geo. 2. c. 22. s. 13. It is enacted in that section, "That where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and defendant, or if either party sue or be sued as executor or administrator, where there are mutual debts between the testator or intestate and either party, one debt may be set against the other, and such matter may be given in evidence upon the general issue, or pleaded in bar, as the nature of the case shall require, so as at the time of his pleading the general issue, where any such debt of the plaintiff, his testator or intestate, is intended to be insisted upon in evidence, notice shall be given of the particular sum or debt so intended to be insisted upon, and upon what account it became due, or otherwise such matters shall not be allowed in evidence upon such general issue." The judicial construction of this section has been, that no debts can be used by way of set-off under this statute, except such as are recoverable by action, and it has been accordingly held that the Statute of Limitations may be replied to a plea of set-off. It is clear that the debt pleaded by way of set-off in this case could not have been recovered by action, inasmuch as by the 91st section the order or adjudication of discharge might have been pleaded in bar to any such action, and for some purposes the plea of set-off has been considered in the nature of, or as analogous to, a declaration. In Chapple v. Durston (1), it was held, that to a plea of set-off the Statute of Limitations must be specially replied, and it was stated in the judgment that a plea of set-off has ever been considered in the nature of a cross declaration; and in Ford v. Dornford (2) Mr. Justice Patteson adopts the case of Chapple v. Durston. Therefore, as the debt sought to be set off by this plea is not, under the existing circumstances, a debt for which the defendant could have maintained an action, we are of opinion that it cannot be availably used by way of set-off, and that the order and adjudication of discharge would be a legal answer to the plea, if properly replied. It only remains, therefore, to be considered whether the replication can be sustained against the objections in point of form which have been urged against it; and we are of opinion that the replication cannot be supported in the general form in which it has been pleaded. It is admitted that unless it can be supported under some express or implied authority to be derived from the statute, it is a bad replication at common law, and under the general rules of pleading.

In support of the demurrer, it was urged that as the statute gives authority to plead the order generally only, in a given designated instance, the authority so to plead cannot be extended and applied to other cases than that pointed out by the statute: that the power to plead generally is given to a defendant in answer to a declaration, and that no direct authority has been produced to warrant or sanction the position that a general form of plea given in one instance, may be adopted in all other cases which are supposed to be within the principle or reason which induced the power in question to be granted.

On the part of the plaintiff, it was contended that the general form of plea being given to an insolvent to protect him from being charged in respect of the debts from which he has been discharged, the reason for giving the general plea equally applies to a replication in answer to a plea by which it is sought to do that which the legislature intended to prevent from being done by giving the general plea; and Ford v. Dornford was cited, in which Mr. Justice Patteson is reported, in his judgment, to have said, that although the discharge under the act of parliament in question must be specially replied when it is sought to be used by way of answer to a plea of set-off, yet that the decision of the Court did "not go the length of establishing that it is necessary, in the case of replying a discharge under the Insolvent Act to a plea of set-off, to set out all the proceedings under the Insolvent Act. On the contrary, if the decision in Chapple v. Durston amounts to a decision that a plea of set-off is a cross declaration, then it may be that the replication to such a plea might be in the form which the act gives as the form of a plea to a declaration." We have considered this suggestion with all the deference which the Court would ever be disposed to extend to the intimation of an opinion by that learned Judge; but as it is a mere intimation of opinion, and not a decision by him, and as no authority accompanies the intimation, we are not satisfied that such a replication as that suggested can be sustained. It may be correct for some purposes to consider the plea of set-off as a declaration, but we do not feel ourselves called upon or warranted in saying that the analogy exists for all purposes. The matter of set-off may require to be disclosed by the plea so as to shew that the debt sought to be set off is such as would form a cause of action in a declaration; but it does not follow that the rules which would govern the pleadings subsequent to a declaration, regulate those which might follow a plea of set-off. It would be difficult successfully to contend that a plaintiff might reply as many different matters to a plea of set-off as might be pleaded to a declaration for the same matters as those contained in the plea. It is clear that that part of the statute which gives a general form of plea did not contemplate a replication, and that, however inconsistent with the general view of the act it would be to allow a schedule debt to be set off, yet the statute does not provide for the case, and we are not aware of any admitted principle or decision which will sanction the Court in supplying the omission.

The Bankrupt Act of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16.

gives a general plea to the bankrupt in certain cases; and, bankrupts have often found it necessary to set up their certificates by way of answer to actions brought against them not falling within the terms of the act; but, except in the cases in which the general plea is expressly given, it has been the practice to plead the bankruptcy specially by setting out the essential parts of it, and no case has been cited in which it has been even attempted, much less sanctioned, to use the general plea in other cases than those in which it is expressly given. The language of this statute is clear and express as applied to the plea; and in the absence, therefore, of any decision which

Other objections have been urged to the form of the replication, to which it is not necessary to advert, as the judgment must be for the defendant on the objection already stated. As the Court considers that the order of adjudication of discharge under the Insolvent Debtors Act furnishes a substantial answer to the plea of set-off, and that the objection urged to the replication is one of form, we think the plaintiff ought to be allowed to amend, if he thinks fit, upon payment of costs.

charges," were held to give notice of dishonour. A notice that a bill had been returned unpaid, and requesting that the defendant would pay the amount forthwith, was held insufficient in Boulton v. Welch (7); but Parke, B., in Hedger v. Steavenson, says, that he thinks that case was not rightly determined. The facts in that case, at all events, were different from the present, as there was not there any mention of "noting." In Messenger v. Southey (8) a notice that mentioned "expenses" was held insufficient; but, as Alderson, B. observed, in Bailey v. Porter (9), in that case there was no intimation given that the defendant would be looked to for payment.

Montagu Chambers, in support of the rule.—The notice was bad, in the first place for not sufficiently identifying the bill, nor shewing that it had ever been accepted or indorsed by the defendant, or stating in substance that the defendant was liable to the holder. In Hartley v. Case (10), which has never been overruled, Abbott, C.J. took the objection to the sufficiency of the notice, that it did not even say that the bill had been accepted. In modern practice the strictness of the old form of protest has been departed from. The protest set out all the particulars of the bill; but, at all events, it is the duty of the holder to shew in the notice why he calls upon the party to pay. The second is the more important objection. This notice does not give the defendant the requisite information as to the dishonour of the bill. It is quite consistent with the body of the notice, that the bill has never been presented and payment has never been refused. In Hedger v. Steavenson the words "returned unpaid," and in Grugeon v. Smith, the words "returned with charges" were relied on. Here the word "returned" does not occur. In Phillips v. Gould (11), a letter stating that a bill of exchange "lies at my office unpaid," was held not to be a sufficient notice.

It does not follow that the word must mean that expenses had been incurred in consequence of the dishonour of the bill.

COLTMAN, J.—This case cannot be distinguished from Hedger v. Steavenson and Grugeon v. Smith. The words "with charges" and "noting" must both imply that before the notice was given there had been a presentment and a refusal to pay.

MAULE, J.—I also think that the notice was sufficient. In both the cases of Hedger v. Steavenson and Grugeon v. Smith it was alleged that charges had been incurred, and that could not have taken place unless there had been a presentment. The proceeding is one well known among mercantile men. Here the word "noting" occurs, and the meaning of it must have been perfectly understood.

CRESSWELL, J.—I think the case is quite free from doubt. A person dealing with bills of exchange must be supposed to know the meaning of the word "noting" as well as of the word "presentment."

Plea—That after the making of the said writing obligatory, and before the commencement of this suit, &c., the plaintiff brought and commenced an action against J. Heffer and H. Hales in the Court of Queen's Bench, for the recovery of the said alleged debt, &c., and the plaintiff, afterwards, to wit, on the 30th of June 1842, recovered in the said action 924*l.* 1*s.*, for debt and costs; that afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, and "according to the practice of the said court," to wit, on the 29th of October 1842, the plaintiff caused to be issued out a ca. sa. against Hales, directed to the sheriffs of London, and returnable on the 15th of November, &c.; that afterwards, and according to the practice of the said court, to wit, on the 29th of October 1842, the said writ was delivered by the plaintiff to the said sheriffs, &c.; and that the said Hales, before the time for rendering himself "according to the practice of the said court and the said condition," to wit, on the 14th of November 1842, was "according to the practice of the said court," taken and arrested by the said sheriffs, under the said writ, and was then kept and detained in execution, in custody, under and by virtue of the said writ, at the suit of the said plaintiff, upon the said judgment so recovered as aforesaid, and according to the practice of the said court, which practice then and before, and at the time of the making of the said writing obligatory, existed until and after the return day of the said writ of ca. sa., for a long space of time thereafter, to wit, hitherto; of all which premises the plaintiff afterwards, &c. had notice, and that from the time of the recovery of the said judgment until the said Hales was so taken and arrested under the said writ of ca. sa. as aforesaid, the said Hales was always ready and willing to render himself to the custody of the gaoler of the said court, according to the practice of the said court and the said condition of the said writing obligatory; and that by reason of the said Hales having been so taken and arrested, and kept and detained in execution as aforesaid, and of the premises aforesaid, the said Hales was, "by the practice of the said court, exonerated and discharged from rendering himself to the gaoler of the said court, according to the said condition;" and that the defendant and the said T. Cope, by reason, &c., were as such sureties as aforesaid, "by the said practice of the said court, exonerated and discharged from rendering the said Hales to the gaoler of the said court, according to the said condition," &c. Verification.

Special demurrer, on the ground that the plea was ambiguous, and did not shew a performance of the condition or an excuse for the non-performance.

This plea was pleaded pursuant to leave granted by the Court (1), after judgment for the plaintiff on demurrer to a former plea. The former plea stated that Hales was always ready to render himself, but was prevented by the plaintiff from so doing, in the manner in the plea stated (2).

Butt (Parnell was with him), in support of the demurrer.—The plea as now amended is as bad as the original one, and upon similar grounds. In the first place, the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench cannot alter the condition of the bond; and, secondly, if the facts amount to a performance of the condition, performance should have been alleged. The plea is ambiguous and double. The practice of the court, if relied upon, should have been stated. This Court cannot take judicial notice of the practice of another court, as was decided in the previous judgment in the present case. The plaintiff cannot traverse the statements in the plea as now pleaded.

Talfourd, Serj. (Ogle was with him), in support of the plea.—This purports to be a plea in excuse, shewing that Hales was exonerated from performing the condition of the bond. The former plea was ambiguous, not shewing distinctly whether the defendant relied on a surrender by Hales, or on the ground that Hales was prevented from surrendering.

[MAULE, J.—The allegation here is, that by the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench, the defendant was by the arrest exonerated from rendering Hales. You wish to bring the plea under the doctrine in Co. Litt. p. 206 a, that when the performance of the condition of a bond is rendered impossible by the act of the obligee, then the obligor is exonerated from performing the condition. But does this plea shew that the performance was impossible? It does not allege that it was impossible for Hales to render himself; but that, by the practice of the court, he was not bound to do so.]

[MAULE, J.—The doubt in the case is,

whether you should not have said that Hales did surrender by the practice of the court, or that the plaintiff, by suing out the writ, made it impossible for Hales to surrender. There is no objection to that, except that which was taken by Mr. Butt, that the practice should have been stated, and this case brought within it. This doubt exists in my mind as to the practice of the Queen's Bench, whether a party taken on a ca. sa. could say "I surrender." If you can ascertain the fact, and plead the matter either as a surrender, or as shewing an impossibility to surrender, that may be sufficient. There being a difficulty as to this, perhaps the only plan may be to state that by the practice of the court, and the act of the plaintiff, it became impossible to surrender.]

The Court can see from the plea that it was impossible for Hales to surrender, as he was in the custody of the sheriff.

If that were an inference of law, it would not be traversable. But the Court, on the argument on the former demurrer, held that allegation to be one which might be traversed.

[MAULE, J.—A traversable averment does not become less traversable by the introduction of a "per quod," but a "per quod" may introduce matter of law. In Pryce v. Belcher (3), words following the word "whereby" were held to be sufficient averment of matter of fact. But a statement that "thereby it became the duty" would be an allegation of law. I think the defendant ought to have leave to amend on the same terms as formerly. For the sake of making the matter more clear I threw out a suggestion as to the proper form of plea, but that of course was a mere suggestion.]

Debt. Plea, set-off. Replication, that after the set-off had become due, the plaintiff, by an order of the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors, was duly discharged, according to a certain act of parliament made and passed in the first and second years of her Majesty, intituled, &c., from the said set-off, without this, that the said order and discharge still remain in full force:—Held, that the order and adjudication and discharge would be a legal answer to the plea of set-off, if properly pleaded. But that the 91st section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, which allows the discharge to be "pleaded generally," only applies to a plea and not to a replication, and that the replication was therefore bad in form, for not sufficiently shewing that the plaintiff was entitled to his discharge under the statute.

Debt for the price and value of work done and materials provided, for interest, and upon an account stated. Second plea, set-off of 30l. 12s. 6d. for work and labour as a surgeon and apothecary, and for medicines and other necessary things found, provided, and administered by the defendant for the plaintiff, and for goods sold and delivered, and upon an account stated. Replication, that after the sum of 30l. 12s. 6d., parcel of the sum of money stated in the second plea of the defendant to be due and owing from the plaintiff to the defendant, had become due and owing from the plaintiff to the defendant, to wit, on the 31st of March, A.D. 1843, by a certain order then made, &c. by the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, held at the court-house in Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, in the county of Middlesex, the plaintiff, then being an insolvent debtor in actual custody, and a prisoner in the debtors prison for London and Middlesex, in the city of London, was duly discharged according to a certain act of parliament made and passed in a certain session of parliament, holden in the first and second years of the reign of our Lady the now

Queen, "for abolishing arrest on mesne process in civil actions, except in certain cases, for extending the remedies of creditors against the property of debtors, and for amending the laws for the relief of insolvent debtors in England," of and from the said sum of 30l. 12s. 6d., parcel, &c., without this, that the said order and discharge still remain in full force. Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning several causes of demurres, and amongst others, that the replication did not shew how or in what manner the plaintiff was discharged from the said sum of 30l. 12s. 6d., or that the plaintiff was in any manner entitled to relief under or by virtue of the said act of parliament, or that the plaintiff had in any manner complied with the provisions of the said act, or that the plaintiff had given the proper notices required by the said act, or that the plaintiff had inserted the said sum of 30l. 12s. 6d., or any sufficient description thereof, or of her debts due and owing to the defendant in his schedule, as such insolvent debtor.

The case was argued in Hilary term, 1847, (Jan. 27 and 28,) by

C. Jones, Serj., for the defendant; and Manning, Serj., for the plaintiff (1).

The following judgment was now (Feb. 16) delivered by—

WILDE, C.J.—[His Lordship stated the pleadings, and continued:]—Upon the argument the several grounds of demurrer were discussed, and the defendant also insisted, by way of general demurrer, that the replication was bad in substance, inasmuch as the discharge of the plaintiff, under the Insolvent Debtors Act, had not the effect of extinguishing the debts then owing by him so as to prevent their being available by way of set-off, but that the benefit to which the plaintiff was entitled under the act of parliament, and the order of adjudication and discharge set out in the replication, was his discharge from prison, the protection of his person from future arrest, and the protection of his after-acquired property from liability to seizure under writs of execution founded upon judgments upon debts owing before the order of discharge; and it was contended, that notwithstanding such order of discharge, the creditors may avail themselves of any legal mode or remedy to obtain satisfaction of their debts, not expressly taken away or prohibited by the statute, and especially that such debts may be pleaded by way of set-off in any action brought to recover any demand which subsequent to the discharge may have accrued due to the insolvent from the creditor.

As the Court is of opinion that the replication is bad, upon the ground urged in the demurrer, that it does not set out the several matters necessary to shew that the plaintiff was entitled to his discharge under the statute, and that he had duly complied with the requisitions of the statute, it will only be necessary to advert to that cause of demurrer, and to the objection taken to the replication in point of substance, that is, that the effect of a discharge under the statute is not to extinguish the debts owing by the insolvent, or to discharge the insolvent from his debt in any sense which precludes the defendant from pleading a set-off in respect of the debt due to him from the plaintiff before his discharge. The effect of the discharge under the Insolvent Act, the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, depends upon the construction of sections 75, 87, 90, 91. By section 75. it is enacted,—That after the examination of the prisoner, as in the act directed, it should be lawful for the Court, upon the prisoner's swearing to the truth of his schedule, and executing the warrant of attorney therein mentioned, to adjudge that the prisoner should be discharged, and entitled to the benefit of the act, as to the several debts and sums of money due or claimed to be due to the persons claiming to be creditors, and other persons mentioned in the section, at the time of the making the vesting order before referred to in the act. This section does not give a discharge from the debts, or state what the benefits are to which the debtor is to be entitled. The 87th section enacts,—That before any adjudication shall be made with respect to the prisoner, he shall be required to execute a warrant of attorney to the assignee for the amount of the debts in the schedule, and that if at any time thereafter it should appear to the satisfaction of the Court that such prisoner should be of ability to pay his debts, or any part thereof, or that he has died leaving assets, that the Court might permit execution upon such judgment to be taken out for such sum of money as, under all the circumstances of the case, the Court should order; such sum to be distributed rateably among the creditors, as directed by the act, and such further proceedings might be had upon such judgment as to the Court should seem fit, until the whole of the debts and costs should be paid and satisfied. By section 90,—No person who should have been adjudged entitled to the benefit of the act should be imprisoned upon such judgment, or with respect to any debt or sum of money or costs, with respect to which such persons should have become so entitled, or for or by reason of any judgment, order, or decree for payment of the same, but that upon every arrest or detainer on any such judgment, or for or by reason of any such debt, judgment, order, or decree for payment of the same, the insolvent was to be discharged by any Judge of the court out of which the process might issue. By section 91. it is enacted,—That no writ of f. fa. or elegit should issue on any judgment obtained against a prisoner who should have so become entitled to the benefit of the act for any debt or sum of money in respect to which the person should have become so entitled, except upon the judgment entered up under the act; and that if any suit or action should be brought, or sci. fa. issued for any such debt or sum of money, or upon any new contract or security for the payment thereof, or upon any judgment obtained against or acknowledged by such person, it should be lawful for such person, his heirs, executors, or administrators, to plead generally that such person was duly discharged according to the act, by the order of adjudication made in that behalf, and that such order remained in force, without pleading any other matter specially, whereto the plaintiffs might reply generally, or reply any matter which might shew that the defendant was not entitled to the benefit of the act, or was not duly discharged under the same.—Such are the sections relating to the discharge of the debtor.

Some ambiguity arises in regard to the extent of the benefit which the statute intended to afford to the insolvent debtor.

It is limited in terms to a discharge from prison, to being exempted from any action in respect of any antecedent debt or judgment, and to the protection of the goods of the debtor from the process of execution in respect of such former debts. But it is to be observed, before the debtor is entitled to his discharge he is required to give a judgment to the assignee of the Court, so that a judgment is in effect obtained for the benefit of every creditor for his debt. It would appear to be somewhat severe to leave the creditors individually in possession of remedies against the future effects of the insolvent, and to leave the insolvent exposed to the fullest remedy against both his person and effects under the judgment in addition. Further, this judgment so given is under the controul of the Court, and can only be made available for the general benefit of the creditors by distribution, and the debtor can only be coerced under the judgment to the extent of his ability to pay, established to the satisfaction of the Court from time to time. It will be observed further, that not only both the insolvent's person and his future effects are protected against actions and judgments in respect of the schedule debts, whether such judgments are obtained before or after the discharge, but also against both actions and judgments founded upon new contracts relating to the schedule debts, and the insolvent is entitled to plead his discharge in a general form in bar of any such action. It appears, therefore, that although the debt is not in terms extinguished on the insolvent's discharge therefrom, yet laborious care seems to have been taken to exclude and bar all means by which the debtor who has given up the whole of his property could, in respect of his former debts, be coerced in any way by the creditors individually, or his future effects in any way made liable to the payment of the scheduled debts. The reasons are obvious for not extinguishing the debt, such as to preserve liens, remedies against sureties, and also to enable the creditors to set off these debts against cross demands on the part of the insolvent debtor; but it is not obvious why so much care should be taken to exclude the remedies expressly mentioned in the act, and all apparent means of creditors obtaining preferences, and that others should be left open to the creditor, by which the apparent general intention of the statute might be defeated, that is, the protection of the insolvent's future property, and to the exclusion of individual preference out of the insolvent's future effects. It must, however, be admitted, as before stated, that the debt is not extinguished, nor the insolvent in terms discharged from it; and, accordingly, it has been held, that the insolvent's future effects may be distrained for rent which accrued due prior to the discharge.

But although the insolvent is not expressly discharged from his debts, or protected against every possible mode by which payment or satisfaction may properly be obtained, it remains to be considered whether the debt referred to in the plea can be made available by way of set-off. Upon this question it is necessary to refer to the statute by which the right of set-off is given, and the decisions upon it. The statute is the 2 Geo. 2. c. 22. s. 13. It is enacted in that section, "That where there are mutual debts between the plaintiff and defendant, or if either party sue or be sued as executor or administrator, where there are mutual debts between the testator or intestate and either party, one debt may be set against the other, and such matter may be given in evidence upon the general issue, or pleaded in bar, as the nature of the case shall require, so as at the time of his pleading the general issue, where any such debt of the plaintiff, his testator or intestate, is intended to be insisted upon in evidence, notice shall be given of the particular sum or debt so intended to be insisted upon, and upon what account it became due, or otherwise such matters shall not be allowed in evidence upon such general issue." The judicial construction of this section has been, that no debts can be used by way of set-off under this statute, except such as are recoverable by action, and it has been accordingly held that the Statute of Limitations may be replied to a plea of set-off. It is clear that the debt pleaded by way of set-off in this case could not have been recovered by action, inasmuch as by the 91st section the order or adjudication of discharge might have been pleaded in bar to any such action, and for some purposes the plea of set-off has been considered in the nature of, or as analogous to, a declaration. In Chapple v. Durston (1), it was held, that to a plea of set-off the Statute of Limitations must be specially replied, and it was stated in the judgment that a plea of set-off has ever been considered in the nature of a cross declaration; and in Ford v. Dornford (2) Mr. Justice Patteson adopts the case of Chapple v. Durston. Therefore, as the debt sought to be set off by this plea is not, under the existing circumstances, a debt for which the defendant could have maintained an action, we are of opinion that it cannot be availably used by way of set-off, and that the order and adjudication of discharge would be a legal answer to the plea, if properly replied. It only remains, therefore, to be considered whether the replication can be sustained against the objections in point of form which have been urged against it; and we are of opinion that the replication cannot be supported in the general form in which it has been pleaded. It is admitted that unless it can be supported under some express or implied authority to be derived from the statute, it is a bad replication at common law, and under the general rules of pleading.

In support of the demurrer, it was urged that as the statute gives authority to plead the order generally only, in a given designated instance, the authority so to plead cannot be extended and applied to other cases than that pointed out by the statute: that the power to plead generally is given to a defendant in answer to a declaration, and that no direct authority has been produced to warrant or sanction the position that a general form of plea given in one instance, may be adopted in all other cases which are supposed to be within the principle or reason which induced the power in question to be granted.

On the part of the plaintiff, it was contended that the general form of plea being given to an insolvent to protect him from being charged in respect of the debts from which he has been discharged, the reason for giving the general plea equally applies to a replication in answer to a plea by which it is sought to do that which the legislature intended to prevent from being done by giving the general plea; and Ford v. Dornford was cited, in which Mr. Justice Patteson is reported, in his judgment, to have said, that although the discharge under the act of parliament in question must be specially replied when it is sought to be used by way of answer to a plea of set-off, yet that the decision of the Court did "not go the length of establishing that it is necessary, in the case of replying a discharge under the Insolvent Act to a plea of set-off, to set out all the proceedings under the Insolvent Act. On the contrary, if the decision in Chapple v. Durston amounts to a decision that a plea of set-off is a cross declaration, then it may be that the replication to such a plea might be in the form which the act gives as the form of a plea to a declaration." We have considered this suggestion with all the deference which the Court would ever be disposed to extend to the intimation of an opinion by that learned Judge; but as it is a mere intimation of opinion, and not a decision by him, and as no authority accompanies the intimation, we are not satisfied that such a replication as that suggested can be sustained. It may be correct for some purposes to consider the plea of set-off as a declaration, but we do not feel ourselves called upon or warranted in saying that the analogy exists for all purposes. The matter of set-off may require to be disclosed by the plea so as to shew that the debt sought to be set off is such as would form a cause of action in a declaration; but it does not follow that the rules which would govern the pleadings subsequent to a declaration, regulate those which might follow a plea of set-off. It would be difficult successfully to contend that a plaintiff might reply as many different matters to a plea of set-off as might be pleaded to a declaration for the same matters as those contained in the plea. It is clear that that part of the statute which gives a general form of plea did not contemplate a replication, and that, however inconsistent with the general view of the act it would be to allow a schedule debt to be set off, yet the statute does not provide for the case, and we are not aware of any admitted principle or decision which will sanction the Court in supplying the omission.

The Bankrupt Act of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16.

gives a general plea to the bankrupt in certain cases; and, bankrupts have often found it necessary to set up their certificates by way of answer to actions brought against them not falling within the terms of the act; but, except in the cases in which the general plea is expressly given, it has been the practice to plead the bankruptcy specially by setting out the essential parts of it, and no case has been cited in which it has been even attempted, much less sanctioned, to use the general plea in other cases than those in which it is expressly given. The language of this statute is clear and express as applied to the plea; and in the absence, therefore, of any decision which

Other objections have been urged to the form of the replication, to which it is not necessary to advert, as the judgment must be for the defendant on the objection already stated. As the Court considers that the order of adjudication of discharge under the Insolvent Debtors Act furnishes a substantial answer to the plea of set-off, and that the objection urged to the replication is one of form, we think the plaintiff ought to be allowed to amend, if he thinks fit, upon payment of costs.

County Court—Nul Tiel Record.

A declaration on a replevin bond for not prosecuting a suit with effect, according to the condition, stated (after setting out the bond), that the plaintiff made his plaint at the Whitechapel County Court, and "that it was adjudged by the said Court that the said plaintiff should take nothing by his said plaint." Plea, nul tiel record. Replication, there is such a record. The order made in the minute book of the county court was "struck out for want of jurisdiction, a disputed title having been sworn to :"—Held, that the above entry did not support the allegation in the declaration of a judgment against the plaintiff in the county court, and that the defendant was entitled to judgment.

Debt upon a replevin bond by the assignee of the sheriff.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff, on &c., as bailiff of J. A., distrained the goods of one Abraham Hart for 6*l.* rent due to J. A. from the said A. Hart; that the said A. Hart, within five days then next, to wit, on &c., and after the passing of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, made his plaint to the sheriff of Middlesex of the taking, &c., and prayed that the same might be replevied, and alleged the taking of a replevin bond by the said sheriff from the said A. Hart, with (the defendant) Stanhope and (the defendant) Fisher as responsible sureties. The bond was then set out (which contained the usual condition to prosecute the suit with effect). The declaration then stated "that the said A. Hart made his plaint at the Whitechapel County Court against the now plaintiff," and after averring that the said A. Hart did not prosecute his plaint with effect against the now plaintiff, alleged that such proceedings were thereupon afterwards had that it was adjudged by the said county court that the said A. Hart should take nothing by his said plaint, but that he and his said pledges to prosecute should be in mercy, &c., and that he, the now plaintiff, should go thereof without day, &c. whereby the bond was forfeited; and concluded by shewing the plaintiff's title as assignee of the sheriff.

Replication, that there is such a record of the said judgment remaining in the said court.

There had been two distresses on the same premises occupied by A. Hart (the plaintiff in the suits in the county court) mentioned in the declaration: one on the 28th of September 1847, for 6*l.* rent; the other on the 30th of September 1847, for 3*l.* rent. The goods in each case were replevied; and Fisher and Stanhope became sureties to the sheriff in each case on the replevin bond. The pleadings and facts were in all material particulars the same in both cases. The actions in this court were commenced on the 17th of November

1847 against one of the sureties on each bond. The records returned in obedience to the certiorari were, as to all material parts, in the following form :—

Sealed with the Seal of the Court,

(Signed) J. M. Judge.

Lush, for the plaintiff, moved for judgment in each case.—The certiorari ordered the Judge of the court below to certify what took place in the matter of a plaint before him on the 26th of October 1847. This Court therefore will only look at the part of the record which refers to that date. A double record is returned by the Judge below, but that which relates to proceedings on the 26th of November is inapplicable to this case; it relates to matters which took place after the actions were commenced.

[WILDE, C.J.—We must look to that which the Judge of the county court certifies to us in obedience to the certiorari.]

The causes were at an end when they were dismissed on the 26th of October: the Judge of the county court had no authority to hear again on the 26th of November plaints which he had previously disposed of. He might have granted new trials if he pleased, but the plaintiff in these actions objects that after judgments were recorded in his favour on the 26th of October, the Judge assumed the power to deprive him of his rights, and a month afterwards decided the causes against him.

[CRESSWELL, J.—The first point you have to establish is to shew that there is a judgment on record in the plaintiff's favour. "Struck out for want of jurisdiction" is not a judgment.]

Such an entry is equivalent to a judgment of nonsuit: that is its effect. There are affidavits to shew that when a county court has no jurisdiction to try the cause (for which defect the plaintiff should be nonsuited) the judgment is always entered in the form here returned, "struck out," &c.

[CRESSWELL, J.—We cannot take notice of such affidavits—we cannot travel out of the record.]

It may be admitted that the Judge was wrong when he struck out the causes on the 26th of October, as there are special provisions in the County Courts Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 95. s. 121, relating to actions of replevin; but as on that day he proceeded under the 58th section of the act and decided the causes, such decision is binding under the 89th section, &c.

J. Brown, for the defendant, was not called on.

Per Curiam.—We cannot construe the words "struck out for want of jurisdiction, a disputed title having been sworn to," to mean the Court gives judgment for the defendant. Your argument is, that the Court gave judgment when it said "I have no authority to decide the case;" and whether the causes were struck out properly or improperly does not affect the question we are to decide. The only judgment in each case returned in obedience to the certiorari is a judgment in favour of the plaintiff in the court below, for whom each of the defendants in the cases before us was a surety. There must, therefore, be in each case

The declaration alleged that, in consideration that B. had become tenant to A, upon terms that B. should, during his said tenancy, keep the premises in repair, B. promised A. to keep the premises in repair during his said tenancy upon the terms aforesaid; that the said tenancy of B. continued until the commencement of the action, but that B. did not, during his said tenancy, keep the premises in repair. Plea, that after B. had become tenant to A, and before the committing of the breach, A, by due course of law, assigned to C. all his interest in the demised premises and in the reversion expectant on the determination of B.'s said tenancy; and A, thenceforth, ceased to have anything in the demised premises, and B. thence ceased to be tenant thereof to A:—Held, that the plea was no answer to the declaration, the contract to repair being a contract to repair during the tenancy; and that the tenancy was not put an end to by the assignment.

Assumpsit. The first count of the declaration stated that, before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 25th of June 1835, in consideration that the defendants, at their request, had become and then were tenants to the plaintiff, of a certain dwelling-house and premises, with the appurtenances, of the plaintiff, upon and subject to certain terms, (amongst others) to wit, the terms that the defendants should during their said tenancy keep all repairs thereon, the defendants then promised the plaintiff to use the said dwelling-house and premises in a tenant-like and proper manner during their said tenancy thereof, and also during their said tenancy of the same to keep all repairs thereon, according to the terms aforesaid; and that the said tenancy of the defendants of the said dwelling-house and premises, upon the terms aforesaid, continued for a long space of time, to wit, from the day and year aforesaid, hitherto; yet the defendants, not regarding their said promises, did not nor would, during their said tenancy, use the said dwelling-house and premises in a tenant-like or proper manner, or keep such repairs thereon as aforesaid; but, on the contrary thereof, the defendants, during all the time of their said tenancy, used the said dwelling-house and premises in an untenant-like and improper manner, and also during all that time wholly neglected to keep such repairs thereon as aforesaid, insomuch that, by reason of such default, &c. of the defendants, the said dwelling-house, &c., while the defendants so continued tenants thereof as aforesaid, upon the terms in that behalf aforesaid, were and continued out of repair.

There was a further breach assigned, that the defendants, during their said tenancy, wrongfully pulled down and carried away certain fixtures, parcel of the said dwelling-house.

Sixth plea—That after the defendants had become tenants to the plaintiff, as in the said count alleged, and before the committing of the breaches in that count mentioned, or the accrual of the said causes of action in respect thereof, to wit, on the 1st of December 1843, the plaintiff, by due course of law, conveyed, assigned, granted, and assured all his estate, right, title, and interest of and in the said demised premises, and of and in the reversion expectant upon the determination of the defendants' said tenancy, to a certain other person, to wit, William Bickford; and the plaintiff thenceforward, and before the accrual of the causes of action in the said first count mentioned, ceased to have anything in the said demised premises and tenements, and the defendants thence ceased to be, and never since have been, tenants thereof to the plaintiff. Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning for cause, (inter alia) that the promise of the defendants declared on was, according to its legal effect, a promise to keep in repair during the continuance of the tenancy under the plaintiff and his assigns, and not under the plaintiff alone, and that the assignment and cessation of the tenancy under the plaintiff as alleged in the plea was no answer to the causes of action to which the plea was pleaded; and further, that the plea was an argumentative and informal traverse either of the breaches, or else of the continuance or subsistence of the said tenancy at the time of the committing of the said breaches, and that the said traverse should have been in the ordinary form of a traverse, and have concluded to the country.

The judgment of the Court renders it unnecessary to state the other special causes of demurrer.

Maynard, in support of the demurrer (May 3).—The declaration avers a promise to repair during the tenancy. The tenancy remains the same, though not under the plaintiff. The words "the said tenancy" are merely used to identify the tenancy, which began under the plaintiff, but may continue under a different landlord. "Tenancy" means the same as "term" or "demise." The words "under the plaintiff" are not material. Standen v. Christmas (1) shews that the statute 32 Hen. 8. c. 34. applies only to a demise by deed. The assignee of the reversion of a term under a parol demise cannot sue. Unless, therefore, the former landlord can sue, no one can, and the defendants hold the lands discharged of all the conditions on which it was demised to them.

[WILDE, C.J.—The defendants would not know whether the plaintiff means to complain of a breach while they remained tenants to the plaintiff, or after his interest ceased.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—The declaration might have averred that the defendants promised to repair, while they continued tenants to the plaintiff or to his assignee.]

The declaration alleges that the tenancy continued to the time of action brought, and that the breaches were during the continuance of the defendants' tenancy. If it be meant by the plea to allege that the tenancy was at an end before the breach was committed, it is an argumentative traverse, either of the breaches alleged, or of the continuance of the tenancy.

Greenwood, contra.—(May 5).—The declaration alleges that the defendants became tenants to the plaintiff, and promised to repair the premises during their said tenancy. "Tenancy" is a relative term; it must be a tenancy to some one. The declaration having averred that the tenancy was to the plaintiff, the promise alleged to repair "during the said tenancy," must be taken to mean "during the time the defendants continued in the said relation of tenants to the plaintiff." It is said that "tenancy" is equivalent to "term," but this is not so. The declaration contains no averment that there was any term. It is consistent with the declaration that this was a tenancy at will, which would be determined by the assignment.

[CRESSWELL, J.—If so, would not this plea be an argumentative traverse of the averment that the breaches were committed during the continuance of the tenancy?]

The plea is in confession and avoidance. It confesses that, apparently, the tenancy continues, though it shews how in reality it had ceased. It gives sufficient colour. Standen v. Christmas only shews that the assignee of the reversion cannot sue on the contract to repair made with the assignor, unless the tenancy was created by deed; but it does not, therefore, follow that the assignor can sue.

[MAULE, J.—Before the statute 32 Hen. 8, if a lessor stipulated for repairs to be done by the tenant of a term, and then assigned his reversion, could he not still have maintained the action for breach of the stipulation?]

Maynard, in reply.—No new tenancy was created by the assignment: the old tenancy, therefore, remains. It is admitted that no right to sue passed to the assignee, this not being a demise by deed; and no authority can be found for saying that the right to sue for a breach of the original contract to repair can be extinguished by an assignment which did not transfer that right to another person. The only reason why the right of the lessor to sue is extinguished, where by the statute the right to sue is transferred to the grantee of the reversion, is because in that case the tenant would otherwise be liable to two actions—Com. Dig. 'Landlord and Tenant,' (Coote's edition), p. 322.

WILDE, C.J.—It seems to me that this plea is bad in substance; and it is, therefore, unnecessary to advert to the special causes of demurrer upon points of form. The question turns upon the meaning of the allegation in the declaration as to the tenancy of the defendants: whether it imports a tenancy between the plaintiff and the defendants, or whether it means a tenancy of the premises, which, although originally created between the plaintiff and the defendants, was not to be limited to a tenancy under the plaintiff. It seems to me that the declaration does not limit the promise of the defendants to their tenancy under the plaintiff only; nor does the plea treat the declaration as importing a tenancy so limited. The declaration avers the promise of the defendants to use the premises in a tenant-like manner, and to keep them repaired "during their said tenancy thereof," not following up those words by the words "under the plaintiff." The declaration then contains a distinct averment of the continuance of the said tenancy down to the commencement of the action. Then the question is, whether on the face of the declaration the plaintiff complains of a breach of contract to keep the premises in repair during the continuance of the tenancy generally, or whether the agreement imported that the contract was to continue only while the plaintiff himself remained landlord. Looking at the nature of the property and of the contract between the parties, I do not perceive that the declaration could have used any other terms more properly describing the contract. The tenancy, at its commencement, was under the plaintiff, no doubt; but there is nothing importing that the defendants were to continue tenants to him only. The idea of a tenancy at will is not at all natural, nor is it to be inferred without something leading to such a conclusion. The plea confesses the tenancy as alleged, whatever that may be, and treats it as a tenancy in respect of which there existed a reversion which was capable of being passed. By the assignment, therefore, the tenancy passed, and continued to exist under the assignee. If, therefore, the tenancy continued, though not under the plaintiff, the only question is, whether, as this is a demise on which the statute 32 Hen. 8. c. 34. does not operate, the right to sue for the breach of contract did not remain in the plaintiff. I see no reason, if the right to sue did not pass with the reversion, why the plaintiff should not sue. The privity of estate was destroyed by the assignment, but not the privity of contract: that was created by the original contract, and remains for ever between the lessor and lessee—Webb v. Russell (2). If so, I see no reason why the plaintiff may not maintain this action, taking all that the plea says to be true. It is, therefore, no answer to the declaration, and our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

COLTMAN, J.—It seems to me that, in whichever way the plea is looked at, it is insufficient. If the meaning of the declaration be, that the defendants should become tenants to the plaintiff, and should repair during the continuance of such tenancy only, and it be meant to assert by the plea that this is consistent with a tenancy at will, and that such tenancy was put an end to by the assignment, that would amount to a denial of the tenancy alleged, and would be bad as an argumentative denial of the want of repair during the continuance of the tenancy, without giving colour. If, on the other hand, the declaration shews a contract to repair during the term for which the tenancy was created, and not under the plaintiff only, then the plea gives sufficient colour, for it admits that the tenancy subsisted, though under a new landlord, that the premises are out of repair, and that prima facie the defendants are liable, and then sets up as an answer, a discharge of the party personally by reason of the assignment of the plaintiff's reversion. Then the question is, whether the right of action in respect of the breach of the contract to repair is thereby put an end to. Unless the demise be by deed, the case is not within the statute of 32 Hen. 8. Then, did the right to sue pass with the reversion at common law? Because, if it did, the defendants could not be liable to two parties. There is no authority for saying that such right to sue passes at common law with the reversion; it, therefore, remains in the plaintiff, the original lessor, and, consequently, the plea is bad in substance, as furnishing no answer to the declaration.

MAULE, J.—I also think this plea bad in substance. It does not seem intended to set up that the defendants' tenancy was at an end, but only that they had become tenants to somebody else, instead of to the plaintiff. It is, therefore, no answer to the declaration, if the declaration means that the defendants contracted to repair so long as they continued tenants to anybody under the demise originally made to them by the plaintiff. If the promise to repair be confined to the time during which the defendants should remain tenants to the plaintiff, then the plea would be an answer to the declaration. I think the first construction the right one, and that the promise is not so limited as the defendants contend. The duties that belong to a tenant ordinarily continue so long as he is tenant at all, and are not restricted to the time during which he remains tenant to a particular person. No doubt it is possible there may be such an agreement, viz., that upon a demise for years, the tenant may contract to repair for one year only; but where the terms of a contract are in any degree equivocal, it is reasonable for the Court so to construe them as to make the ordinary duties of a tenant co-equal and commensurate with the continuance of the tenancy; and so construed, the plea is no answer to the declaration. With respect to the plaintiff being entitled to recover, if the contract be as I have expressed it, there is no doubt. The statute 32 Hen. 8. does not transfer the right to sue to the assignee in the case of a demise without deed. If it be not transferred, can it be said to be extinguished? Here are two persons who have agreed, upon good consideration, to do certain things, for breach of which agreement either party may bring his action, unless there be anything to take away that right. Being within the general principle, is there anything to take it out of it? I see nothing so to do. The plea, therefore, is bad in substance. I should have some doubt about the point of form, if the plea had been good in substance. It seems to me to be, not so much a round-about way of saying that the tenancy was put an end to, but rather a special way of stating how it was put an end to; and it certainly is desirable to encourage such a mode of pleading as may tend, by narrowing the issue, to save expense, and to direct attention to the particular point to be tried.

CRESSWELL, J.—I concur. The declaration states that the tenancy created still continues. The defendants have not denied that it continues. We must take it, therefore, that it does continue. But the defendants say the plaintiff cannot sue after assignment. But the right to sue would not pass with the assignment; and then it remains where it was before the assignment.

1848. } TOLSON v. THE BISHOP OF CAR-
April 18. } LISLE AND OTHERS.

Practice.—Irregularity—Pleading—Replication; setting aside.

A replication commenced "And the plaintiff as to the forty-sixth plea"—it then traversed an allegation in that plea, and went on—"and this the plaintiff prays may be inquired of by the country; and as a further answer in this behalf to the said forty-sixth plea,"—it then alleged new matter by way of answer, and went on—"and this the said plaintiff is ready to verify; and further as to the forty-sixth plea,"—alleging new matter, and concluded—"and this the plaintiff is ready to verify."—Held, that such a replication is so irregular in form that the Court will set it aside with costs, upon a summary application.

This was an action of quare impedit, in which there were many defendants, who severed in pleading.

Two of the defendants pleaded various pleas. Their forty-sixth plea was pleaded under the 30th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, setting up an adverse possession during the incumbencies of three clerks in succession for more than sixty years; and their forty-seventh plea was pleaded under the 33rd section of the same act, setting up an adverse possession for 100 years.

The plaintiff replied, "And as to the forty-sixth plea of the said M. B. D. and J. B. D, the plaintiff says (denying the presentation of one of the clerks named in that plea) in manner and form, &c., and this he prays may be inquired of by the country, and as a further answer in this behalf to the forty-sixth plea (alleging that the plaintiff's rights were saved by the stat. 7 Anne), and this the said plaintiff is ready to verify, and further as to the forty-sixth plea (alleging that caveats were lodged before the induction of each of the three clerks mentioned in that plea, and so the possession not adverse), and this the said plaintiff is ready to verify." The replication to the forty-seventh plea was substantially the same as that to the forty-sixth plea.

F. Robinson, in the last term, had obtained a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the whole of the replications to the forty-sixth and forty-seventh pleas should not be set aside with costs, or why the whole of those replications, except the traverse first taken by each of those replications, should not be set aside with costs.

Manning, Serj. shewed cause.—The defendants should have demurred, as the replications are bad for duplicity. It is a most inconvenient and improper course to pursue to move to set aside the replications, and it is also unfair towards the plaintiff, who if the usual practice were followed of demurring to the replication would have the right to object to the pleas. Griffiths v. Eyles (1) shews that this form of replication is a subject for demurrer, but not for the exercise of the summary jurisdiction of the Court.

F. Robinson, in support of the rule.—

The replications are, in truth, three in number, to each of the forty-sixth and forty-seventh pleas. The first is a traverse concluding to the country; the two others have each a formal heading and conclusion, and each contains an answer to the plea. The rule of Hil. term, 2 Will. 4. pl. 34, which allows the opposite party to sign judgment for irregularities, applies only to pleas, and to no future proceedings. The only course open to the defendants is to come and shew the Court that the form of these replications is so contrary to all the rules of pleading and practice, that they must be set aside with costs.

WILDE, C.J.—It appears that these replications are pleaded in a form so contrary to the practice of the Court, and the defects are so patent and glaring that we should introduce great mischief if we were to hesitate to set them aside. It would be a useless waste of time and money to drive the defendants to demur. We think this application a very proper one, and the rule must be absolute to set aside the whole of the replications to the forty-sixth and forty-seventh pleas, except the traverse first taken to those pleas, with costs.

Practice—Pleading—Trespass—Statute—Disallowance of Counts.

A declaration in trespass contained two counts, the first in the usual form for breaking and entering the plaintiff's rooms, the second, under stat. 2 Will. & M. sess. 1. c. 5. s. 5, for distraining goods for rent pretended to be due, and selling them, and claiming their double value, &c. There was only one act of trespass committed:—Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to more than the second count of the declaration, under which he could recover damages, though proof of a simple act of trespass only were given.

Trespass. The first count of the declaration was in the usual form, for breaking and entering certain rooms of the plaintiff, and taking and converting his goods. The second count was framed, under the stat. 2 Will. & M. sess. 1. c. 5. s. 5, to recover double the value of the goods distrained and sold, and was as follows:—That the defendant heretofore, to wit, on the day and year first aforesaid, by and under colour of the statute in such case made and provided, with force and arms, &c., then seized, took and distrained divers other goods and chattels of the plaintiff, (to wit), goods and chattels of like quantity, quality, description and value to the said goods and chattels in the said first count mentioned, as for and in the name of a distress for certain rent then claimed, and pretended by the defendant to be due and in arrear from the plaintiff for and in respect of certain rooms and premises theretofore demised by one J. B. to the plaintiff, and then carried away and detained the same as and for such distress for a long space of time, (to wit), for the space of two calendar months then next following, and afterwards (to wit), on the 1st day of May, in the year aforesaid, by and under the like colour and pretence sold and disposed of the said last-mentioned goods and chattels, and converted and disposed thereof, and of the monies therefrom arising to his, the defendant's, own use; whereas in truth and in fact no rent was due or in arrear from the plaintiff, for the said last-mentioned premises during the time in this count aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided; and other wrongs to the plaintiff the defendant then did against the peace of our Lady the Queen, &c.

On a summons at chambers, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why one of these two counts should not be struck out, at the plaintiff's cost, the following order was made by Cresswell, J.:—"Upon hearing the attorneys or agents on both sides, I do order that the plaintiff within three days elect which count in the declaration he will strike out; otherwise, the second count be struck out, and in either event, at the cost of the plaintiff to be taxed.—14th of February 1848."

W. H. Cooke now moved for a rule nisi to discharge this order.—The question for the consideration of the Court is, whether the two counts in this declaration are a violation of Reg. Gen. Hil. T. 4 Will. 4. r. 1.

s. 5, whereby "several counts in trespass for acts committed at the same time and place are not to be allowed." The cause of action in the second count is a different subject-matter of complaint to the ordinary trespass set forth in the first count. The plaintiff will be entitled to recover, on the first count, upon proof of any act of trespass however small. To recover under the statute of 2 Will. & M. sess. 1. c. 5. s. 5, the plaintiff must establish a distress and sale made under colour of that act for rent pretended to be due, when in truth no rent is in arrear or due to the person distraining, and the owner of such goods is then entitled by action of trespass or upon the case to recover double the value of the goods so distrained and sold; the plaintiff has, therefore, a right of action under the second count which he cannot maintain under the first. In Thornton v. Whitehead (1), a count for use and occupation was allowed with one for double rent under 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 18; and that case overrules Lawrence v. Stephens (2). The present case is not distinguishable from Cahoon v. Burford (3), where an indebitatus count for money had and received was allowed, with a special count to recover damages for the breach of a warranty of a horse. Alderson, B. in giving judgment there says, "It is plain that it is not for the same cause of action. . . . The first count is for the recovery of damages for the breach of a warranty of a horse; but the second is to recover money paid to the defendant, on the ground that it was advanced on a consideration which has failed." In Sheppard v. Hales (4), the declaration on certain bills of exchange contained three sets of counts, on the lex mercatoria, on the law of France, and on a special contract; and the plaintiff's particulars shewed there was but one cause of action. The Court of Exchequer overruled the suggestion that the true test was, whether anything could be recovered under the latter set of counts which would not be equally recoverable under one or other of the former, and the Court there decided that the true test is, whether the counts are inserted, in apparent violation of the rule, as being substantially for the same cause of action. Bulmer v. Bousfield (5) recognizes this decision.

[WILDE, C.J.—Will not the second count alone answer your purpose?]

The right of action relied on in the second count being given by the statute, the plaintiff cannot recover anything unless he proves all the aggravating circumstances on which the right to recover double value depends—Masters v. Farris (6), Ireland v. Johnson (7).

[WILDE, C.J.—Why not? The simple trespass is not excluded from the second count, nor is the right of the plaintiff to recover for a common trespass destroyed because he fails to prove all the aggravating circumstances which would entitle him to recover the double value.]

[CRESSWELL, J.—Do you admit that the act of trespass relied on in each count is the same?]

The act of trespass is certainly the same; but the second count enables the plaintiff to recover for the continuing grievance—the sale of the goods, without proof of which tortious act the right to double value does not attach.

Per Curiam.—It is admitted that this motion cannot be granted if the declaration is in apparent violation of Reg. Gen. Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. r. 1. s. 5, and we must therefore see whether the counts are founded on one and the same principal matter of complaint, but varied in statement, description, or circumstances only. Here, it is conceded, that there has been only one act of trespass; but it is contended, that as the second count enables the plaintiff to recover for a more aggravated injury than is set forth in the other, he is entitled to both counts. We think he is not, because it will be competent for him to recover under the latter count for a common trespass, in the event of his not being able to satisfy the jury as to the aggravated circumstances set forth under the conditions of the statute.

In an action of debt, with a count for the detention of a horse, the defendant pleaded to the count in detinue a lien of 10s. for trying the horse in harness. The plaintiff replied a tender. At the time the horse was demanded of the defendant he claimed the sum of 1l. 7s. for keep, &c., including the sum of 10s. for the trial, whereupon the defendant said the charge was exorbitant, and tendered the sum of 19s. 6d.:—Held, that the plea of tender was not proved.

Proof of money received upon a condition does not support a count for money had and received.

Debt. The first count was for money had and received; and the second was a count in detinue for a horse.

Pleas—First, to the first count, never indebted. Issue. Second, to the last count, that the defendant doth not detain the said horse in manner and form, &c. Issue. Third, to the last count, that the plaintiff was not lawfully possessed of the said horse in manner and form, &c. Issue. Fourth, to the last count, that the defendant was possessed of a repository for the sale of horses; that the plaintiff delivered the said horse to the defendant to be there sold on certain conditions then agreed upon between them, that is to say, "Should any horse be warranted and prove unsound, he must be returned within the second day after the sale, before five o'clock, with a certificate from a veterinary surgeon, particularly describing the unsoundness, when, if confirmed by the veterinary surgeon of the establishment, the amount received for the horse shall be immediately paid back, but if he should not confirm the certificate, another veterinary surgeon shall be called in, and his decision shall be final, and the expenses of such umpire shall be borne by the party in error.—If a horse, warranted quiet in harness, or quiet to ride, or in any other respect (except as to soundness), shall be returned within the prescribed period as not answering the warranty given with him at the time of the sale, he shall be tried and examined by an impartial person, whose decision shall be final, and the consideration for the trial and examination, viz. 10s., shall be paid by the party in error.—All horses, carriages, &c., brought to this repository for sale, and sold either by any person employed by the proprietor or by the owner of the lot, shall pay the usual commission, and no horses, carriages, &c. shall be taken away until the keep, commission, and all other expenses are paid, whether sold by public auction, private contract, or are not sold.—That the horse was sold at the repository, upon such conditions, to J. B. and by the plaintiff warranted at the time of the sale to J. B. to be quiet in harness; that the horse was then taken away by J. B. from the repository, and afterwards, and within the time limited by the said conditions, returned to the said repository, according to the said conditions, because he was not quiet in harness; that the said horse was tried and examined according to the said conditions, and found not to be quiet in harness, of which the plaintiff had notice, by means of which premises the plaintiff became liable to pay the sum of 10s., being the consideration for the said trial and examination of the said horse, and an expense which, according to the said conditions, should have been paid by the plaintiff before the said horse should be taken away from the repository: of all which premises the plaintiff, before the said detention, had notice, and was then required to pay the sum of 10s., which the plaintiff refused to do; wherefore, after the plaintiff had refused to pay, and in consequence of such refusal to pay the said sum of 10s., the defendant refused to permit the plaintiff to take away the said horse from the possession of the defendant, as it was lawful for the defendant to do, which is the same detention, &c. Verification.

Replication to the fourth plea, that the plaintiff, after he became liable to pay the said sum of 10s. in the fourth plea mentioned, and just before the detention in the last count mentioned, tendered and offered the defendant to pay him the said sum of 10s. for the trial and examination of the said horse of the plaintiff, which the defendant then refused to receive, and of his own wrong detained, and still detains, the plaintiff's horse. Verification.

Rejoinder, that the plaintiff did not tender or offer the defendant to pay him the said sum of 10s. for the trial and examination of his, the plaintiff's, horse, in manner and form, &c. Issue.

The cause was tried, before Wilde, C.J., at the London Sittings after Hilary term. The defendant proved the facts as stated in the fourth plea; and it appeared, from the printed rules of the repository, which were given in evidence, "that the purchase-money for any horse, &c. was not to be paid over to the vendor until four days after the sale." The defendant gave in evidence the following bill, which his clerk delivered to the plaintiff, when he inquired for an account of the demand against him:—

1847. July 31. Bay gelding, bait .....	1	6
Auction .....	5	0
July 31 and August 4. Bay gelding, three days .....	10	6
August 3. To cash paid for trial of bay gelding in harness .....	10	0
	£1	7 0

The plaintiff said the charge was exorbitant, and put down 19s. 6d. The defendant's clerk refused to take it. The plaintiff then demanded his horse. The defendant's clerk said, "You cannot have it: look at the rules." The plaintiff replied, "I have nothing to do with the rules, I must have my horse." The plaintiff then left the 19s. 6d. on the desk, and went away. The learned Judge thought the tender was not proved, and nonsuited the plaintiff.

Huddleston moved for a rule nisi to set aside the nonsuit, and for a new trial.—The plaintiff proved that his horse was sold by the defendant, who, no doubt, received the purchase-money, and it was for the jury to say upon all the facts, whether the money so received by the defendant was received to the plaintiff's use.

[WILDE, C.J.—One of the facts proved was, that the money was received upon a condition, which does not establish a prima facie case of money had and received to the plaintiff's use.]

Then the defendant ought to have shewn by the best evidence that the horse was not quiet in harness. The person who tried the horse should have been called, and it should have been left to the jury to say, whether or no the condition had been performed.

[WILDE, C.J.—The question was not withdrawn from them, and there was abundant evidence that the horse was not quiet in harness.]

Then the plea claims a lien for 10s. only, and the plaintiff proved a tender of 19s. 6d., which covers that demand.

[WILDE, C.J.—The whole of the plaintiff's demand was 1l. 7s., and I told the jury that if a party makes a claim composed of various items and a less sum is tendered in payment, the party claiming may apply the sum tendered to any of the items he chooses, if the party tendering does not appropriate it at the time.]

Then it should have been left to the jury to say, whether upon the whole claim as made, more than 19s. 6d., the sum tendered, was really due.

[COLTMAN, J.—Did you put that view of the case to the learned Judge at the trial? It appears that the amount of any specific item was not then objected to.]

It was proved by the defendant's witness that the plaintiff said that the bill was exorbitant. It is sufficient to tender a gross sum, though money be owing to several different persons—Douglas v. Patrick (1). If 19s. 6d. did not cover the whole sum properly due, the defendant should have rejoined that more than 19s. 6d. was due.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Not so. It would have been a departure if he had. The defendant claims 10s. for a particular service—the plaintiff proves a tender of 19s. 6d. to a demand of 1l. 7s., which includes the charge for the particular service, together with a great many other items; that does not prove a tender for the sum claimed for the particular service.]

COLTMAN, J.—There is no ground for a rule in this case. The money for the horse was only received conditionally, and proof of such a receipt does not sustain a count for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff. As to the tender of 19s. 6d., no doubt, if 10s. was all that the defendant claimed, such a tender would have been sufficient; but there were other charges, which together amounted to the sum of 1l. 7s., and as there was no appropriation of any part of the sum tendered to any specific item of charge, there was no evidence to support the allegation in the replication of a tender of the sum of 10s. for the trial and examination of the horse. The nonsuit was therefore right.

Execution—Costs on Nonsuit—Error—
7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. s. 57.

The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. s. 57. enacts, that no person shall be taken in execution upon any judgment in any action, wherein the sum recovered shall not exceed the sum of 20l., exclusive of costs.

In an action, wherein the plaintiff was nonsuited, the defendant made up the judgment roll, and entered thereon the award of a ca. sa. for the amount of the taxed costs; the plaintiff brought a writ of error and assigned as error the entry of the ca. sa. on the record:—Held, that the ground of error assigned was not frivolous.

Semble—A plaintiff cannot be taken in execution for costs.

This was an action against a provisional committee-man of a railway company, wherein the plaintiff was nonsuited. The judgment roll was made up by the defendant in the usual form. The award of a writ of ca. sa., which the defendant had issued against the plaintiff for the amount of his taxed costs, amounting to 105l., was entered on the roll after the judgment. The plaintiff brought a writ of error, assigning for error the entry of the writ of ca. sa. on the record. Notice of the allowance of the writ of error was served upon the defendant, who thereupon took out a summons before a Judge at chambers, to allow the defendant to proceed in the execution of the writ of ca. sa., notwithstanding the allowance of the writ of error.

The summons was heard before Coltman, J., who declined to interfere, and indorsed on the summons, "Apply to the Court."

Bramwell moved for a rule to shew cause "why upon reading the judgment roll with the award of execution thereon, the copy of the assignment of errors delivered to the defendant's attorney, and a copy of the notice of the allowance of the writ of error, the defendant should not be at liberty to proceed in the execution of the writ of ca. sa., notwithstanding the allowance of the writ of error, the grounds of error being frivolous, with a stay of proceedings in the mean time."

—It is said, that since the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. a party cannot be taken in execution for costs only, and the 57th section of that statute is relied on. It enacts, "that no person shall be taken or charged in execution upon any judgment obtained in any of Her Majesty's superior courts, or in any county court, court of requests, or other inferior court, in any action for the recovery of any debt, wherein the sum recovered shall not exceed the sum of 20*l.*, exclusive of the costs recovered by such judgment." That section gives no protection to plaintiffs, but is intended to shield defendants who are proceeded against for debts under 20*l.* This is a case in which the act has no application; it is not an action wherein the sum recovered does not exceed 20*l.* exclusive of costs. No sum at all has been recovered, as the plaintiff was nonsuited.

[CRESSWELL, J.—I think some of the Judges have thought that the late statute does protect plaintiffs from arrest, and have discharged such persons from custody who have been taken in execution for costs.]

The act will be disastrous to defendants, if it be held that by its provisions a defendant who has been unjustly sued has no power to get the costs from a litigious opponent. But if the Court have any doubt on the construction of the act, the defendant does not press this application.

Per Curiam.—We cannot say that the grounds of error assigned are frivolous, and that the question raised is an improper one to be argued before a court of error. There are no special reasons given to induce the Court to interfere. It appears, moreover, that in several instances some of the Judges have understood the 57th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. in the sense contended for by the plaintiff, and have discharged plaintiffs from custody, who have been taken in execution for costs.

Arbitration — Award — Judgment non obstante veredicto—Finality—Release.

*By order of Nisi Prius a cause and all matters in difference were referred to the award of A. B, with power to enter a verdict for either party, the costs to abide the event, and neither party to be at liberty to bring a writ of error. It was contended before the arbitrator that the third and sixth pleas were bad in law, and, though proved in point of fact, that the plaintiff was entitled on the issues raised on them to judgment non obstante veredicto. The award directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff on the second and fifth issues, with 1*s.* damages, "which sum, except for my finding upon the other issues, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in the said cause."—The first, third, fourth, and sixth issues were found for the defendant:—Held, that the arbitrator had no power to order judgment non obstante veredicto; and that as regarded the damages the award (as above) was sufficiently final.*

An award of mutual releases in general terms is sufficient.

Assumpsit. The declaration was on an indenture of apprenticeship in the usual form. Two breaches were assigned: the first breach was for neglecting to instruct the apprentice; the second breach for not supplying the apprentice with food and necessaries.

Pleas—First, to the first breach, performance of the covenants in the indenture up to the 4th of July 1846; second, to the first breach, that from the 4th of July 1846 the defendant was prevented from instructing the apprentice because he absented himself; third, to the first breach, a justification from and after the 4th of July 1846, because the apprentice committed acts of felonious embezzlement; the fourth, fifth, and last pleas were pleaded to the second breach, and were similar to the first, second, and third pleas respectively.

Replication, to the first and fourth pleas, issue. To the second and fifth pleas, that the apprentice offered to return, but the defendant refused to take him back. To the third and last pleas, de injuriâ. Issue thereon.

Rejoinder to the replication to the second and fifth pleas, a denial that the apprentice absented himself. Issue thereon.

The cause came on to be tried, at the Sittings for Middlesex after Easter term, 1847, and was then referred, by an order of Nisi Prius, the material parts of which are as follows:—"It is ordered by the Court, with the consent of all parties, their counsel and attorneys, that a verdict be entered for the plaintiff, damages 500*l.*, costs 40*s.*, but that such verdict should be subject to the award, order, arbitrament, final end and determination of G. P. Esq., barrister-at-law, who is hereby empowered to direct that a verdict shall be entered for the plaintiff or the defendant, as he shall think proper, and to whom this cause and all matters in difference between the said parties are hereby referred, &c. It is likewise ordered that the costs of the said suit, to be taxed, shall abide the event of the said award, and that the costs of the reference and award, to be taxed, shall be in the discretion of the said arbitrator, &c. And by the like consent it is further ordered, that the said parties shall, on their respective parts, in all things stand to, obey, abide by, perform, fulfil, and keep the award, order, arbitrament, final end and determination of the said arbitrator; and that neither of the said parties shall bring or prosecute, or cause to be brought or prosecuted, any writ of error or any action or suit at law or in equity, against the said arbitrator, or against each other, of or concerning the matters referred by this order. And by the like consent it is also ordered, that the indenture of apprenticeship, in the pleadings in this cause mentioned, shall be cancelled, and that the said arbitrator shall by his award, order and direct what shall be done by the parties respectively, except that he is not to have power to order the defendant to take E. J. Toby into his service again."

The award, after setting out the order as above, proceeded thus:—"Now I, the said G. P. (the arbitrator) having taken upon myself the burden of the said reference, having examined upon oath all such witnesses as were produced before me by the said parties respectively, and having duly weighed and considered all the allegations, proofs, and vouchers made and produced before me, do hereby award, order and adjudge as to the said cause, that the verdict now entered be set aside, and that the two several issues in the said cause arising respectively upon the rejoinders of the defendant to the replications of the plaintiff to the second and fifth pleas of the defendant, be entered for the plaintiff; and that all the other issues in the said cause be entered for the defendant. And I do hereby assess the damages of the plaintiff upon the said several issues, which I have ordered to be entered for him, at the sum of 1*s.*, which said sum, except for my finding upon the other issues, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in the said cause. And as to the said matters in difference, I do award, order, and determine, that neither of the said parties hath any claim, right, title, or cause of action whatsoever against the other of them, in respect of any matters in difference referred to me. And I do order and direct that the said parties respectively shall and do each upon the requisition of the other of them, and at the costs and charges of the party requiring the same, sign, seal, and as their respective acts and deeds deliver, each unto the other of them, mutual general releases in writing of all and all manner of actions and causes of action, controversies, claims and demands of what kind soever, from the beginning of the world, until the time of the making of the said order of reference. And as to the costs of this reference and award, I do award and determine that each of the said parties shall bear and pay his own costs incurred by him in and about the said reference. And that the costs of this award be borne and paid by the said parties in equal moieties," &c.

Prentice, in last term, obtained a rule, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the award should not be set aside upon the grounds that the arbitrator had not adjudicated upon all the matters brought before him, viz., that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment non obstante verdicto on the third and sixth pleas; that the award leaves it doubtful whether this matter has been so adjudicated upon; that the award is bad upon the face of it, for awarding the plaintiff 1*s.* damages, and leaving it doubtful whether any damages are, and if any, how to be recovered; that the award of mutual releases, without specifying the form of release, is bad; and also why the verdict entered in the said cause should not be set aside and a new trial had, or why judgment should not be entered for the plaintiff on each of the issues raised on the third and sixth pleas, non obstante veredicto. The affidavits stated "That at one of the meetings before the arbitrator, the plaintiff's counsel submitted, as a matter for the arbitrator's decision, that the third and sixth pleas were bad in law, which was admitted by the counsel for the defendant, and that the plaintiff's counsel then formally and for the purpose of taking the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas on the point, and as he so informed the arbitrator, requested him to award and give judgment for him non obstante veredicto, on the issues raised on the third and sixth pleas in case he should find the said pleas in point of fact proved by the defendants. That the counsel for the defendant contended, and the arbitrator said he thought he had no power to give judgment non obstante veredicto, but if he thought either of the pleas bad in law, he would endeavour to make his award in such a way that his decision might be reviewed by the Court."

Unthank now shewed cause.—It was contended before the arbitrator that the third and last pleas were bad, and that the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto on the issues raised on those pleas. The arbitrator has not awarded such judgment, and this application to the Court is to compel him to do so. But even assuming the pleas to be bad, the arbitrator had no such power, as there is a proviso in the order which prohibits either party from bringing a writ of error—Chownes v. Brown (1). The arbitrator's authority extends over the verdict, but not over the judgment—Steeple v. Bonsall (2), Angus v. Redford (3). The Court will not interfere when the arbitrator has decided the verdict—Chownes v. Brown, Britt v. Pashley (4). Those cases shew that when a cause has been referred to an arbitrator with powers similar to those conferred here, his authority goes no further than the verdict, and though applications have been made in every variety of form to induce the Court to compel the arbitrator to order a judgment non obstante veredicto, or to arrest the judgment, the Court has always refused to interfere. It is said that the award of mutual releases in general terms is not sufficient; but the award in this respect follows the invariable form. It is said that the damages are contingently assessed, and, therefore, the award is not final; but the award would have been perfect if it had merely ordered the verdict to be entered, and it is submitted that the damages are properly assessed.

[WILDE, C.J.—The arbitrator has not given the plaintiff any damages; he says in effect, I should have given 1s. damages if I could.]

If the damages are not properly assessed, it is the same thing as if no damages at all were granted, and it would then be necessary to have a venire de novo, which is not asked for by this rule—Clements v. Lewis (5). The arbitrator might assess the damages contingently, if he pleased, for the parties assent to abide by his decision whatever it is—Morriish v. Murray (6). Lastly, if there be any valid objection to the mode of the assessment of damages, it is quite a distinct part of the award and may be rejected.

Prentice, in support of the rule.—The arbitrator has not awarded on all the matters brought before him which were within the limits of his jurisdiction, and therefore the award is bad. He was formally requested, as appears by the affidavit, to order judgment non obstante veredicto to be entered on the issues raised upon the third and sixth pleas, which were admitted to be bad, and he has taken no notice of that application on the face of his award. Steeple v. Bonsall is in favour of the plaintiff. The Court, in that case, were asked to give judgment non obstante veredicto,—in this case the arbitrator was asked to do so. Angus v. Redford is distinguishable. There the verdict only was referred. Here the cause and all matters in difference were before the arbitrator.

[WILLIAMS, J.—From the report of that case in 2 Dowl. n.s. 735, it seems that the cause and all matters in difference were there referred.]

Then that case cannot be supported as an authority, for it is at variance with the later cases decided in the Court of Exchequer.

[WILDE, C.J.—An order of reference in this form is of matters in dispute at the date of the order: the question as to the validity of the pleas was not at that time a matter in difference, it did not arise till after the verdict, and the arbitrator is then functus officio.]

The pleas and the incidents which might attach thereto were matters in difference as soon as they were placed on the record. By consenting to refer, the plaintiff was not barred of any rights which attached to him during the previous progress of the cause, and, therefore, the pleas were matters in difference at the time of the order. The objection to the pleas is not a technical, but a substantial matter in difference. A bad plea to a good cause of action is as substantial a defect in a cause as a declaration which discloses an insufficient cause of action. In Britt v. Pashley, Alderson, B. says, "The arbitrator had the power to do what the Court could do, and his award, therefore, puts an end to the proceedings;" and that shews that the arbitrator had the power which it is contended he should have exercised in this case.

[COLTMAN, J.—An arbitrator must act according to the terms of the submission. Where does this submission give him power to order judgment non obstante veredicto to be entered?]

[CRESSWELL, J.—If the arbitrator had found that the pleas were bad in law, it would have been of no consequence—issues in law are not referred to him.]

The order to decide all matters in difference confers the power, and the arbitrator should have found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto on the bad pleas; the judgment would then have followed as a matter of course, and would have been entered at the plaintiff's peril in the right form. The words in the order which prohibit a writ of error from being brought, may mean, "We know there is error on the record, and will leave that to be decided upon by the arbitrator." Next, the award is uncertain as to the damages, which are contingently assessed. The costs are to abide the event, and as it cannot be ascertained whether the plaintiff is to recover 1s. damages or nothing, the question of costs, which must follow the damages, is not conclusively decided. Lastly, the form and nature of the releases should have been stated. When an arbitrator directs the conveyance of an estate, he ought to state the form and nature of the conveyance. In Glover v. Barrie (7) the Court held an award bad for uncertainty, which directed "that A. should beg B.'s pardon, in such manner and place as B. should appoint."

WILDE, C.J.—It seems to me that none of the grounds on which it is sought to set aside this award are substantial; and that which asks for judgment non obstante veredicto the Court has no power to enter into. It is now settled law, that when parties consent to choose their own tribunal, and refer to that tribunal the questions in difference between them, the Court will not and cannot interfere to controul that authority, to which both parties have elected to submit their differences. If, however, there be any matters of law on which the arbitrator has felt a doubt and on which he needs the opinion of the Court, it is equally well settled that if questions of law be raised either on the face of an award, or by a formal paper accompanying or annexed to an award, the Court will take upon itself to decide those questions. On this occasion the Court are not asked to review the judgment of the arbitrator on any of the matters submitted by the parties to his decision, nor are his conclusions on any of those matters particularly complained of; but it is stated that his decision on the extent of his jurisdiction was mistaken, and on that ground the plaintiff makes this motion. It is said, that the arbitrator decided he had no power to order a judgment to be entered non obstante veredicto, whereas it appears by decided cases that he had such power; and if that fact were made out, it would have been open to consideration whether the Court should not interfere to compel him to do so. Now, what is the matter complained of?—The plaintiff says, he ought to have judgment notwithstanding that the facts stated in the pleas are found to be true in fact, because the pleas are bad in law. If issues both in fact and law have been referred to an arbitrator, he must decide on all matters ranging under those descriptions which are brought before him ; but when pleas have been pleaded in an action, the other party has pleaded over, issues have been joined, and the cause and matters in difference are referred, what are the subjects included in such an order of reference ? Why, as far as the cause is concerned, all the issues joined are referred, and in the present case those issues are issues of fact. The goodness or badness of the pleas was not at that time a matter in difference. The time for questioning the pleas by demurrer had passed by, and when the order of submission was entered into no such question existed ; nor could any such question arise till after the arbitrator had made his award. It is stated in the affidavit, that the plaintiff "formally called on the arbitrator to award judgment for him, non obstante veredicto, on the issues raised on two pleas which were admitted to be bad, but the case of Angus v. Redford is conclusive to shew that the arbitrator had no power to order such a judgment to be entered, and all the cases decide that the Court has no such power under the circumstances which exist here. When a cause is to be referred, the parties to the reference agree upon and draw up their own order of submission, and they should be careful to insert such provisions and to give such powers to the arbitrator as they require him to exercise. The main point then, on which it is sought to question the award—a mistake on the part of the arbitrator as to the extent of his authority—is not well founded. What is there on the face of the award which gives rise to the other part of the argument ? It is said, that at one time during the reference the arbitrator thought the pleas bad. But he might not have continued of the same opinion. There is nothing on the face of the award to shew that he thought them bad when he made his award ; and one thing is quite clear, namely, that if he thought them good, he would have found just as he finds now. The award is quite consistent with the pleas being all good ; and therefore the Court (even if it had the power) would not order judgment non obstante veredicto to be entered. It is not necessary to advert at length to the other objections—the Court thinks they cannot be sustained. The mode in which general releases are awarded is quite sufficient. As to the uncertainty of the award of damages, it is plain that the arbitrator never contemplated that any damages should be recovered. The rule must be discharged.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The arbitrator in this case has done all that he ought to have done. The matters in difference referred to him seem to have been all decided, and the omission complained of was not one of them. The matters referred to him were matters of fact ; and it was never intended to refer to him the question whether the pleas were good or bad. It would be very unfair and prejudicial towards a party who consents to a reference, as here, if it were open to the plaintiff to insist upon the badness of certain pleas before the arbitrator. Such a proceeding would be to allow an objection to be created which did not exist at the time the consent to refer was obtained. What occurs in this case ? The pleadings continue in regular succession, it is possibly known to the defendant that there are doubtful pleas on the record, the plaintiff pleads over, issues are joined, and the cause is referred ; that means that the issues in fact are to be determined by the arbitrator. If the plaintiff were allowed to question the goodness of the pleas, it might be well said on the other side "Non hæc in fœdera veni. I was willing that the arbitrator should decide all matters of fact, and have agreed that he should do so, and nothing more." If the plaintiff were to be entitled to question matters of law appearing on the record, what is the meaning or the use of inserting in the submission, that no writ of error shall be brought ? It would be monstrous injustice if, when a reference is consented to, as in this case, either party were entitled to insist on having judgment non obstante veredicto ; and such seems to be the view taken by all the authorities which have been referred to.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite true that an arbitrator cannot limit the authority conferred upon him, but must decide upon all matters referred to his decision. If he mistakes the extent of his authority, and thinking it more limited than it really is, omits to decide upon some matters within the submission which are brought to his notice, his award is bad. I think the arbitrator here has examined into and decided upon all matters brought before him which were in dispute between the parties at the time they consented to refer. At that time the parties had waived all questions as to whether there was good or bad pleading on the record ; they had joined issue, and there was no controversy about the pleadings at that time ; and therefore the arbitrator could not be called upon to decide upon them. Now suppose that instead of the cause being referred, it had gone to trial, the judgment would have followed the finding of the jury on the issues in fact ; there would have been no question on the pleadings, nor could any question be raised without taking a fresh step after the verdict was pronounced. So here, the arbitrator stands in the place of the jury ; he orders a verdict, and the plaintiff must take a further step in order to raise that controversy, which he now says was in existence at the time of the reference. Now, what was the arbitrator called upon to do ? To enter a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. What verdict ? Why, that found by his award. But he cannot make a second award, for his authority ceased when the first was published. The case of Angus v. Redford is directly in point against the plaintiff. The parties here have precluded themselves from bringing a writ of error, and the effect of that is to prevent each of them from raising any new questions for supposed defects in the record, which they agree shall stand as it is. There is nothing in the objection that the form of the releases is not sufficiently designated. Then as to the uncertainty of the award of damages, it is perfectly clear that the award is, "I do not mean the plaintiff to get any damages."

WILLIAMS, J.—I quite agree. The arbitrator here could not order a verdict of judgment non obstante veredicto, there being no such power conferred on him by the submission. If parties wish such powers to attach they should introduce them into the order of reference. Such a course would be fair and proper ; but when a defendant has consented to abide by the decision of an arbitrator on matters of fact, the plaintiff cannot insist on the defendant being bound on matters of law. If at the time the consent to refer was given, the plaintiff had attempted to introduce into the order a provision authorizing the arbitrator to decide upon legal objections existing on the record, the defendant would perhaps have said, "on those terms I will not consent to any reference at all."

May 2, 12. } LLOYD v. JONES.

County Court—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 58.
—Jurisdiction—Claim to Incorporeal Hereditament—Custom—Fishery.

The jurisdiction of the county court is not excluded in an action of trespass qu. cl. fr., by a claim of the defendant, as an inhabitant of B, to enter the plaintiff's land for the purpose of asserting a right of fishing there. For, first, a custom for all the inhabitants of B, as such, to enter the close of the plaintiff, and take fish there without limit, is bad ; and, secondly, the right claimed under such a custom, is not a hereditament, and therefore not within the proviso in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 58.

Morgan Lloyd, in Hilary term last, obtained a rule, on behalf of the defendant, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to the Judge of the County Court of Merionethshire, to stay further proceedings in this cause.

The affidavit on which the rule was obtained was made by the clerk to the defendant's attorney, and alleged that the action was brought in the county court for certain supposed trespasses, which the plaintiff alleged the defendant had committed by going, in September last, on the plaintiff's land, by the side of the river Trewern, to fish ; that when the cause was called on, the defendant's counsel objected to the jurisdiction of the county court to entertain the action, on the ground that the defendant claimed title and right to fish on the lands and in the river adjacent thereto ; that it was proved before the Judge of the county court that, in March 1847, a society was formed of the inhabitants of Bala, the object of which was to assert their right to fish in various rivers, including the Trewern, which they claimed to have immemorially used ; that it was further proved that the said society sent the defendant, then being one of the inhabitants of Bala, to fish in pursuance of and in assertion of the right which he, as one of the inhabitants of Bala, so claimed, and that the trespass complained of was the act of the defendant, in proceeding to fish in pursuance of and in assertion of the said right ; that it was farther proved, that the defendant, before proceeding so to fish, caused the plaintiff to be served with a notice in writing, that he was about to proceed to fish in the said river in pursuance of and in assertion of his right, claimed as aforesaid, and that he did in fact and bonâ fide proceed to fish by the side of the river on the plaintiff's lands. The affidavit then stated that the Judge, notwithstanding the objection, proceeded to hear the plaint, upon which the defendant's counsel contended that the defendant was not a trespasser, for three reasons:—first, that he had a right of fishing in the river, and of going on the plaintiff's land for that purpose; secondly, that there was on the said lands a public right of path; and thirdly, that there was a right of common over the lands. Witnesses were called for the purpose of establishing these defences; but the Judge proceeded to give judgment against the defendant for the sum of 1*l.* damages, the sum claimed in the plaint, and costs.

The affidavits in opposition to the rule stated, that the defendant was a person living at Bala, but not a householder there, and with no regular means of obtaining a livelihood; that the alleged rights of fishing, of way and of common were all entirely without foundation, and that the Judge of the county court, at the hearing of the cause, had required the defendant to satisfy him that he had some reasonable or probable cause for claiming a right to be on the plaintiff's land, and to fish there, and heard the evidence for that purpose; but that the defendant wholly failed to satisfy the Judge that he ever had a shew or colour of right, as the Judge then stated, and thereupon proceeded to adjudicate upon the matter of the plaint.

Talfourd, Serj. shewed cause (May 2).—The ground upon which the defendant seeks for a prohibition is, that the jurisdiction of the county court in this case is taken away by the proviso in the 58th section of the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, "that the court shall not have cognizance of any action. . . . in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments. . . . shall be in question." But first, the claim of right made by the defendant was a mere pretext, as the Judge decided; no such right, therefore, was in fact in question. Secondly, the affidavit does not state that the right of fishing existed or was claimed in respect of any property by grant, prescription, or custom.

And in point of law no such right can exist. In Fitch v. Rawling (1) it was held, that there might be a custom for all the inhabitants of a parish to go upon the close of A. at all seasonable times, to play at cricket, for a grant might be presumed. This, however, is not a claim for recreation, but a claim to a profit à prendre out of land. Thirdly, this is not within the exceptions mentioned in the 58th section, for the right to fish claimed not as an individual, but as an inhabitant, is not an hereditament.

[WILLIAMS, J.—The defendant does not claim as a bailiff, in whom the right is vested for the benefit of the inhabitants.]

Further, the defendant is not an inhabitant.

[CRESSWELL, J.—What the defendant urges is this: "You shall not try an action of trespass between A. and B, because B. says, some other persons have a right to go upon A.'s land."]

The same objections apply to the supposed right of way. A public way is not an hereditament.

[CRESSWELL, J.—What possible answer to an action for fishing on the plaintiff's land can a right of way or a right of common be?]

[COLTMAN, J.—Can any case be found in which a profit à prendre can be claimed without limit?]

Even if the question be doubtful, the Court will allow the defendant to declare in prohibition, in order to have the question fully and deliberately decided (6).

The judgment of the Court was now (May 12) delivered by—

WILDE, C.J.—The ground on which the defendant claimed to be entitled to the writ of prohibition is, that the action is brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass in having entered the plaintiff's land, and fished, or attempted to fish, there; and the defendant contended, that such acts were done in the exercise of a right conferred on him as an inhabitant of the town of Bala, under an immemorial custom: and as the claim of right set up by the defendant under this custom may be disputed, it is contended that the jurisdiction of the county court over the cause is excluded by the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 58, by which it is provided that the Court shall not have cognizance of any action in which the claim to an incorporeal hereditament may be disputed. The affidavit filed in support of the rule states the defendant to be an inhabitant of the town of Bala, and that an immemorial custom exists there, conferring the right before mentioned upon the inhabitants of that town, and that the alleged trespasses were committed by the defendant, at the instance or request of certain inhabitants, associated for the purpose of asserting the existence and validity of the custom set up. The affidavits read in answer to the rule deny the existence of the custom in point of fact, and state that the defendant is not a householder, that he is a person having no visible means of support, and is wholly incompetent to pay any damages or costs which may be recovered against him. Having heard the arguments in support of the rule, we are of opinion that the jurisdiction of the county court over the cause is not excluded by the proviso referred to in the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 58, and that the rule must be discharged. The custom set up is in effect a custom for the inhabitants of Bala, as such, to have a profit à prendre in the soil of another; but we think no question can be said to arise in this case regarding such a custom; as it has been held as clear and undoubted law for two centuries, that no such custom can exist in point of law. The question was determined in the fourth year of James the First, in Gateward's case (7), that such a custom was void in law; and since that case the law has been considered as settled, and is not now open to question or doubt. The jurisdiction of the court cannot be excluded by a pretence of a custom which it has been so long and solemnly determined can have no valid existence. But further, supposing any question could arise in the cause regarding the custom, still that circumstance would not bring the cause within any of the cases over which the jurisdiction of the county court is excluded by the 58th section referred to, inasmuch as that section excludes the jurisdiction in causes involving disputed claims of incorporeal hereditaments, and the claim in question is not a claim to an hereditament. "Hereditament" is defined in the text books of authority to signify all such things, whether corporeal or incorporeal, which a man may have to him and his heirs, by way of inheritance, and which, if they be not otherwise bequeathed, come to him who is next of blood, and not to executors or administrators, as chattels do—Termes de la Ley, 388, Co. Lit. 6. a, and Co. Lit. 16. It is obvious that the right claimed under the custom alleged is not a claim to an hereditament, and therefore not such as to exclude the jurisdiction of the county court; the rule, therefore, must be discharged, with costs.

1848. } WHITE AND OTHERS v. WOOD-
May 3. } WARD.

Guarantie—Promise to pay the Debt of another—Consideration—Future Supplies—Notice.

B. gave to A. the following memorandum in writing:—"In consideration of your agreeing to supply S. with goods upon credit (the amount to be in your discretion), I hereby guarantee you the due payment of such sum as he may now, or at any time and from time to time hereafter, owe you. My liability under this guarantee is to be limited to principal sum in running account of 100l." Declaration thereon, that confiding in B.'s said promise A. did afterwards supply S. with goods amounting to 85l.; that S, though requested, had not paid for the same, of all which B. had notice. Breach, non-payment by B. on request, of 85l.:—Held, on general demurrer, that the declaration was good, and that the guarantee disclosed a sufficient consideration for B.'s promise.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that, whereas before and during the times herein-after mentioned, the plaintiffs were and still are warehousemen and wholesale drapers; and whereas also before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. the defendant by a certain promise in writing, signed by the defendant and addressed to the plaintiffs, addressed and promised the plaintiffs in and by the words and figures following, that is to say: "Gentlemen,—In consideration of your agreeing to supply Mr. Henry Slater with goods upon credit in the way of your trade (the amount to be in your own discretion), I hereby guarantee you the due and regular payment of such sum or sums as he may now or at any time and from time to time hereafter owe to you, or to the persons who for the time being may comprise your firm, and against any loss you may sustain by his dealings with you, and I give you full liberty to extend the period of credit to the said Henry Slater, and to take collateral security for any monies in which the said Henry Slater may be indebted to you, and to hold over or renew any bills, notes, or other securities you may at any time hold, and to grant him and the parties liable upon bills, notes, or other securities any indulgence, and to compound, concur in assignment, or otherwise arrange with and to release him and them respectively as you may think fit, without thereby discharging or in any manner affecting my liability by virtue of this guarantee, or entitling me to set off or claim against the sum hereby secured any dividend or payment you may receive from the said Henry Slater or his estate, or any securities you may hold. My liability under this guarantee is to be limited to principal sum in running account of 100l." And the plaintiffs aver that they, confiding in the said promise of the defendant, did afterwards and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. supply the said Henry Slater with goods of great value, to wit, of the value of 85l. 10s. 9d. in the way of their said trade as aforesaid, and for certain reasonable prices and sums of money, amounting in the whole to a large sum, to wit, 85l. 10s. 9d., and although the said credit and the time for the payment of the prices of the said goods elapsed before the commencement of this suit, and although the said Henry Slater was afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. requested by the plaintiffs to pay them the said sum of money, yet the said Henry Slater did not pay the same, or any part thereof, of all which premises the defendant afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. had notice, yet the defendant has not paid the said sum of money so due from the said Henry Slater to the plaintiffs as aforesaid, being a principal sum not exceeding the said sum of 100l. in the said promise in writing of the defendant in such behalf mentioned as aforesaid, although the defendant was afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. requested by the plaintiffs so to do, but the said sum still remains unpaid to the plaintiffs, to the damage, &c.

The points stated for argument on behalf of the defendant were, that the declaration did not disclose any consideration for the promise therein stated, and that it was not shewn that the 85l. was a sum which Henry Slater did owe at the time of the commencement of the suit on the balance of a running account.

Pashley, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration discloses no sufficient consideration for the defendant's promise. There is no absolute agreement by the plaintiffs to supply Slater with goods. The consideration must be distinctly ascertainable from the instrument itself, and it is at least ambiguous whether the consideration for the promise was the amount already due by Slater, or goods to be afterwards supplied to him. As it was at the discretion of the plaintiffs whether they would supply him or not, they were not bound to supply him at all, and in that case the consideration was of no value, and the promise of the defendant was void—Taylor v. Brewer (1), Raikes v. Todd (2), Bryant v. Flight (3). The declaration is also defective, for not shewing that the defendant had notice of the supply of goods to Slater by the plaintiffs within a reasonable time after such goods were so supplied—Cramer v. Higginson (4).

[CRESSWELL, J.—Is such notice necessary to give the right of action? Possibly the right of action may be lost by laches in not giving reasonable notice, but in that case it is for the defendant to plead it, and shew it as matter of discharge. This is a general demurrer to the declaration; can any authority be found for saying that the plaintiff must allege such notice in his declaration?]

Pashley referred to Peel v. Tatlock (5), and Firth v. Thrush (6).

[CRESSWELL, J.—In cases of bills of exchange notice is necessary by the Law Merchant, but not so on a guarantie for the payment of goods by another person.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—And notice of dishonour means due notice.]

T. Jones, on the other side, was not called on.

WILDE, C.J.—There is no difficulty in this case. The first objection is, that there is no sufficient consideration for the defendant's promise. It is only necessary to read the instrument to answer this objection. If the defendant on the face of the document on which the action is brought avers that a consideration has been given for his guarantie, is not that enough? The document is, perhaps, not in the usual form, but it is quite sufficient to support the promise: nor is there any ambiguity in it; the supposition that there is rests upon a misapprehension. The existing debt, at the date of the agreement is referred to, as well as the future advances to be made to Slater, but the consideration for the defendant's promise is the agreement of the plaintiffs to supply Slater with goods in future. As to the reasonable notice of the goods having been supplied, if such be necessary, the omission to give reasonable notice is matter of discharge, which should come by way of plea from the defendant.

COLTMAN, J. concurred.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said the plaintiffs ought to have refused to supply goods to Slater. But there is an averment that they did continue to supply goods to him; and in Johnstone v. Nicholls (7) it was held, that a somewhat similar guarantie was binding, though it referred, in fact, almost exclusively to goods already supplied.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained, to change the venue from Middlesex to Cambridgeshire. The declaration was in debt; and the plea was, never indebted.

It appeared that the declaration was delivered on the 10th of March; that the defendant, after twice obtaining time to plead, being under terms to plead issuably and take short notice of trial, delivered his plea on the 29th of March; and that on the 12th of April the issue was delivered with notice of trial for the 26th of April.

Sanders shewed cause and objected that the application was made too late; that the affidavit did not deny that it was made for the purposes of delay, and that it did not state that the defendant intended to call witnesses, or that he had a good defence to the action.

Bircham, contra, submitted, that as it appeared the action was brought by an outgoing farming tenant against the incoming tenant of a farm in Cambridgeshire, it would be more convenient and less expensive that the cause should be tried in that county.

WILDE, C.J.—The defendant knew from the declaration the nature of the plaintiff's demand, and of course he knew also the nature of his own defence. He took out a summons for time to plead; but he took no steps for obtaining the common order to change the venue, till a week after he had received notice of trial. He then makes this special application, which if granted will have the effect of delaying the judgment of the plaintiff until after the next assizes. The Court ought to know from the applicant why the application was not made before, and the causes which render it desirable to have the action tried in the county to which it is sought to remove it. The affidavit shews neither of these. It may be that the defendant has only one witness whom he may intend to call, or he may not intend to call any. The plaintiff, on the other hand, may have many witnesses, and it may be more convenient for him that the cause should be tried in London. In support of an application made at such a late period, it ought to be distinctly shewn that the change will be greatly convenient to the party moving, and that it will occasion no inconvenience to the other side. This does not appear: on the contrary, the plaintiff would clearly be delayed by the proposed change.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Practice—Adding Pleas—Sworn Broker.

After issue joined, and notice of trial, the Court allowed the defendant to add a plea, that the plaintiff was not a sworn broker of the city of London, it appearing that the trial of the cause would not be thereby delayed.

Assumpsit. The declaration was delivered on the 8th of January, containing the common money counts, with particulars of demand shewing that the action was brought to recover sums paid by the plaintiff, as the broker of the defendant, upon various transactions in shares. On the 29th of January the defendant pleaded, first, non assumpsit; secondly, set-off; thirdly, that the transactions were illegal under the Stock-Jobbing Act, 7 Geo. 2. c. 8. On the 4th of February the plaintiff replied to the first and second pleas, and demurred to the third. The defendant joined in demurrer, and, on the 7th of April, the demurrer was set down for argument, and the issue delivered by the plaintiff, with notice of trial, for the 5th of May, the second sittings in Easter term. The defendant then took out a summons at chambers, to amend the third plea, and to add a further plea, that the plaintiff was not a broker duly licensed within the city of London—6 Anne, c. 16. On the 20th of April the Judge made an order, allowing the amendment of the third plea, on payment of costs, but declined to allow the additional plea. The costs of the amendment were not paid, and the plaintiff countermanded the notice of trial.

Snow, on the 28th of April, obtained a rule nisi, for leave to add a plea that the plaintiff was not a duly licensed broker. He cited Huber v. Steiner (1) and Smith v. Dixon (2).

Hugh Hill now shewed cause.—The defendant knew from the particulars the nature of the plaintiff's claim. He may have known, at the time he originally pleaded in January, the fact that the plaintiff was not a licensed broker. The delay in making this application is, therefore, inexcusable; and the Court will not interfere with the discretion of the Judge who refused an application made after notice of trial, which would have the effect of delaying the plaintiff.

(1) 4 Mo. & Sc. 328.

(2) 4 Dowl. P.C. 471.

Snow, in support of the rule.—The plaintiff, having countermanded his notice of trial, will not now be delayed by the addition of the proposed plea; and even if the application might have been made earlier, this is no answer to it, if the proposed defence be one which is founded on justice, and if the plaintiff be placed in no worse position than he would have been in if such a plea had been originally on the record.

WILDE, C.J.—The defendant would have been entitled to what he seeks, according to the usual practice of the Court, if he had made the application originally before notice of trial was given; but he lets the time go by, and he now asks for the indulgence of the Court to be permitted to add this plea. I confess I see no reason why he should not be allowed to do so. There is nothing in the plea itself which should deprive him of the privilege. The plea is not an unjust plea, but founded upon an act of parliament passed for public purposes, and essential to the public security, in the numerous and important transactions in which it is most desirable that proper persons only should be allowed to act as agents. Then, if the plea be not against conscience, is there anything in the facts to deprive the defendant of that which would otherwise be his right? True he comes late; but "late" is a relative term, and it seems that the plaintiff having, for some other independent reason, countermanded the notice of trial, will not now be delayed by the addition of the proposed plea.

Rule absolute, on payment of costs of the amendment of the third plea and of this application; the plea to be delivered in a week.

Assumpsit by indorsee against indorser of two bills of exchange, for 11*l.* and 14*l.* respectively.

At the trial, at the last Kingston Assizes, the plaintiff had a verdict for 11*l.* The learned Judge who tried the cause did not certify that the action was fit to be brought in the superior court. Notice of taxation having been given—

Talfourd, Serj. (May 3,) obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why he should not bring in the postea, in order that a suggestion might be entered on the record to deprive him of costs, under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129. The affidavit on which he moved alleged that the plaintiff and the defendant dwelt within twenty miles of each other, and that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the county court, within which the defendant carried on his business at the time of action brought.

Lush now shewed cause.—The affidavit does not allege that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant is an officer of the county court. It does not, therefore, negative the exceptions in the 128th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, which provides, "that all actions which before the passing of this act might have been brought in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record, where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant, or where the cause of action did not arise wholly or in some material point within the jurisdiction of the court within which the defendant dwells or carries on his business at the time of the action brought, or where any officer of the county court shall be a party, except in respect of any claim to any goods and chattels taken in execution of the process of the court, or the proceeds or value thereof, may be brought and determined in any such superior court at the election of the party suing or proceeding as if this act had not been passed." The plaintiff, if an officer of the county court, may still bring his action in the superior court. Then the 129th section only operates to deprive plaintiffs of costs, if any action be brought in the superior court "for any cause other than those lastly hereinbefore (in the 128th section) specified." The 129th section, therefore, does not apply to the present case.

The Court called on—

Talfourd, Serj., to support the rule.—The 128th section applies to particular kinds of actions, and also to actions by or against particular persons, viz., the officers of the county court. The first question is, whether the words in the 129th section, "where the action is commenced for any cause other than those previously specified," refer, not only to the causes, but to the persons mentioned in the 128th section. But even if they do, this is matter of proviso and exception, which must come from the other side. It is sufficient for the defendant to shew affirmatively in the first instance, that the case is within the jurisdiction of the county court, within the 58th section of the statute.

WILDE, C.J.—No: you say the rights of the plaintiff to sue in the superior court are taken away: you must shew this affirmatively. Your affidavit does negative some of the exceptions of the 128th section, for you have affirmed that the plaintiff lives within twenty miles of the defendant, and that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the court in which the defendant dwells. You are equally bound to shew that he is not an officer of the county court: otherwise, his right to sue in the superior court is not excluded.

COLTMAN, J.—The point has, I believe, never been raised before; but I think the exceptions of the 128th section must all be negatived, before the penalty imposed by the 129th section in all other cases can be insisted on.

CRESSWELL, J.—The 128th section is not a proviso. It excepts from the obligation to sue in the county court certain cases. Then the 129th section says, in all cases but those so excepted you must sue in the county court, or run the risk of losing costs. The defendant must shew that this is not one of the excepted cases.

WILLIAMS, J.—He must not only shew it by his affidavit, but so must the suggestion on the record. Otherwise, there would be error on the record.

Judgment, as in Case of Nonsuit—Peremptory Undertaking to try.

A rule nisi for judgment as in case of a nonsuit was discharged in Michaelmas term upon the plaintiff's giving a peremptory undertaking to try at the sittings after that term. The plaintiff entered the cause for those sittings; but it was not reached in the course of business, and was made a remanet. On the fifth day of Hilary term, the defendant obtained a rule absolute for judgment as in case of a nonsuit. On application to set the rule aside,—Held, that a peremptory undertaking to try is not an engagement to try at all events: a bonâ fide attempt to fulfil the undertaking is a compliance therewith.

On the 19th of November 1847, the defendant obtained a rule nisi for judgment in this cause as in case of a nonsuit, which was discharged on the 24th of November 1847, upon the plaintiff's giving a peremptory undertaking to try, at the adjourned sittings after Michaelmas term, 1847, pursuant to the notice of trial that had been then given by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, on the 23rd of November, gave notice of trial for the adjourned sittings for London after Michaelmas term, and entered the record for trial at those sittings on the 2nd of December (the last day for entering causes being the 7th of December). The Court did not arrive at the cause in the course of business; and on the 17th of January 1848, the defendant obtained a rule for judgment as in case of a nonsuit (which is absolute in the first instance).

On the 19th of January,

Bramwell obtained a rule nisi to discharge the rule of the 17th of January, obtained by the defendant, and to enlarge the plaintiff's peremptory undertaking.

Charnock (Jan. 29,) shewed cause.—The defendant was regular in his application on the 17th of January; the plaintiff ought to have asked the Court to enlarge the peremptory undertaking within the first four days of the term. A peremptory undertaking, as the name imports, is an undertaking to try at all events—Ward v. Turner (1). The judgment of this Court, in Petrie v. Cullen (2), wherein the statute 14 Geo. 2. c. 6. s. 1. and the terms of the peremptory undertaking were very fully considered, is a direct authority for the course pursued by this defendant. Lumley v. Dubourg (3) is not consistent with the decision in Petrie v. Cullen; and in Rogers v. Vandercom (4) the Bail Court adopted the construction of the statute given by this Court.

Bramwell, in support of the rule.—In Rogers v. Vandercom the question turned upon the absence of a material witness; the delay here complained of was the act of the Court. Lumley v. Dubourg is to be supported rather than the decision of this Court in Petrie v. Cullen.

[MAULE, J.—I perceive that in giving judgment in Lumley v. Dubourg the words of the statute are chiefly referred to; the terms of the peremptory undertaking itself were not much considered.]

In Petrie v. Cullen the terms of the statute were not much considered, and the form of the peremptory undertaking seems there to have had undue weight on the mind of the Court. It is submitted that looking at the statute and the terms of the undertaking, the true meaning is this: the plaintiff is to take all necessary steps to try at the sittings named in the undertaking; and if the cause is not reached at those sittings, then he is to try as soon after as possible. If the Court does not arrive at the cause, there is no default or neglect on the part of the plaintiff; if his witnesses are ill, or he omits to take a step he ought to have done, either of such matters might be considered within his controul to such an extent as to oblige him to apply to the Court to enlarge his undertaking.

[MAULE, J.—The Courts always grant a rule on affidavits that the party giving the peremptory undertaking did not proceed to trial.]

Yes; but here the plaintiff has proceeded as far as he could; therefore it is not true to say the plaintiff did not proceed to trial.

(4) 5 Dowl. & L. P.C. 104; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 313.

Those words mean the plaintiff is to do everything he can to proceed towards the trial of the cause.

[WILLIAMS, J.—In Tidd's Practical Forms, p. 266, the affidavit for judgment states "that the plaintiff peremptorily undertook to bring on the said cause to be tried," &c. "and that the plaintiff hath not proceeded to the trial of the said issue in pursuance of his said undertaking"; therefore, according to Tidd, it seems, "to proceed" means the same thing as "to bring on."]

It is submitted that the use of different words rather shews that a different meaning is to be attributed to them. The intention of discharging the rule for judgment on a peremptory undertaking is to give the plaintiff further time to try the cause; but no further time is in truth given if it be coupled with a condition impossible to be performed. It was here impossible to try, as the cause was not reached in its order; and therefore this rule should be made absolute.

The judgment of the Court was now (May 12) delivered by—

CRESWELL, J.—This is a case respecting the practice of the Court in cases where rules for judgment as in case of nonsuit have been discharged on peremptory undertakings. In this case, in Michaelmas term last, a rule for judgment as in case of a nonsuit was discharged on a peremptory undertaking to proceed to the trial of the cause at the adjourned sittings after that term. It appears that the plaintiff duly entered his cause, and did what he could, bond fide, to proceed to trial at the time fixed, but in the course of business the Court did not arrive at that cause. In the first five days of Hilary term the defendant came and moved for a rule for judgment as in the case of a nonsuit, in the ordinary way, for not proceeding to trial pursuant to a peremptory undertaking, which, of course, is absolute in the first instance. Afterwards, application was made to set that judgment aside as irregular. The application to set it aside was founded upon a case of Lumley v. Dubourg: the application was resisted on the authority of the case in this court of Petrie v. Cullen. It appeared in that case that the party had given a peremptory undertaking to go to trial, and according to the opinion of the late Lord Chief Justice, upon the facts of the case appearing upon affidavit, had not made a bonâ fide attempt to fulfil that undertaking, and therefore it was held, that the party was entitled to a rule absolute for judgment as in case of a nonsuit. My Brother Maule went further in that case, and expressed an opinion that when a party undertakes to go to trial at a particular time, it is an absolute undertaking, and he is responsible if he is not able to perform it, and can only protect himself against a rule absolute for judgment as in case of a nonsuit by coming to enlarge his peremptory undertaking. The case in the Exchequer was after that decision; and after communicating with the late Lord Chief Justice of this Court, the Court of Exchequer came to the determination that it was not necessary for the party to enlarge his peremptory undertaking, that he had done enough if he had set the case down for trial, bonâ fide attempting to bring it on for trial. We have therefore communicated with the Judges in the other courts, in order that there might be uniformity of practice in this particular, and we all think the case of Lumley v. Dubourg should be adhered to, that the rule there laid down will be the proper rule in similar cases for the future, and the rule in the present instance for setting aside the judgment will, therefore, be absolute; but inasmuch as the parties proceeded in conformity with what they had grounds for thinking was the decision of this Court, we think the rule should be absolute without costs.

Gaming—8 & 9 Vict. c. 109.—Foot-race.

Since the passing of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. a foot-race is a lawful exercise.

Two persons deposited 10l. each with a stakeholder, to abide the event of a foot-race to be run between them:—Held, that the money deposited was "a subscription" for a sum of money to be awarded to the winner of "a lawful game," within the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. s. 18.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in 10l. for money had and received, to the use of the plaintiff, and in 10l. on an account stated.

The cause was tried, on the 29th of June 1847, before the assessor of the sheriff of Yorkshire, when it appeared that the plaintiff and one Askey agreed to run a foot-race for 20l., and each of them deposited 10l. with the defendant to abide the event. The race was run, and Askey was declared the winner. The decision was disputed, and the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant not to pay over the stakes to Askey, and demanded back his own deposit, who, notwithstanding such demand, paid over the money to Askey. A verdict was found for the plaintiff for 10l., leave being reserved for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. A rule accordingly had been obtained on the ground that as the money was deposited with the defendant to abide the event of a legal game, the contract was a legal contract, and within the proviso of the 18th clause of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 (1).

Ogle now shewed cause.—The plaintiff claimed his stake before the defendant paid it over, and he is therefore entitled to recover it back. It is not contended that the plaintiff is entitled as a winner, but on the ground that as the wager was illegal, the contract can be repudiated at any time before the money is paid over. A foot-race is an illegal game by the combined operation of the statutes 16 Car. 2. c. 74. s. 2. and the 9 Anne, c. 14. ss. 1, 2. Goodburn v. Marley (2) and Lynall v. Longbottom (3) decide that a foot-race for more than 10*l.* is an illegal game. Hastelow v. Jackson (4) shews that money deposited with a stakeholder to abide the event of an illegal game can be recovered at any time before the stakes have been paid over, whether the event has been decided or not. Such was the law before the recent statute, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. It is contended on the other side, that the 15th section of that act repeals the statute of Anne, and that the race was a legal game, protected by the proviso at the end of the 18th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. But the statute of Anne, so far as it prohibits unlawful gaming, is not repealed by the 15th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, by which only so much of an act passed in the ninth year of the reign of Queen Anne, intitled, &c. as was not altered by the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 9. shall be repealed. That enactment does not annihilate the 1st and 2nd sections of the 9 Anne, c. 14, but repeals only the 5th section of that statute. Then, as the proviso at the end of the 18th clause of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. excepts only lawful games from the operation of the former part of the section, and the 2nd section of the 9 Anne, c. 14, which allows an action to be brought for money lost at gaming, is still in force, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

(1) Which enacts "that all contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity, for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made: Provided always, that this enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute for or towards any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise."

Hugh Hill, in support of the rule.—The race was a legal game, protected by the proviso of the 18th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. Askey was declared the winner, and the defendant performed his duty by paying over the stakes to him. A foot-race is not illegal by the common law, nor is it illegal by statute. It never was by any statute by itself illegal, and is only mentioned by name in the 2nd section of 16 Car. 2. c. 7, which prohibits the recovery of money won at a foot-race by cheating. The 2nd section of the 9 Anne, c. 14. makes a foot-race or any other game illegal, if any person concerned in it loses the sum of 10*l.*, and so a cricket match for 20*l.* a side was held illegal—Hodson v. Terrill (5). The 1st section of the same statute makes all notes, bills, and other securities given for money lost at play absolutely void; that is partially repealed by 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 41. s. 1, which enacts that the notes, bills, and securities mentioned in the statute of Anne are not to be deemed void, but shall be taken as having been given or executed for an illegal consideration, whilst by section 2. of the statute of Will. 4. money paid on account of such bills, &c. may be recovered from parties to whom such bills were originally given. Then comes the late statute, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, the 15th section of which repeals the stat. 16 Car. 2. c. 7. and the whole of the stat. of Anne, except such part of it as is maintained in its altered state by the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 41. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. contemplates two objects: the first, is to restrain and put an end to improper gaming; the second, to encourage all games of skill, and to allow bets on them; and those objects are attained by the 18th section of the statute. Parties are not restrained by that statute from playing at illegal games, but are restrained from betting, and from recovering money won upon any such games. The sole question here is, is this contract within the proviso at the end of the 18th section? That proviso means that whenever the money subscribed is to be paid to the winner of a lawful game, the contract is legal.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Suppose a cricket match where there are eleven persons on each side, and one on each side were to agree to pay the other 100*l.* on the event.]

Possibly such a contract would not be protected, as the money could scarcely be said to be subscribed to be paid to the winner or winners within the words of the proviso. If ten persons were to subscribe a sum of money to be paid to the winner of a foot-race, such a contract would be perfectly legal. It can make no difference if two only subscribe instead of ten, and it is equally within the proviso though the parties contesting the race are the parties who subscribe the money to be paid to the winner. The distinction between the cases where the money is to be paid to the winner of the race or to the winner of a wager is recognized in Clayton v. Jennings (6), Écran

v. Pratt (7), Challand v. Bray (8). In Applegarth v. Colley (9) the money subscribed was under 10*l.*, and therefore could not be recovered. Emery v. Richards (10) decides that a foot-race for a sum under 10*l.* is perfectly legal. The words of the proviso in the 18th section are sufficient to protect all cases, where the money subscribed or agreed to be subscribed is to be paid to the winner of the race. The decision in Bentinck v. Connop (11) turned upon the fact of the wagering being on ticket or credit, and that was one of the chief reasons which gave rise to the statute of Victoria.

Probably the second horse not being a winner the owner could not recover anything.

[WILDE, C.J.—Why is he not a winner as well as the first, according to the rules of the race?]

[COLTMAN, J.—Suppose the party, instead of paying the money, gave a promissory note for the amount of the stakes, could the winner of the race recover upon it, regard being had to the statute of Anne?]

Probably that statute is not so far repealed, and the winner could not recover upon the note so received by him.

WILDE, C.J.—Considering the subject-matter of this act, under which many cases of complication and difficulty must arise, the only rule which can be adopted in its construction appears to be this—what are the plain words of the statute? If a case seems to be brought within the provisions of any particular part of the statute, and there is nothing in the act repugnant to the operation of the words contended for in the particular case, I am satisfied with giving effect to those words in each case as it arises before us. In this case the first question to be decided is—is a foot-race a lawful game? The statute of Anne which made it unlawful is repealed so far as regards that question, though it may be that act is still in force so far as it renders of no value certain securities given by way of gaming. The next question is—what is the effect of the 18th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. controuled as that section is by the proviso at its conclusion? It seems under that proviso that if ten or twelve persons subscribed to a fund, which fund was to be awarded to the winner or winners of a lawful game, such winner might recover the money. In this case there are only two persons who have subscribed to a fund, which is to be paid over to the winner of a race, and the two parties subscribing are the parties engaged in the race. As the race is not an illegal game, and the money subscribed is confined to these two parties, a question arises, whether that is not in effect a wager, and therefore within the enactment of the 18th section, which enacts that no suit shall be maintained in any court for any sum of money alleged to be won upon any wager. There is an apparent difficulty in saying that the case upon this state of facts does not come within the mischief, and is not the sort of gaming, intended to be prohibited by the 18th section of the act, and in holding (as the money is to be paid to the winner of a lawful game) that the proviso at the end takes the case out of the operation of the first part of the section. At the same time, in construing this act of parliament, one must consider the circumstances which were passing in the world at the time the act passed, the position of the members of the legislature who passed it, and the kind of gaming it was particularly intended to except from the operation of the act. Many of those members engaged in the sport of horse-racing, a great part of which consists in running match races, where one person runs his horse against the horse of another for a sum of money deposited by each party, the whole of which sum the owner of the winning horse is entitled to receive. Clearly such matches were not intended to be prohibited by this act of parliament, and are within the direct terms of this proviso. In what respect does the present differ from a match race? The proviso is confined to the protection of subscriptions where the whole sum subscribed is to be awarded to the winner of a lawful game; and it seems to me that this subscription is lawful, the foot-race a lawful game, and the case directly protected by the proviso. As, therefore, the plaintiff has subscribed his money on a legal contract, he is not at liberty to rescind such contract at any time he pleases. That money is to be awarded to the winner of a legal race, and if a proper tribunal had not been specially pointed out to decide who is the winner, the law must have decided it. The plaintiff says, "I can withdraw from the contract at any time,"—the answer is, "The contract is legal and you cannot." This would be the case even if the event was not decided, but here it has been decided; and if there be any distinction in the two cases, that distinction is against the present plaintiff. I am of opinion that a nonsuit must be entered.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. A foot-race is a lawful game at common law, and if it were made unlawful by the statutes of Charles and Anne, those statutes are now so far repealed. It does not materially affect the present case, but it seems a strange anomaly that a party entitled as the winner of stakes subscribed to abide the event of a legal game may recover the money in an action, whilst by the joint operation of the statutes 9 Anne, c. 14. and 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 41. such winner could not recover on a promissory note given for the amount of the money, because the consideration for that security is illegal. This case falls within the distinct terms of the enactment of the 18th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, as the circumstances of it may fairly be called a wager, and would therefore be null and void but for the proviso at the end of that section. That proviso is clearly intended to except from the operation of the clause, and to protect some contracts by way of gaming which would otherwise have been affected by it. The number of contributors is not limited by the proviso, nor does it say whether the parties subscribing are to be engaged in the game or not. If forty or fifty persons were to subscribe to a sweepstakes, and the whole of the sum so subscribed were to be paid to the winner of the race, such a subscription was in the contemplation of the parties who framed the proviso; and it does not seem to me that the case is different when only two parties make the subscription, and the same two parties are engaged in the race, if the sum subscribed is to be paid over to whichever shall be declared the winner. It is true that this case is very like a wager, and probably one not intended to be legalized, and I cannot help being staggered at the extent to which this decision appears to authorize gambling. We must, however, interpret the words of this statute according to their plain meaning; and if the act of the legislature causes inconvenience, by the legislature it must be remedied.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case rests upon the common law and the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. By the common law a foot-race is a legal game, and the statutes of 16 Car. 2. c. 7. and 9 Anne, c. 14. are repealed so far as they apply to this part of the case. The 18th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. is the only clause which we need here consider, and that contains a proviso which protects some things which would otherwise be prohibited by the former part of the section; some things which might fairly be taken as included in the clause or the proviso would have been altogether nugatory. It appears to me to protect cases such as where parties engaged in a lawful game or sport subscribe together certain sums, the whole of which is to be paid over to the party who proves the winner in such game or sport. It is to be observed, that there is in the act no limit whatever to the number of persons who may subscribe, and it is only by implication that you can limit the number at all. First, suppose only two persons subscribe, still that is a subscription, and if the object be that the winner of a lawful game is to receive the sum subscribed by them, that would be protected by the proviso. Suppose the money here subscribed were laid out in the purchase of a cup, this would then have been a subscription towards a plate or prize, and the party who was the winner would be entitled to have the cup awarded to him; but the words "sum or sums of money" are expressed in the proviso, and the winner is therefore equally entitled to that also. The race being a lawful game, and the sum of money subscribed being to be paid to the winner of it, I am of opinion that the transaction is within the proviso, and the contract is a legal contract which the plaintiff could not set aside. The rule, therefore, to enter a nonsuit must be made absolute.

WILLIAMS, J.—The rule must be made absolute. The money demanded in this action is sought to be recovered on account of the illegality of the contract entered into by the plaintiff. Whether it be legal or illegal depends upon the 18th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. I agree that the statutes of Charles and Anne in so far as they might have affected the legality of a foot-race are repealed, and then we must consider, first, is a foot-race a lawful sport or exercise? I am of opinion that it is. Next, is the money sought to be recovered subscribed in order to be paid over to the winner? There can be no doubt that it is. This transaction, therefore, is within the proviso at the end of the 18th section. The contract into which the plaintiff entered being therefore a legal contract, he is not at liberty to repudiate it, and at the trial he should have been nonsuited.

Rule absolute to enter a nonsuit.

April 17, 19. } SMITH v. DEARLOVE.

Lien—Innkeeper—Trover.

An innkeeper received the carriage and horses of a person not residing at his inn. Whilst they were in his possession the owner took refreshments occasionally at the inn, and a friend of his resided there for some time at the owner's credit, and by his direction:—Held, that the innkeeper had no lien upon the carriage, &c. for the amount of his bill, which included charges for the keep of the horses, the standing of the carriage, and refreshments for the owner and his friend.

Trover for a carriage and harness.

Pleas, first, not guilty; second, that the plaintiff was not possessed, &c. Issues on both pleas.

The case was tried, before Alderson, B., at the last assizes for Yorkshire, when it appeared that the defendant was the landlord of the Queen's Hotel, Harrogate. In September 1847 the plaintiff sent his carriage and horses to the defendant's hotel. He occasionally called and had refreshment there, and for some days in the months of October and November a friend of the plaintiff's resided at the hotel on the credit and by the direction of the plaintiff. The plaintiff took away the horses, and on the 11th of December 1847 demanded the carriage and harness, which the defendant refused to deliver until his bill was paid for the food supplied to the horses, for the standing of the carriage, and for the refreshment and maintenance of the plaintiff and his friend. These facts having been proved, the defendant's counsel submitted that the plaintiff should be nonsuited, on the ground that as there was a bill due to the defendant in respect of which no tender had been made he was entitled to a lien upon the carriage and harness at any rate for some amount, and was therefore justified in retaining possession.

The learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

Baines (April 17,) moved accordingly.—If the defendant can establish a lien for any portion of his bill the plaintiff should have been nonsuited; and it is submitted that it is clear that, at all events, the charge for the standing and care bestowed upon the carriage should have been paid before it was removed. The right of the defendant to his lien depends upon the character of the plaintiff when the debt accrued. If he was (in contemplation of law) a guest at the hotel when the debt, or any part of it, was incurred, then for the debt, or such portion of it as was incurred as a guest, the defendant's right to a lien arises. To become a guest it is not necessary that the party should lodge at the inn. "If a man set his horse at an inn, though he lodge in another place, that makes him a guest"—Yorke v. Grenaugh (1). This case is much stronger, for here the defendant had refreshments for himself as well as keep, &c. for his horses. Bennett v. Mellor (2) shews, that a person who goes to an inn for casual refreshment is in contemplation of law a guest. The fact of the plaintiff's friend living entirely at the hotel on the plaintiff's credit, and by his directions, is the same thing as if he had lived there himself; and if that be so the plaintiff was a guest.

[WILLIAMS, J.—The principle of lien is this: an innkeeper is bound to receive a traveller and his goods, and may therefore retain the goods for his indemnity. Was the defendant in this case bound to receive the plaintiff's friend, and could he thus gain a lien upon the plaintiff's goods?]

[WILDE, C.J.—It may be that the defendant received the carriage and horses, in the first instance, to stand at livery, and if so no lien attaches (3). Would it attach if the plaintiff afterwards became a guest?]

The judgment of the Court was now (April 19) delivered by—

WILDE, C.J.—This was an action of trover to recover damages for the unlawful conversion of a carriage and harness. The ground upon which the rule was moved was, that the legal result of the evidence at the trial established a right of lien in the defendant in his character of innkeeper, in respect of a debt incurred by the plaintiff for two horses, and the standing of a carriage, and for a tavern bill for refreshments supplied to the plaintiff and his friend, or to one of them. Upon consulting my Brother Alderson, before whom the cause was tried, we find the facts proved were that the carriage and harness were not received by the defendant in his character of innkeeper and as belonging to any guest residing at his inn; that the plaintiff did not become a guest at the inn, nor was any refreshment supplied to him till after the reception of the carriage; and that the refreshment so supplied was irrespective of the contract on which credit was had in the first instance. It likewise appeared that the friend who was entertained at the inn on the plaintiff's credit also became a guest after the reception of the carriage, and upon a different contract. The right of lien depends upon the fact that the articles detained came into the defendant's possession in the character of innkeeper as belonging to a guest at his inn. It was here proved that the articles were received wholly irrespective of the character of innkeeper, and we think there is no ground for disturbing the verdict.

Practice—Special Case—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 25.

The Court refused to give judgment in a special case stated for the opinion of the Court, under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 25, it appearing that the action was not bona fide brought to try a question really in contest between the parties to the cause.

This was an action of ejectment, which, by consent and by order of a Judge, under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 25, had been turned into a special case. The question raised thereby for the opinion of the Court was, whether an estate, of which A. B. was mortgagee in fee, had passed by his will. The lessor of the plaintiff was the heir-at-law of A. B., and it was contended, by his counsel, that the estate did pass by the will. The declaration contained no demise by the devisee under the will, nor did it appear from the special case in what way the defendant was interested in the question stated for the opinion of the Court.

The case was argued on the 3rd of May by—

Henderson, for the lessor of the plaintiff, and—

Greenwood, for the defendant.

During the argument the Court intimated their suspicion that the action had not been brought to determine a matter really in dispute between the parties, inasmuch as it did not appear how or by what claim the defendant was in possession of the premises, and the declaration contained no count on a demise by the devisee of A. B., who would be the party really entitled to the property, if the argument for the lessor of the plaintiff were correct. The Court stated that before giving judgment they should require an affidavit satisfying them that the action was brought really to try a disputed right of possession to the premises.

An affidavit was subsequently furnished to the Court; and now (May 12)—

WILDE, C.J. said—In this case we have read the affidavit, and it confirms the impression the Court had on reading the case and hearing the argument. Some doubt is entertained as to the construction of the will, and without any real contest, or without any view of recovering the possession, an ejectment has been brought, merely for the purpose of making it the foundation of a case whereon to ask the opinion of the Court. The affidavit satisfies us that this is merely a mode of asking the Court to give an opinion upon a matter not in dispute in the cause, but upon which the parties desire information. If the Court could entertain the question as it is now brought before it, every doubt upon a marriage settlement, and every doubt upon the construction of a will, might be brought before us (long before any question arose, and probably when no question ever would arise), by merely adopting the machinery of an action of ejectment, and by agreement. We therefore do not think ourselves authorized (with a view to the general interests of the suitors of the Court, and that the time of the Court may not be occupied on such speculative questions) to proceed to any judgment. The action is not really brought to try a right. There is no statement that it is brought with a view of recovering possession of the premises. The inference from the facts appears to be, that the defendant on the record has been put into possession for the purpose of making him tenant upon whom to found the ejectment.

It is not sufficient to shew that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the court.*

Debt for goods sold and delivered.

At the trial, before the sheriff of Middlesex, the plaintiff had a verdict for 16*l.*

Judgment having been signed, and execution issued for the debt and costs,—

Byles, Serj. (April 17) obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment and execution should not be set aside for irregularity, and why the judgment should not be entered up for the debt only, without costs, or why the defendant should not be at liberty to enter a suggestion on the record to deprive the plaintiff of costs. The affidavit on which the rule was obtained stated, that the plaintiff was a butcher, carrying on business in the city of London, within twenty miles of the place where the defendant lives and carries on his business; that the defendant resides and carries on his business in High Street, in the parish of Marylebone, in the county of Middlesex, and that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the county court of Middlesex.

Gaselee, Serj. shewed cause.—The affidavit is defective in two respects. First, it does not shew that the defendant resided and carried on his business within the jurisdiction of the Middlesex county court, “at the time of the action brought.” This ought to be distinctly shewn—Thorne v. Jackson (1). It is consistent with this affidavit that he may have come to live there after the action was brought. The plaintiff, therefore, may have been entitled to sue in the superior court, the case being within the second exception of the 128th section of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. Secondly, for aught that appears on the affidavit, the defendant may be an officer of the Middlesex county court, and therefore within the third exception in the same section (2).

Byles, Serj. contra.—The defendant has brought the case within the 60th section, which enacts, that where the sum claimed is not more than 20*l.*, the summons may issue—first, in any district in which the defendant shall dwell or carry on business at the time of action brought; or, secondly, by leave of the Court, in the district in which the defendant shall have dwelt or carried on his business at some time within six months next before the time of the action brought; or, thirdly, in the district in which the cause of action arose. The case is within the third branch of this section. The affidavit here shews that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the county court of Middlesex.

[CRESSWELL, J.—The 60th section is in the alternative. The latter part of it only gives power to issue the summons, in the cases there mentioned, "by leave of the Court." And the reason is, because, in the two cases mentioned in the latter part of the section, the party is not within the jurisdiction of the Court at the time.]

WILDE, C.J.—In order to deprive the plaintiff of costs, you must certainly shew that the defendant resided or carried on his business within the jurisdiction of the Court at the time of action brought. The plaintiff would not be bound to apply to the court of the district in which the cause of action arose for leave to issue summons there. The affidavit does not negative the exceptions of the 128th section.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained, calling on Mr. Isaac Aflalo to shew cause why final judgment should not be signed and entered up, for Messrs. Lowless & Son, against him, for the sum of 834l., the amount of the Master's allocatur, or for the sum of 88l. 2s. 6d., a portion of the same, or why Aflalo should not pay to Lowless & Son the said sum of 834l., or 88l. 2s. 6d., or why an order of Tindal, C.J., dated August 2, 1845, and the rule thereon made, should not respectively be amended.

It appeared from the affidavits in support of the application, that Lowless & Son had been employed by Aflalo, as his attorneys, to conduct the defence of the action of Phillips v. Aflalo (1), and also as his solicitors in a Chancery suit, Mantzqui v. the St. Katherine Dock Company, in which Mantzqui was the nominal plaintiff only, on behalf and for the benefit of Aflalo. Upon the 25th of June 1845, Cresswell, J., on the application of Aflalo, made an order, at chambers, that Lowless & Son should, within a fortnight, deliver to Hill & Matthews (who had then become the attorneys of Aflalo,) a bill of costs in Phillips v. Aflalo, and in all other causes and matters wherein they had been concerned for Aflalo. A similar order was made on the same day, also on the application of Aflalo, in the suit of Mantzqui v. the St. Katherine Dock Company. Lowless & Son delivered their bill of costs, accordingly, to Hill & Matthews, including therein their charges in Mantzqui v. the St. Katherine Dock Company. On the 2nd of August 1845, Hill & Matthews, as attorneys for Aflalo, applied for, and obtained, an order for referring the said bill to taxation. The order was as follows:—

"In the matter of Lowless & Son.—Phillips v. Aflalo. Upon hearing, &c., and by consent, I do order that the bill of costs delivered by Messrs. Lowless & Son, &c., be referred to the Master, to be taxed, without prejudice to the defendant disputing the retainer; that the Master tax the costs of such reference, and certify what may, upon such reference, be found due to or from either party in respect of such bill and demand, and the costs of such reference, to be paid according to the event of such taxation, according to the statute; and that Messrs. Lowless & Son be restrained from commencing or prosecuting any action or suit touching their demand pending such reference. N. C. Tindal."

This order, it will be seen, contained no clause directing the defendant to pay what might be found due on such taxation, nor any undertaking by him so to do. On the reference before the Master, the defendant disputed the retainer of Messrs. Lowless & Son as to a part of the proceedings at law; but, after hearing both parties, the Master decided that the retainer was made out to his satisfaction. The Master then, at the instance of the defendant's attornies, and with the consent of Lowless & Son, referred it to one of the Masters in Chancery to tax the costs of the proceedings in Chancery, and also "to settle the point of retainer as to the Chancery costs." The Master in Chancery commenced the taxation of the Chancery costs, "without prejudice to the question of retainer;" and, subsequently, after a lengthened inquiry into the question of retainer, which was attended by counsel on both sides, decided that the retainer was made out, and certified accordingly. Upon the receipt of this certificate, the Master in the Common Pleas proceeded to complete the taxation, and finally made his allocatur as follows:—

Bill of costs . . . .	£1,319	4	5
Deducted on taxation . . . .	177	14	5
	£1,141	10	0

The order of the 2nd of August 1845 had been made a rule of court, and payment of the amount of the allocatur demanded and refused by Aflalo. The affidavits in opposition to the rule alleged that Aflalo had never abandoned his right to dispute the retainer of Lowless & Son, and was still desirous of disputing it.

Channell, Serj., S. Miller, and Huddleston shewed cause (May 11).—This is an application under the 43rd section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, which enacts that, "upon the taxation and settlement of any such bill (i. e. bills referred to taxation under the 37th section), the certificate of the officer by whom such bill shall be taxed shall (unless set aside, or altered by order, decree, or rule of court) be final and conclusive as to the amount thereof; and payment of the amount certified to be due and directed to be paid may be enforced according to the course of the court in which such reference shall be made; and in case such reference shall be made in any court of common law, it shall be lawful for such Court or any Judge thereof to order judgment to be entered up for such amount, with costs, unless the retainer shall be disputed, or to make such other order thereon, as such Court or Judge shall deem proper." This application is to the discretion of the Court and in restraint of the defendant's right to have the matter investigated and decided by a jury. The applicants must shew the jurisdiction of the Court. In order to do this, they must first shew that there has been an order directing the payment of costs, an undertaking to pay them when taxed, a taxation, a certificate, and that the retainer is not disputed. Now here the order of the 2nd of August 1845 contains no order to pay what shall be found due, nor any undertaking to pay by the defendant; it expressly reserves the right to dispute the retainer, and, up to the present moment, the retainer is disputed. The words of the section are not "unless the retainer shall have been disputed"; but "unless the retainer shall be disputed," i. e., at the time this application is made. The decision of the Master was binding only as to the quantum of costs; and does not disentitle the defendant to have the question of retainer decided by a jury. The reference to the Master was conditional only, and, in the absence of any consent by the defendant, is no waiver of his right to call for proof of his liability. Is he to be estopped from setting up that as to a part of the costs Messrs. Lowless & Son may have been guilty of negligence (a question which the Master had no power to entertain—Matchett v. Parkes (2),—and as to another part that they may have agreed to charge nothing unless the defendant succeeded in the action?

[COLTMAN, J.—The 43rd section authorizes the Court to order judgment to be entered up unless the retainer be disputed. In the ordinary case, therefore, where there has been a reference to the Master, and the retainer has not been disputed, the party is prevented from setting up negligence as a defence.]

Because, in such case, the party applying to have the bill taxed consents to pay what shall be found due upon taxation.

[CRESSWELL, J.—No. The Master reports that no such consent is now given or necessary, the Court having the power to make the order without it.]

Formerly, the consent to pay used to be written in the Judge's book, at the Judge's chambers; and, in some way or other, there must be, whether incorporated in the order or not, a valid undertaking, which, in the words of the 43rd section, "may be enforced according to the course of the court in which such reference shall be made." Could the Court, according to the former practice, have enforced payment by attachment, unless there had been some undertaking to pay?

[WILDE, C.J.—An attachment does not issue except for disobedience to an order of Court to do something or to pay something; but, though the order may have been made in invitum, an attachment would issue for non-compliance with its terms.]

Then the objection arises, that the order of the 2nd of August 1845 does not order the defendant to pay anything. Though the amount is "certified to be due" by the Master, it is not "directed to be paid" either by him or by the order; and, even assuming the 43rd section to give a cumulative remedy, and to authorize the Court to order judgment to be entered up as well as to issue an attachment, it is to be "entered up for such amount," i. e. for such amount as shall not only be certified to be due, but also directed to be paid. But it is submitted, that no attachment could issue here. "The whole essence of the thing is the party's undertaking"—per Erle, J., In re Woodhouse (3), Evans v. Taylor (4), Jones v. Roberts (5). As to the application to amend the order in this respect, it was taken by consent of Lowless & Son in its present terms, and cannot now be amended.

[CRESSWELL, J.—I cannot find that the affidavits anywhere deny the retainer; and even if they did, how can you be at liberty now to dispute that which has been conclusively decided by the tribunal to which you agreed to refer it? Nor do I find that the affidavits anywhere allege negligence.]

[WILDE, C.J.—As to the defence of negligence, the order is by consent, subject to a particular exception as to the retainer. Surely that is an admission of liability, except so far as the liability is denied. If you wished any other exception, it should have been so stated in the order you yourselves obtained.]

Byles, Sery., Hoggins and Hodges, contra, relied upon the affidavits in support of the application. As to the objection that the order of the 2nd of August 1845 contained no direction by the Court to pay, they contended that the words "such amount," in the latter part of the 43rd section, mean the amount certified by the Master to be due and directed to be paid, where by consent the Master has authority so to direct; that the Master had that authority by consent in this case, and that the form of the allocatur shewed that he had properly exercised such authority.

The judgment of the Court was delivered on the following day (May 12,) by—

WILDE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the terms of the Judge's order in this case, and the allocatur of the Master in pursuance thereof, authorize the Court in their discretion to order judgment to be entered up under the 43rd section of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 78. for the amount of the allocatur, unless the retainer is disputed. We are further of opinion that the alleged client Afako cannot be allowed to contend now that the retainer is disputed, inasmuch as the question of the retainer has been conclusively settled by the decision of the taxing Master, to whose award, in fact, both parties submitted the dispute. The only remaining question is, whether any matter has been shewn which ought to induce the Court in the exercise of their discretion to decline making the order. It is said that the client here has a good answer to the claim of the attornies, by reason of their negligence in the conduct of the business, in respect of which the claim is made, and that he ought to be allowed to submit that defence to a jury; but we can find nothing in the affidavits which afford any real ground for this, nor any other ground on which we think we ought to decline to make the order for the judgment, or to induce us to make any other order under the concluding part of the 43rd section of the act. The rule must, therefore, be made absolute to enter up judgment for the amount of the Master's allocatur.

Waste Lands — Highway — Ownership, Presumption of.

Though it is the presumption of law that a strip of waste land lying between an old inclosure and a highway belongs to the owner of the old inclosure, yet that presumption may be rebutted by shewing that there is other land also adjoining the strip, to which it may have formerly belonged.

This was an action of ejectment brought by the lessor of the plaintiff, the rector of Thorn Falcon, in Somersetshire, to recover possession of a small slip of land, and a cottage upon it, adjoining the turnpike road leading from Hatch Beauchamp to Taunton.

The cause was tried at the Somersetshire Lent Assizes in 1846, before Erle, J., when it appeared that the piece of land in question about forty-five years ago lay waste and uninclosed, in which state it had always before remained. The land adjoining the piece of land in question on the south, on the same side of the road, which bounded it on the north, and also the land on the opposite side of the road, was then and has always continued to be glebe land belonging to the rectory of Thorn Falcon. About that period, (forty-five years ago,) the piece of land in question was taken possession of by a person, named Dyer, who built a cottage upon it, and about forty years ago it was inclosed by another person, named Hurcott. The defendant was not his immediate successor, but he obtained possession of it thirty-seven years before the trial, and had continued in possession ever since. It was proved on cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, that when the inclosure of the piece of land in question was first made, a small strip of land adjoining to and lying to the westward of it had been previously inclosed; but neither the time when such inclosure was made nor who made it was proved. A like slip lying to the eastward of the piece of land in question and adjoining it, had been also inclosed, but by whom or the precise period when did not appear. During the forty years there had been five incumbents of the parish. No evidence was given of any title or claim under the lord of the manor or any other person. The plaintiff contended, under these circumstances, that he was entitled to recover, as the presumption of law was, that a slip of land, like this, lying between a high road and inclosed land, belonged to the owner of the inclosed land, and no evidence had been produced to rebut it. His Lordship, however, directed the jury, that though it was a presumption of law that a slip of land between an inclosure and a highway belonged to the owner of the inclosed land, yet that this presumption was capable of being rebutted, and that if they thought the circumstances of the case rebutted such presumption, they might find a verdict for the defendant. The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Channell, Serj. in the following term obtained a rule to shew cause why there should not be a new trial, upon the ground of misdirection; against which—

Dowling, Serj. (M. Smith with him) shewed cause (in Trinity term, 1846).—He contended, that the fact of the defendant, and those through whom he claimed, having been in possession of the land in question thirty-seven years and the circumstance of the numerous changes in the incumbency were sufficient to rebut the legal presumption arising from the position of the land, and referred to the following authorities—Doe d. Pring v. Pearsey (1), Grose v. West (2), Doe d. Barrett v.

(1) 7 B. & C. 304; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. K.B. 310.

(2) 7 Taunt. 39.

Kemp (3), Steel v. Prickett (4), Headlam v. Hedley (5), and The King v. the Inhabitants of Hatfield (6).

Channell, Serj. (Fitzherbert with him), in support of the rule, relied on the stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. ss. 2, 28, 29, the latter of which sections gives to ecclesiastical corporations sole a period of two incumbencies and six years, or of sixty years, for the recovery of lands—and contended, that the fact of the land in question having been an uninclosed strip between the glebe and the road from the earliest time down to thirty-seven years ago, made out a prima facie case that it was glebe land thirty-seven years ago. And if that be conceded, then that to hold that any length of occupation short of sixty years, or any number of changes of incumbencies during the sixty years, could be sufficient to defeat a title once established, would be in effect to repeal that section of the act. He also referred to The King v. Edmonton (7).

MAULE, J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—This case, which was argued some time ago, was an action of ejectment brought by the rector of the parish of Thorn Falcon, otherwise Thorn Parva, in Somersetshire, to recover possession of a small piece of land, with a cottage and out-houses thereon lying by the side of the turnpike-road leading from Hatch Beauchamp to Taunton, which he claimed as part of his glebe. The case was tried, before Mr. Justice Erle, when it appeared in evidence that the lessor of the plaintiff had glebe land lying on each side of the road in question, and the fence of such glebe land was parallel to the road, and a few yards from it. The piece of land sought to be recovered was part of that which was between the fence of the glebe land and the road. On the part of the defendant it was proved, that at the earliest period to which the evidence extended, viz. forty-five years ago, this piece of land lying between the fence of the glebe and the road was open and uninclosed, but at each end of it there was a small piece also lying between the glebe and the road, inclosed, in the occupation of persons who were not shewn to derive title under the incumbent of Thorn Falcon; and no evidence was given of the time when such inclosure was made. Part of the piece of land for which the action was brought was inclosed forty years ago by one Hurcott, who sold it to another person, who increased the size of the inclosure. From this person the defendant bought the inclosure, and he had enjoyed it for thirty-seven years, and during the forty years there have been five rectors of Thorn Falcon. There was no evidence to shew that any of the acts of ownership exercised by the defendant, or those under whom he claimed, were referable to any authority derived from the lord of the manor.

For the plaintiff it was contended that it was the presumption of law that the slip of land lying between the fence of the glebe and the road belonged to the rector as part of his glebe, and that the occupation of it by other persons for forty years gave no title to the occupiers, and consequently did not defeat the title by legal presumption arising from the situation of the land. The learned Judge held that the claim of the lessor of the plaintiff resting on presumption, the evidence adduced by the defendant tended to rebut the presumption, and he left the whole to the jury, who found for the defendant. A rule nisi for a new trial was granted on the ground that there was no evidence for the defendant that ought to have been submitted to the jury, and was argued, in last Trinity term, before the late Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Coltman, Mr. Justice Cresswell and myself. The three surviving Judges who heard the argument have come to the conclusion that the rule must be discharged. It is not necessary to determine what would have been the result if the evidence had shewn that at the earliest period to which it applied there was glebe land inclosed, and a slip of land lying uninclosed between that glebe and the road, without any circumstance then existing which tended to rebut the presumption that the slip belonged to the owner of the inclosed land, for the evidence shewed that at that time there were two pieces of land adjoining the piece in dispute at either end, also lying between the glebe and the road, which were occupied adversely to the rector, which fact was undoubtedly evidence tending to raise a presumption that the land lying between the inclosed glebe and the road was not part of the glebe, and the adverse occupation of the part in question in the cause for forty years was evidence strengthening that presumption. The whole, therefore, rested on presumption on both sides. The lessor of the plaintiff, on the one hand, did not prove title, but merely facts from which a title might be presumed; and the defendant, on the other hand, elicited from the witness called by the lessor of the plaintiff evidence of other facts tending to rebut that presumption. It was, therefore, incumbent on the learned Judge to leave the whole to the jury, and there is no ground for granting a new trial.

Secondly, that the word "thereupon" in the allegation "it thereupon became and was the duty," was not to be understood as shewing that the proposition following the word was a consequence deducible from what preceded it, but only as shewing the time or occasion upon which the proposition was averred to have taken place.

Thirdly, that the allegation in question was an averment of matter of law only, and that there were no sufficient allegations of facts from which such law could be inferred.

Fourthly, that as the declaration did not shew either a continuing possession and controul of the defendant at the time of the collision, nor other special circumstances shewing that he was bound to prevent other vessels being injured, the declaration was insufficient in substance.

Fifthly, that the mere fact of the defendant having the possession and controul of the barge at the time it sank, was not in itself sufficient to render him liable.

Case. The declaration stated, that whereas before the happening of the damage and injury hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 8th day of June, A.D. 1845, a certain barge of the defendant, of which the defendant was then in possession, and then had the care, management, direction and controul of and over the same by his mariners and servants in that behalf, foundered, sank and went to the bottom in a certain navigable river in England, to wit, the river Thames, at and in a certain navigable part and place of and in the said river where no obstruction to the navigation previously existed (the said part of the said river then and from thence hitherto and still being a public highway for all persons to navigate, and pass and repass by and with boats, barges, steamboats, and other vessels at their free will and pleasure, and in and along which divers steamboats and other vessels lawfully might, and were and are used and accustomed daily and at all times of the day to be navigated and pass and repass without obstruction); and the said barge of the said defendant having so sunk as aforesaid, to wit, on &c., the same then lay in the same river in the said navigable part and place of and in the same, under water there, and wholly covered and concealed and out of view, and in such a posi-

Ship and Shipping—Navigable River—Obstruction by a Sunken Vessel—Duty and Liability of Owner—Pleading.

The declaration stated that before the happening of the damage complained of, to wit, on &c., a certain barge of the defendant, and of which he was then in possession and then had the management, sunk in a navigable river in England, the same being a public highway; that it lay concealed under water in such a manner that vessels passing over the place would be in danger of striking against it, of which the defendant had notice; that it thereupon became and was the duty of the defendant while the barge continued so sunk to use due care to prevent the danger to vessels navigating that part, by giving notice by a buoy or otherwise to persons navigating; that the defendant omitted to give such notice, and that a vessel of the plaintiffs was damaged:—Held, first, that the declaration was insufficient for not shewing with sufficient directness any obligation on the defendant to do that which the plaintiffs complained the defendant omitted to do.

tion and at such a depth that vessels in navigating and passing in, along, and over the said place where the said barge so lay sunk as aforesaid would necessarily strike against the same, and thereby while the said barge so continued and was sunk and lying in the said part and place of and in the said river as aforesaid vessels during that time navigating and passing in and along the said part of the said river (without the persons navigating and directing the same having notice of the said sunken barge so lying and being there) would necessarily be and were liable to and in danger, in so navigating and passing, of striking with great force and violence upon and against the said sunken barge, and of being thereby greatly damaged and injured, of all which said premises the said defendant, before the happening of the damage and injury hereinafter mentioned, had notice; and thereupon it became and was the duty of the said defendant, while the said barge so continued and was sunk and lying under water in the said part and place of and in the said river as aforesaid, to take and use due and proper care and precautions to prevent and guard against the said danger to vessels during that time navigating and passing in and along the said part of the river, by giving due notice and warning of the said danger by means of a proper and sufficient buoy, or other proper and sufficient mark or signal or otherwise to persons navigating and directing the said vessels, or by other due and proper means in that behalf. And the plaintiffs further say, that the defendant, well knowing the said premises, suffered and permitted the said barge to be and continue sunk and lying, and the same did continue sunk and lying in the said river, in the said part and place of and in the same under water there, and wholly covered and concealed and out of view, and in such position and at such depth aforesaid, for a long space of time, to wit, from the time of the same so sinking as aforesaid, until and at and after the time of the happening of the said damage and injury as hereinafter mentioned. And the plaintiffs further say, that although a reasonable time after the sinking of the said barge, and after the defendant so had notice of the premises as aforesaid, for him, the said defendant, to cause a proper and sufficient buoy or other proper and sufficient mark or signal to be put and placed in the said river, or other proper means in that behalf used and taken, to give to persons navigating and directing vessels in the said part of the said river notice and warning of the said danger, had elapsed before the happening of the said damage and injury as hereinafter mentioned, nevertheless the said plaintiffs, in fact, say, that the said defendant, well knowing the said premises, but not regarding his duty in that behalf, did not nor would take or use due or proper care or precautions while the said barge so continued sunk and lying at and in the said part and place of and in the said river in such position and at such depth as aforesaid, to prevent and guard against the said danger therefrom to vessels navigating and passing along the said part of the said river, either by giving notice or warning of the said danger by means of a proper and sufficient buoy or other proper and sufficient mark or signal put and placed in the said river for that purpose, or otherwise, or by any other due or proper means in that behalf whatsoever, but wholly omitted and neglected so to do, and at the time of the happening of the said damage and injury the said barge was and continued sunk and lying in the said river, in the said part and place of and in the same under water there and wholly covered and concealed and out of view, and in such position and at such depth as aforesaid without there being then any due or proper care or precautions taken, or any due or proper means in that behalf used to prevent or guard against the said danger to vessels then navigating and passing in and along the said part of the said river, and without any proper or sufficient buoy, or other proper or sufficient mark or signal being put and placed in the said river, or any other due or proper means used or taken to give to persons navigating and directing the said vessels in the said part of the said river due notice or warning of the said danger; and the plaintiffs, in fact, say, that while the said barge was and continued so sunk and lying without any proper or sufficient buoy, or other proper or sufficient mark or signal, or any other due or proper means being used to give notice or warning of the said danger, to wit, on the said 8th day of June, A.D. 1845, the said plaintiffs were lawfully possessed of a certain steam-vessel, &c. which was then lawfully navigating and passing in and along the said part of the said river Thames, being then under the care, direction and management of certain the mariners and servants in behalf of the said plaintiffs, and the said steam-vessel being so then navigated and passing in and along the said river, and the said plaintiffs and the said mariners and servants not having any knowledge or sufficient means of knowledge of the said danger, and no due or proper care or precautions being taken by the said defendant to prevent or guard against the said danger, and the said plaintiffs, by their said mariners and servants, then having lawful occasion to navigate and direct the said steam-vessel in, along and over the said place where the said barge so then lay sunk as aforesaid, they, the said plaintiffs, by their said mariners and servants, did then accordingly navigate and direct the said steam-vessel in, along, and over the said place, and thereby and by means of the said premises, and of the said misconduct, omission and neglect of the defendant, and without any neglect or default of the said plaintiffs, or their said mariners and servants, the said steam-vessel was then, to wit, on &c., driven and struck with great force and violence upon and against the said sunken barge, and was thereby then greatly broken, stove in, damaged and injured, &c.

Plea, that a reasonable time for the defendant to remove the said barge from the said place where she so lay sunk as in the declaration mentioned, had not elapsed before or at the time of the alleged damage and injury in the declaration mentioned, and this the defendant is ready to verify, &c.

Special demurrer, on the ground that the plea raised a matter of fact which, if proved, is no answer in law to the action; and that the said plea is in violation of the rules of pleading, inasmuch as it does not traverse any matter of fact contained in the declaration, nor does it confess and avoid any matters of fact alleged in the declaration, but states a new fact which in law is no answer to the action, and is improperly concluded with a verification; and also that the said plea is in other respects uncertain, informal and insufficient. Joinder therein.

Channell, Serj. (Nov. 18, 1846.) in support of the demurrer.—In this case, the plea is bad as not answering the declaration;

but the principal question will be, whether the declaration is good. The question is, whether, when a vessel or barge is sunk by accident against the will of the owner, the owner is bound to give reasonable notice of the accident to the public within a reasonable time. In Hott v. Wilkes (1), the plaintiff who was a trespasser, had notice that there were spring guns in a wood, but not of the particular place where they were set, and it was held that he could not maintain trespass for an injury which he had received. In that case the plaintiff was a wrong-doer, whereas in the present case he is not, and yet it is evident from the judgment in that case, that if no notice whatever had been given the defendant would have been held liable. In Bird v. Holbrook (2), where no notice was given, the defendant was held liable. In this case, though the defendant does not voluntarily commit a nuisance, yet he continues one. If he could not remove it, he ought to have given notice, to prevent injury to others, by placing a buoy over the wreck, or by some other means.

[WILDE, C.J.—Has any individual a right to put up anything in the river to warn others from some fancied danger? He cannot be indicted for not removing it—The King v. Watts (3). Why should the expense of notice be put upon the party who has had the misfortune to lose his vessel, rather than upon any other of the public?]

He may be the only one who knows the fact. The same hardship would apply to the case of a party who had had the misfortune to break down his cart upon the public highway, and yet in such case, unless he removed his cart, he would be liable.

[MAULE, J.—In The Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby (4), the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, held the canal company liable for damage resulting to a barge navigating their canal from a sunken barge: that was upon the ground that as the company derived a profit by tolls for the navigation, there was a common law liability cast upon them to make the navigation secure. That principle may apply to a person who derives a benefit from navigating a river, and may throw on him some duties. If afloat, it might be that he ought to hoist lights; if sunk, to give notice in some other manner.]

[WILDE, C.J.—The question may be, what party stands in the class nearest to that of the canal company? May it not be those who have charge of the river, and whose duty it may consequently be to remove nuisances?]

The Court cannot take judicial notice that there are persons who have charge of the river, even if the river should be the Thames; but, besides, the river Thames is only laid as the venue under a videlicet. If a party lay down an anchor in a place likely to cause injury, he must place a buoy over it. The question in such cases is, whether the defendant's conduct was negligent, and that is a question for the jury—Lynch v. Nurdin (5).

[MAULE, J.—The barge is not stated to have been sunk accidentally, nor to be out of the controul of the defendant. For all that appears, the defendant may for some purpose have scuttled his barge, and may still be in possession of her.]

In that view, the principle of Dixon v. Bell (6) will apply, because the barge must be taken to be under the defendant's own controul.

Talfourd, Serj. (Willes with him) contra.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to assume that there was any default in the defendant. The barge must be taken to have been sunk by the act of God while being navigated; the word "founder" means something more than mere sinking. Then, it is not alleged that it was possible for the defendant to have placed a buoy or other mark over the barge. The accident might have taken place upon the ocean.

[MAULE, J.—There is an implied statement that it was possible in the statement that "a reasonable time had elapsed:" the reasonableness of the time necessarily involves the nature of the means, and I do not see how the plaintiffs could have proved the reasonableness of the time, without proving that the means were practicable.]

[COLTMAN, J. referred to Harmond v. Pearson (7), where Lord Ellenborough decided that the owner of a vessel sunk in a navigable river is bound to place a buoy over the wreck.]

[WILDE, C.J.—Would the duty equally arise, if the accident had happened in the Channel? If so, would the owner be bound to remove it?]

If the owner is bound to put it up, is he bound to keep it up for all time?

[MAULE, J.—It might be that he was bound for a time, but not for an unreasonable time.]

In Harris v. Baker (8), where rubbish had been left on a public road without lights, and a party was thereby injured, the trustees of the road were held not to be liable. Jordin v. Crump (9) throws some doubt upon Illott v. Wilkes.

Channell, Serj. was heard in reply.

MAULE, J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—In this case, which arose out of a demurrer to a plea, it was not disputed on the argument that the plea was bad; but it was insisted, for the defendant, that he was entitled to the judgment of the Court, inasmuch as the declaration was substantially defective in not shewing a cause of action; and the only question argued at the bar, and now to be decided by the Court, is, whether the declaration is open to this objection. The declaration, in effect, states that, before the happening of the damage complained of, to wit, on the 8th of June, 1845, a certain barge of the defendant, and of which he was then in possession, and then had the care, direction, management, and controul, by his mariners and servants, foundered, sunk, and went to the bottom, in a certain navigable river in England, in a navigable part of it, the said part then and still being a public highway for all persons to navigate with their steam-boats and other vessels, and along which vessels were and are accustomed at all times to navigate and pass without obstruction; that the said barge of the defendant, being so sunk as aforesaid, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, lay covered and concealed under water in such a manner that vessels passing over the place where it lay would necessarily strike against the same, and vessels passing along the said part of the river without the persons navigating them having notice of the sunken barge, would necessarily be in danger of striking against it, and being thereby greatly damaged; that the defendant had notice of the premises; that it thereupon became and was the duty of the defendant, while the barge continued so sunk, to take and use due and proper care and precautions to prevent and guard against the said danger to vessels navigating that part of the river, by giving due notice of the danger, by a buoy, or other proper mark or signal, or otherwise, to persons navigating, or by other due and proper means in that behalf. The declaration then goes on to shew, in terms on which no question arises, that the defendant omitted and neglected to give such notice, or use such means to prevent danger; that a steam-vessel of the plaintiffs was damaged by striking against the barge, without any fault of the plaintiffs, in consequence of the said omission and neglect of the defendant.

The objection made to the declaration is, that it does not shew any obligation on the defendant to do that which the plaintiffs complain of his having omitted. There is, indeed, an express allegation in the declaration, that "thereupon" it became the duty of the defendant to do that which the plaintiffs complain of his omitting. But we think that this allegation will not aid the declaration. Where the allegation following such a word as "thereupon" or "whereby" is an allegation of fact, such allegation is indeed averred with sufficient directness, notwithstanding the word "thereupon" or "whereby," which is not to be understood as shewing that the proposition following such word is intended to be stated as a consequence deducible from what precedes, but only as shewing the time at which or the occasion on which that which follows the word in question is averred to have taken place: see the case of Pryce v. Belcher (10), in which this Court held that an allegation in a declaration, that the plaintiff sustained damage, introduced by the word "whereby," was not to be considered as a statement of matter of inference and conclusion only, but a positive allegation of a fact.

But the allegation now in question is open to the further objection, that, however directly it be averred, it is an averment of matter of law only, and not of matter of fact. If the words had been "that the defendant became bound by law" to do certain acts, it could not be questioned that that was an allegation of matter of law: and the words, "it became the duty of the defendant," if they were to be understood as averring the existence of some duty different from that arising out of a legal obligation, certainly would not aid the declaration, inasmuch as the breach of such a duty does not give a cause of action. But, if they be understood, as we think they are, as averring the existence of a legal liability, it is well established that such an averment, being an averment of matter of law, will not supply the want of those allegations of matter of fact from which the Court could infer the law to be as stated; so that such allegation is useless where the declaration is insufficient, and superfluous where sufficient without it. In the case of Parnaby v. the Lancaster Canal Company (11), the Court rejected the statement that it thereupon became the duty of the company to remove the obstruction, as being an inference of law improperly stated; and in the case of Priestley v. Fowler (12), though the declaration contained a direct averment that it became the duty of the defendant to use due and proper care, the Court arrested the judgment, because the declaration contained no premises from which the duty of the defendant, as therein alleged, could be inferred by law.

The sufficiency of the declaration, therefore, in the present case, must be determined without regard to the express allegation of the duty of the defendant which it contains, and will therefore depend on the question whether the facts stated shew that the defendant was bound in law to do that which the declaration charges him with having omitted. Now as to this question, there seems no doubt that it is the duty of a person using a public navigable river with a vessel of which he is possessed and has the controul and management, to use reasonable skill and care to prevent mischief to other vessels; and that, in case of a collision arising from his negligence, he must sustain without compensation the damage occasioned to his own vessel, and is liable to pay compensation for that sustained by another navigated with due skill and care: and this liability is the same, whether his vessel is in motion or stationary, floating or aground, under water or above it. In all these circumstances the vessel may continue to be in his possession and under his management and controul; and, supposing it to be so, and a collision with another vessel to occur from the improper manner in which one of the two is managed, the owner of the vessel properly managed is entitled to recover damages from the owner of that which was improperly managed. This duty of using reasonable skill and care for the safety of other vessels is incident to the possession and controul of the vessel. Subject to this obligation, the owner has a right, while his vessel is afloat, to proceed in any direction, and to remain at any place, and when it is aground, whether sunk or not, to remain as long as the occasions of his voyage require. Of the existence of these rights and duties, so long as the possession and controul of the vessel continue in the same person, there seems to be no doubt. Nor does there seem to be any doubt that, if these be transferred to another person, the rights and duties would also be transferred to him, and the original owner would cease to be entitled to or bound by them. But a person may cease to have the possession and controul of a vessel, though they are not transferred to any other person, as is commonly the case when by some casualty of navigation it is brought into a situation in which the owner abandons and relinquishes the possession and controul because it is impossible to retain them; and the effect which this new state of things may have on the duties and liabilities in question does not appear to admit of so simple a determination as that which relates to the duties and liabilities incident to a possession continuing in the same person, or transferred to another. Those duties and liabilities, there seems to be no doubt, are different in cases where the relinquishment of possession is wrongful, or arises out of circumstances occasioned by the wrongful act or omission of the owner, from what they are when he is blameless. In the present case, supposing the barge to have been out of the defendant's possession at the time of the collision, there is nothing to shew that the defendant wrongfully ceased to be possessed, or wrongfully occasioned anything which led to the ceasing of his possession: the only wrong complained of is the omission to use means to prevent damage from the sunken barge. It is therefore not necessary to inquire what would be the effect of a wrongful act or neglect leading to a divesting of the possession. No such wrong being alleged, none is to be presumed; and the question therefore is, what is the duty of the person who had the possession and controul of a vessel which, without any fault of his, has, while in his possession, sunk, so as to obstruct a public navigable river, with respect to vessels navigating the river, after his possession and controul has ceased? It probably cannot be safely affirmed that, in no case where a vessel has sunk, without fault of the owner, does any duty of this kind at all arise, or continue for any time: nor is it necessary to decide this question; for, in order to sustain the declaration, we must hold, that, in every state of things consistent with the facts stated in the declaration, the defendant was bound to do that which the plaintiff complains of his having omitted. Now, though there seems no doubt, as we have before observed, that he was bound to use due care to prevent injury to others, as long as his possession and controul continue; and, though, after they ceased,—supposing that they did cease,—there may have possibly been some state of facts which might cause the continuance of such a duty for some time, we think that it cannot be universally affirmed that, in all cases where the possession and controul of the owners have ceased, such a duty arises. Indeed, as we have before stated, it seems clear that the duty does not continue in the original owner when his possession and controul have been transferred to another; and where the possession and controul have not been transferred, but have been relinquished and abandoned, we do not think that the duty always arises, and continues for an indefinite time. Where the navigation of a river has become obstructed by a vessel which has sunk and been lost to the owner, without any fault of his, the public inconvenience of the obstruction is one in respect of which the owner differs from the rest of the public only in having sustained a private calamity, in addition to his share of a public inconvenience; and this difference does not appear to be any reason for throwing on him the cost of remedying or mitigating the evil.

In the case of The King v. Watts Lord Kenyon held that the owner of a ship sunk in the Thames by accident and misfortune, without his default or misconduct, was not liable to an indictment for not removing the obstruction. It was contended, for the prosecution in that case, that, though the defendant was not punishable for causing the nuisance, it having arisen from accident, it was his duty to remove it; but the learned Judge answered, that perhaps the expense of removal might have amounted to more than the whole value of the property. The same reason would apply in the case of an indictment for not giving notice by signal, or taking other means to prevent damage from a sunken vessel; the expense of doing so might, and probably would, be greater than any private benefit which the owner would derive from it: and, whether it were greater or not, the reason seems to be the same for not throwing on the owner any especial share in the consequence of a public misfortune with which he had no particular concern, except that it arose out of a private disaster which he had innocently suffered.

In the case of such impediments to navigation arising out of unavoidable accident, the proper rule seems to be that the expense of removing or diminishing the danger arising from them should be defrayed by those who would be benefited by such a measure; as is done in the case of lighthouses, which are erected to diminish the danger arising from natural impediments to navigation; and such measures are the proper subjects of local regulations to be made on a comparison of the danger to be guarded against and the expense to be incurred. It is scarcely necessary to observe, that, if no indictment would lie, under the circumstances stated in this declaration, for the danger and impediment to the public, no action can be maintained for the particular damage sustained by the plaintiff. The duty of the defendant, if it exists at all, is of a public nature; and the plaintiff, in order to succeed, must shew a breach of public duty, as well as special injury to himself. Now, the present declaration does not shew that, at the time of the collision, the defendant had the possession or controul of the barge: it states that before the happening of the damage the barge was in his possession and under his controul; and though it states under a videlicet that the damage happened on the same day, this is no averment of possession and controul at the time of the damage, even taking the allegation of the day to be binding. A statement of possession before an event does not amount to even an informal statement that possession continued till the time of the event, however short the interval may be. Since, therefore, the declaration does not shew either a continuing possession and controul on the part of the defendant at the time of the collision, or any special circumstances shewing that, though he may no longer have had the possession and controul of the barge, he was still bound to take care that other vessels should not be injured by striking against it; and since it cannot be inferred from the mere fact of the defendant having the possession and controul of the barge at the time it sunk, that the defendant was bound after that time, that is, at the time of the collision, to use means of precaution, we think the declaration is insufficient in substance, inasmuch as all the facts stated in it may be true, and yet the plaintiffs have no cause of action.

With regard to the cases cited for the plaintiffs, we may observe that the case of Holt v. Wilkes, and all the cases of the same kind, were cases of improper management of property of which the defendant had the possession and controul, and therefore apply only to the case of a vessel under the controul of the defendant; in which case we agree that he would be liable. The case of Harmond v. Pearson appears to have turned on the question of what was the proper mode of giving notice of a sunken barge to be adopted by an owner who was admitted to be liable to give some notice. That a liability of that kind might be made to appear, by proper averments in the declaration, we have already shewn; and there is no reason to suppose that the declaration did not contain such averments: the circumstance of a watchman being employed to give notice makes it probable that, in fact, the defendant retained the possession of his barge, and intended to resume his voyage. For these reasons, we are of opinion that the declaration is defective in substance, and that there must be judgment for the defendant.

Pleading—Immaterial Traverse—Duplicity—Contract—Condition Precedent.

The declaration stated that by certain articles of agreement the plaintiff agreed to sell, and the defendant to purchase, a piece of land, and the plaintiff agreed to deliver an abstract of title and to deduce a clear title within a month from the signing of the contract, or from being required so to do; that the defendant agreed to pay a portion of the purchase-money on the signing of the contract, and the residue on or before a future fixed day, and to pay interest in the mean time half-yearly; and that the plaintiff did, within one month from being required, deliver an abstract of title and deduce a clear title. Breach, non-payment by the defendant of half a year's interest. Plea, that the plaintiff did not deliver an abstract of title, and deduce a clear title in manner and form, &c. Upon demurrer, for immateriality and duplicity,—Held, that the plea was bad, for raising an immaterial issue, the delivery of the abstract and the deduction of title not being a condition precedent to the payment of the money.

Quære—whether the plea was not also bad for duplicity, in denying both the delivery of the abstract and the deduction of the title.

Assumpsit. The first count of the declaration stated that on the 2nd of September, A.D. 1844, in and by certain articles of agreement, dated a certain day, to wit, the day and year aforesaid, and then made and entered into by and between the plaintiff of the one part and the defendant of the other part, the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to purchase, for the sum of 5,489*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, payable as thereafter and hereinafter mentioned, a piece of land in the said articles described, together with the use and occupation in common with others entitled thereto, of a certain back street, in the said articles mentioned, and all rights, members, and appurtenances to the said piece of land belonging. And the plaintiff thereby agreed that he would, within one month from the date thereof, or from being required so to do, at his own expense, deliver to the defendant an abstract of his title to the said premises, and deduce a clear title thereto; and that the plaintiff would, upon payment of the purchase-money of the said premises, together with all interest which might accrue due thereon as thereafter and hereinafter mentioned, execute a proper conveyance (to be prepared by and at the expense of the defendant) or of so much thereof as should not have been previously conveyed under the provisions thereafter contained and hereinafter mentioned unto the defendant, his heirs or assigns, or as he or they should direct or appoint, free from incumbrance, (except as thereafter and hereinafter mentioned), and subject to the several stipulations and conditions thereafter and hereinafter mentioned. And the defendant did thereby agree that he, the defendant, his heirs, &c. would pay to the plaintiff the said purchase-money, as follows, that is to say, the sum of 548*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* on the signing of the said contract, to wit, the said articles, and the residue, or sum of 4,940*l.* 10*s.*, on or before the 2nd of September 1848, together with interest in the mean time on the said sum of 4,940*l.* 10*s.* at the rate of 5*l.* per 100*l.* for one year, payable half-yearly, on the 2nd of March and the 2nd of September in each year; the first payment thereof to be made on the 2nd of March next after the making of the said contract. And the plaintiff did thereby agree that at any time before the said 2nd of September 1848, he, his heirs, or assigns, &c. would, on being thereunto required by the defendant, execute to him, or to any person he might appoint, a conveyance or conveyances of any portion of the said hereditaments, on payment to the plaintiff of the whole of the purchase-money, which the defendant should have agreed to accept from the purchaser or purchasers thereof, provided that such purchase-money should not be at a less rate than 3*l.* by the yard for land so conveyed; provided also that the costs and charges of furnishing abstracts, if required, and of verifying the same, or of any other proceeding connected with such partial conveyance, should be borne and paid by the defendant, his heirs, &c., it being the intention of the parties that the plaintiff should be indemnified from all such costs and charges, and the defendant should not be entitled to call for, nor should the plaintiff be required to produce, any earlier title to the said land than the original conveyance thereof from F. R. P. to Mr. W. F. deceased; and any conveyance to be made under the said articles should be subject to the reservations, covenants, and restrictions contained in such conveyance, so far as the same affected the land by the said articles contracted to be sold, and also to the several conditions and stipulations therein contained.—[The declaration then set out other provisions which it is unnecessary to detail.]—And it was further agreed that possession of the said land should be forthwith given to the defendant, and that all taxes, rates, and other outgoings up to the date of the said articles should be paid by the plaintiff, and from and after the said date by the defendant, his heirs, or assigns.—[The declaration then stated the terms of the agreement for entry and sale in case of non-performance by the defendant, and alleged mutual promises.]—And the plaintiff further saith, that on the making of the said agreement, to wit, on &c., possession of the land was forthwith given to the defendant, and all taxes, rates, and other outgoings, up to the date of the said articles, were, to wit, then paid by the plaintiff; and the plaintiff did, before the commencement of this suit, and within one month from being required so to do, to wit, on the 5th of June, A.D. 1845, at his own expense, deliver to the defendant such an abstract of his title to the said premises, and deduce such a clear title thereto, as in and by the said articles in that behalf specified and required; and the plaintiff from the making of the said contract to the commencement of this suit, in all things did perform and was ready and willing to perform the said contract in all things on his part to be performed; and although the defendant, on the signing of the said contract (the same being signed by him on the day and year first aforesaid), did pay to the plaintiff the sum of 548*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, and although the residue of the said purchase-money, to wit, the said sum of 4,940*l.* 10*s.*, was on the 2nd of September 1846 (which day elapsed long after the making of the said contract, and before the commencement of this suit), due and unpaid, and still remains due and unpaid; and although the interest, under the said articles payable in respect of the said residue on or before the 2nd of March 1846, had been satisfied to the plaintiff; and although on the 2nd of September 1846, according to the said articles, a certain sum, to wit, 123*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, for half a year's interest on the said unpaid residue of the said purchase-money, at the rate of, &c., became and was payable, &c. Breach, non-payment thereof.

Plea—That the plaintiff did not deliver to the defendant an abstract of title to the said premises, and deduce such a title thereto as in and by the said recited agreement specified and required, in manner and form, &c.

Special demurrer, for immateriality and duplicity.

Aspland (Nov. 19), in support of the demurrer.—The performance by the plaintiff of the agreement as to the title, is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of the action. That question, indeed, does not arise, for the defendant has not shewn any breach of the contract on the plaintiff's part. The plaintiff contracted that within a month of signing the contract, on being required, he would deliver an abstract, and deduce a clear title. The plaintiff, therefore, was not bound to do this within a month from signing the contract, but might elect to wait till the lapse of a month after being required. But it does not appear that the plaintiff ever was required, or that a month from the signing of the contract had elapsed before the commencement of the suit. Assuming, however, that the plaintiff has been guilty of a breach of the contract, it is clear that the terms are independent, that the performance by the plaintiff was not a condition precedent, and that the defendant's remedy would be by a cross action. Each party was to do a certain act at once: the plaintiff to give up possession, the defendant to pay part of the purchase-money; and it is therefore plain that the plaintiff was not bound to deliver the abstract and deduce the title before the contract took effect. The notes to Pordage v. Cole (1), and the cases of Boone v. Eyre (2), Carpenter v. Cresswell (3), Stavers v. Curling (4), Mattock v. Kinglake (5), and Campbell v. Jones (6), are all distinct authorities to shew that the averment which the plea has traversed is immaterial, and that the delivery of the abstract and the deduction of title did not form a condition precedent to the right to maintain the action. Besides, the plea is double, the delivery of an abstract and the deduction of the title being distinct matters—Sansom v. Rhodes (7); and the defendant should not have included a denial of both in one traverse—Smith v. Dixon (8).

Rew, for the defendant.—The plea is not double. The meaning of the contract is, that the plaintiff was to deduce a title on the face of the abstract, and this is what the plea puts in issue. There are not two matters of defence put in issue. The present case comes within the rule laid down in Bell v. Tuckett (9), as the several things stated in the traverse amount only to one defence. In the case of an action on a replevin bond, an averment of not prosecuting without delay and with effect, may be put in issue together. With respect to the substantial objection to the plea, the traverse is good. Contracts of this kind are made on the implied condition that the vendor shall make out a good title—Flureau v. Thornhill (10), and unless a good title be made out, the vendor has no right to the purchase-money. In Wilde v. Fort (11) it was held that where the vendor of an estate did not shew a clear title by the day specified, the purchaser might recover back his deposit and rescind the contract, without waiting to see whether the vendor might afterwards establish a good title.

Aspland, in reply.

WILDE, C.J. now (May 12, 1848,) delivered the judgment of the Court.—[His Lordship stated the pleadings and continued.]—On the argument of this demurrer before us, it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that this traverse was bad in substance, for the delivery of the abstract and deducing a clear title within one month from his being required so to do was not a condition precedent to his right to maintain the action; and therefore the allegation in the declaration, of his having performed it was immaterial and superfluous, and the traverse of it consequently bad. But it was further contended that even if the allegation was material or necessary, the traverse in question was bad for duplicity, for that the true meaning of the agreement in question is, not simply that a clear title should be disclosed on the face of the abstract, but that moreover a clear title should, in fact, be deduced; and, consequently, the failure on the part of the plaintiff, either to deliver an abstract or deduce a clear title within the time, would be a good bar to the action for the performance, if that part of the contract was really a condition precedent. On the other hand, the argument on the part of the defendant was, that nothing more was required by the plaintiff than to deliver an abstract deducing a clear title on the face of it; and therefore the plea was not open to the objection of duplicity; and, further, that the performance of this part of the agreement was a condition precedent. It is not necessary for us to decide whether the plaintiff or the defendant is right in the construction of the terms of the contract in that respect, because we are of opinion that the performance of this part of it was not a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to enforce the payment, which is the subject of the action. The plaintiff, by the terms of the agreement, undertakes that he will within a month from being required so to do, deliver an abstract, and deduce a clear title; the time appointed for his performance of this part of the contract does not, therefore, arrive until he has been required to do so, and a month shall have expired after the date of such requisition; but the defendant undertook to pay interest on the unpaid purchase-money, on certain specified days between the date of the agreement and the day fixed for payment of the residue of the principal purchase-money; and the time appointed for him to make his payment may arrive before a month has expired after a requisition to the plaintiff to deliver the abstract and to deduce the title, and consequently before the time appointed for the plaintiff to do so has arrived. Indeed, it may well be that the payment of the interest for which this action is brought became due before that period; for although it is averred in the declaration to have become due on the 2nd of September 1846, as it is also stated that the plaintiff did within a month from being required so to do, to wit, on the 5th of June 1845, deliver an abstract, &c., yet the latter day being laid under a videlicet, is not so alleged as to be material and liable to be traversed. The case, therefore, appears to fall directly within the rule laid down by Mr. Serjeant Williams, in the note to Portage v. Cole, namely, that if a day be appointed for payment of money, or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance, for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent. If this rule be correctly laid down, and we think it is, it demonstrates that the performance of this part of the contract by the plaintiff is not a condition precedent to his right to maintain the action; and consequently, the allegation in the declaration of such performance being immaterial and superfluous, the plea, which is merely a traverse of that immaterial allegation, is bad. Our judgment, therefore, is for the plaintiff.

By an agreement under seal, the plaintiff undertook to supply a gas company, for a period of three years, with all such pipes as should, from time to time, during the said period, be required by the company, at certain rates specified in the agreement. The company ordered large quantities of pipes, and when the contract expired had in stock many thousand yards of pipes, which the plaintiff had supplied, and for which he sought to recover the difference in price between the current value and the price paid according to the contract:—Held, that the contract could not be limited to orders for pipes required for use at the time of the orders; but that the plaintiff was bound to supply all pipes ordered by the company for works which they were carrying on and authorized to undertake by their act of parliament.

Debt on an agreement under seal. The material parts of the first count of the declaration were as follows:—For that whereas, on the 18th of June 1844, by certain articles of agreement then made and entered into between the plaintiff of the one part, and the defendants of the other part, the plaintiff did undertake and agree with the defendants that he should and would, during the period of three years from the date of the said articles, supply the defendants with such quantities of main pipes, bored and turned bends, syphons, and branch pipes, and turned and bored syphons and branch pipes, as should from time to time during the said period be required by the defendants, and that all pipes and syphons so supplied should be cast and wrought of good soft metal [the agreement then went on to specify minutely the length, the diameter, &c. of the pipes to be supplied], and also should and would, at his own cost, cause every lot or parcel of such pipes to be ordered of the defendants to be delivered in Liverpool, free of all charge whatever, within one month from the date of such order for such lot or parcel respectively. In consideration whereof, and of the due performance by the plaintiff of all the stipulations and agreements in the said articles of agreement contained on his part, the defendants did thereby agree with the said plaintiff, his executors and administrators, that the defendants should pay, or cause to be paid, for the furnishing and delivery of the said pipes, at and after the following rates, namely [the sums to be paid for each sort of pipe were then minutely set forth in the agreement], the said several payments to be made in three months after delivery as aforesaid of each lot of the said pipes to be ordered by the defendants as aforesaid. And it was thereby agreed and declared by and between the said parties thereto, that if default should be made in the furnishing and delivery of the said pipes as aforesaid, contrary to the true intent of these presents, it should be lawful for the said defendants to procure the said pipes elsewhere, and the loss thereby incurred by the defendants should or might be deducted or made good out of any sum or sums of money then due or thereafter to become due to the plaintiff, his executors or administrators, from the defendants, or be recoverable by the defendants by action at law or otherwise, as and for liquidated and ascertained damages. And the plaintiff says, that afterwards, on, &c., and on divers other days, &c., during the said period of three years from the date of the said articles of agreement, the said defendants did require and order of and from the plaintiff divers lots and parcels of such pipes as in the said articles mentioned and provided, to wit, ten thousand yards of pipes of 2½ inches diameter, &c., &c., and the prices of which said pipes, at and after the rates in the said articles severally mentioned and provided, amounted in the whole to a large sum, to wit, the sum of, &c. And the plaintiff saith, that afterwards, to wit, on the several days and times aforesaid he furnished and supplied to the said company the said pipes so required and ordered in compliance with the terms of the said articles, and according to the description therein contained, and at his own cost caused the same to be delivered in Liverpool free of all charges, which the defendants then received and accepted as and for the pipes so required and ordered as aforesaid. And the plaintiff saith, that although he did at all times duly perform all the stipulations and agreements in the said articles contained on his part, and although the period of six months after the delivery and acceptance of the last of the said pipes so required and ordered as aforesaid had elapsed before the commencement of this suit, yet the defendants did not nor would pay for the same or any part thereof, &c.; and there is now due and owing to the plaintiff from the defendants for the said pipes, at and after the rates aforesaid, a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 5,000*l.*, whereby an action hath accrued to the plaintiff to have and demand from the defendants the said sum of 5,000*l.*, parcel of the monies above demanded, &c.

The defendants pleaded, first, as to the sum of 252*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, parcel of the said sum of money in the said first count demanded, actio non, because the defendants now bring into court the sum of 252*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, and the further sum of 10*l.*, making together the sum of 262*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, ready to be paid to the plaintiff; and the defendants further say, that they never were indebted to the plaintiff in respect of the said sum of 252*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* to a greater amount than the said sum of 252*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, and that the plaintiff has not sustained damages by reason of the detention thereof to a greater amount than the said sum of 10*l.*, wherefore, &c. Secondly, as to the residue of the said first count, except the pipes paid for in the last preceding plea, that the plaintiff did not furnish the said pipes or any of them in manner and form, &c. Issue thereon. Thirdly, to the said residue of the said first count, payment. Fourthly, to the said residue of the said first count, the defendants say, that after making the said articles of agreement, and during the said period of three years from the date thereof, to wit, on &c., and on divers other days and times during the said period of three years, the defendants, according to the terms of the said agreement, ordered of the plaintiff divers lots and parcels of such pipes as in the agreement mentioned (being other and different pipes from the pipes in the said first count alleged) to have been furnished by the plaintiff, and delivered in Liverpool, which were, to wit, on the days and times last aforesaid, required by the defendants, and which the plaintiff was then bound to supply to the defendants, according to the said agreement, to wit, 10,000 yards of pipes, of seven inches diameter, &c., and although the times for the plaintiff to have furnished and supplied and to have delivered the said several pipes respectively so ordered by the defendants, as in this plea mentioned, according to the terms of the said agreement, had, before the defendants procured the same pipes elsewhere as hereinafter mentioned, and before the expiration of the said period of three years, and before the commencement of this suit, expired, yet the plaintiff did not, within the time in the said agreement in that behalf mentioned, or at any other time, furnish and deliver to the defendants the said several pipes so ordered by the defendants as in this plea aforesaid, and which the defendants so required as aforesaid, according to the terms of the said agreement, but wholly refused and failed so to do; and thereupon the defendants, from time to time, after the plaintiff's default in furnishing, &c. the said several pipes respectively, to wit, on &c., and on divers other days and times, &c., did procure the said several pipes which they so required as in this plea aforesaid elsewhere, according to the true meaning of the said agreement; and in so procuring the same did necessarily pay for the price thereof certain large sums of money, to wit, 10,000*l.*, being a much greater sum by, to wit, 5,000*l.*, than the defendants would have been bound to pay to the plaintiff for the same pipes, according to the terms of the said agreement; and by reason of the plaintiff having failed, as aforesaid, to furnish, &c. the said pipes in this plea mentioned, and of the defendants having been obliged to procure the same elsewhere, they had incurred before the commencement of this suit, a loss, to wit, to the amount of 5,000*l.*, which sum is still due and unpaid to the defendants, and exceeds the said debt in the said count demanded, except the sum of 52*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, parcel, &c., and the damage sustained by the plaintiff, by the detention thereof, and out of which said sum of 5,000*l.*, so due to the defendants, they are ready and willing to set off the full amount of the said last-mentioned debt and damages, except as aforesaid, according to the terms of the said agreement.

Replication to the first plea, the plaintiff accepts and takes out of court the said sum of 262*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, in discharge of the said sum of 252*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.*, parcel, &c., and of the damages for the detention thereof, and prays judgment for his damages, and also for his costs and charges in this behalf. To the third plea, the plaintiff saith that the said lots and parcels of pipes in that plea mentioned were not, nor were any of them or any part thereof, required by the defendants; and he was not to supply the same, or any part thereof, in manner and form, &c. Issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Patteson, J., at the last Spring assizes for Stafford, when it appeared that the plaintiff, an iron master at Sedgley, entered into the agreement of the 18th of June 1844, set out in the declaration. He supplied all the pipes, &c. required by the defendants up to the commencement of the year 1846, and sought to recover in this action the full value of all pipes supplied by him since January 1846, amounting to 4,000*l.* more than the sum paid for them by the defendants, on the ground that such pipes had been ordered in fraud of the agreement. The price of iron was low in 1844; it rose throughout 1845, and almost doubled in value. In the first nine months of the contract the defendants ordered 334 tons of pipes, in the second nine months 322 tons, in the third nine months when iron was very high they ordered 1,594 tons of pipes, and in the fourth and last period of nine months 1,150 tons. When the contract expired in June 1847, the defendants had in stock about four thousand yards of pipes which had been supplied by the plaintiff. The difference between the current value and the contract price of the last-mentioned pipes was 1,140*l.* Orders had been given for twelve hundred yards of pipes which the plaintiff had not executed, and which the defendants had procured elsewhere. The difference of the price paid for them and the contract price was 1,200*l.*, which the defendants claimed to set off against the debt. The balance due according to the contract price for pipes supplied was about 300*l.* It appeared that about twelve months after the agreement was entered into the defendants proposed to extend their works for three or four miles; the new works for which the large supply of pipes was ordered were not in a forward state, and it was contended that the meaning of the agreement was, that the plaintiff should supply pipes for the works only as they existed at the time the agreement was entered into, or, at any rate, only so many pipes for the new works as the defendants from time to time required for present use; and as they had ordered more pipes since January 1846 than they had used, they had departed from the contract, and so the plaintiff was entitled to the full value of all pipes supplied since that date.

At the trial the defendants' counsel required the learned Judge to construe the agreement, who decided that the plaintiff was bound to supply all pipes required by the company, during the period of three years, for any works which the company were, at the date of the agreement, authorized by their act of parliament to undertake; and that the question for the jury was, whether the pipes were ordered by the company, and whether they were necessary for all the works existing and in course of execution. The defendants had a verdict.

Talfourd, Serj. moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.—The question for the jury was, not as put to them by the learned Judge, but whether the pipes ordered were required from time to time as ordered; that is,—Were the pipes wanted for use from time to time as ordered? The defendants had four thousand yards of pipes in hand when the contract expired, and that shews that the pipes were not ordered for use, but to keep in stock: the requisitions for pipes were not therefore bona fide, but in fraud of the fair meaning of the agreement. It was proved that it would have taken more than a year and a half to lay down the pipes, &c. in possession of the defendants when the contract expired: the orders were therefore a speculation on their part (iron being at that time excessively dear) against the plaintiff for their own purposes. The agreement cannot mean that the company may order pipes for works to be commenced a year hence.

[CRESSWELL, J.—The learned Judge did not so construe the agreement; he ruled, that the plaintiff should supply pipes for all works authorized by the act of parliament constituting the company which were bona fide existing or in progress at the time the pipes were ordered.]

No doubt the agreement is a most improvident one on the part of the plaintiff. He is obliged to supply, but the company are not obliged to order pipes, and it was shewn at the trial, that in this respect the company had taken full advantage of the agreement. If the plaintiff is not entitled to the 4,000*l.* underpaid for all the pipes supplied since January 1846, he is entitled to 1,140*l.*, underpaid for the pipes in the hands of the company when the contract expired, as they were not required by the defendants within the meaning of the agreement. If that be so, there was a misdirection; and there can be no right of set-off for the difference in price of the pipes alleged to have been procured elsewhere by the defendants, as the orders for them, from time to time, when they were not wanted for use, were equally without the terms of the agreement.

WILDE, C.J.—This may be an unfortunate case for the plaintiff, who appears to have entered into a most improvident bargain; but the Court must construe the agreement without reference to such considerations, and upon those fixed legal principles which apply to this and all other cases. It is impossible to say that the jury were misdirected; for the agreement cannot be limited to mean that the plaintiff was only to be called upon to replace old pipes, but must be understood to mean that he was to supply all such pipes as were required from time to time, for the purposes of the works which the gas company were empowered to undertake by their existing act of parliament. Looking at the terms of the summing up, the jury were in effect asked, whether the pipes ordered from time to time were necessary for the works the company were carrying on, and were left to form their own conclusion of fact from the evidence before them. They have found that the pipes were necessary, and therefore the general defence insisted on has been negatived by the finding of the jury. There was no misdirection, and no rule can be granted.

Where a ship is so damaged during a voyage that she cannot prosecute it, the Master has authority to sell her for all parties interested, and the person whom he may have employed to sell her and receive the money may pay over the proceeds to him or his agent; and such payment, in the absence of any notice not to do so from the parties interested, will be good.

Assumpsit, for 2,000*l.*, as money had and received; 500*l.*, interest on money forborne, and 2,000*l.*, as money due upon an account stated. The defendant pleaded, first, non assumpsit; secondly, payment and acceptance of 5,000*l.* in satisfaction; thirdly, that the promises were made by the defendant jointly with one Harrison Watson, residing out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant and the said H. Watson in the sum of 5,000*l.* for work done and materials provided by them for the plaintiff, and for money paid by them, at the plaintiff's request, and for interest for the forbearance by them of money, and on an account stated, which sum exceeded the damages sustained by the plaintiff, and which sum the defendant offered to set off.

The cause came on for trial, before Tindal, C.J., at the sittings at Guildhall, after Trinity term, 1839, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 2,000*l.* damages, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following

CASE.

The plaintiff was the registered owner of the ship Royal William, at the time of her being wrecked and sold at the Cape of Good Hope, in the month of September 1837. In May 1837 a charter-party was made between the plaintiff, the owner, of the one part, and Charles Alexander Gordon, of the other part, of which a copy was annexed to the case. Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co., of London, being jointly interested with

Gordon in the charter-party, the plaintiff, by mortgage, dated on or about the 23rd of March 1837, and duly entered in the book of registry at the Custom House in London, and indorsed on the certificate of registry, transferred the vessel to Alves Arbuthnot and Alfred Latham, trading in London under the firm of Arbuthnot & Latham, for securing the payment of a certain sum of money, which was unpaid at the time of the remittance of the proceeds of the wreck hereinafter mentioned, and also exceeded the amount of the proceeds. A copy of the mortgage-deed and the mortgage account were to be referred to if requisite. Messrs. Arbuthnot & Latham had been the agents of the plaintiff, and for some time effected his insurances and received his freights, &c. On the 18th of May 1837 they effected a policy on the ship Royal William for 6,000*l.* The policy was made in their own names, the premiums paid on the policy were charged to the plaintiff, and the sums paid by the underwriters on the policy were placed to his credit. The sums so paid by the underwriters were 3,000*l.* on the 31st of December 1837, and 1,800*l.* on the 6th of February 1838. The following were the indorsements put upon the policy when the above payments were made: "Settled 50*l.* per cent. on account of the claims on this policy without prejudice, payable in one month. London, 31st of December 1837.—Agreed to settle a further 30*l.* per cent. on this policy; and the proceeds of the ship not being paid to the assured, and it appearing that serious doubts are entertained in regard to the application of such proceeds, it is hereby further agreed that the assured may adopt such measures as they may deem expedient to recover the same, and that the underwriters will bear any loss that may arise from the non-recovery of the proceeds of the vessel.—30*l.* per cent.—London, 6th of February 1838, payable in one month." These payments were made before the present action was commenced. The action was commenced on the 19th of April 1838. The Royal William sailed from the port of London in the month of June 1837, on a voyage from London to Madras and Calcutta, and laden with goods the property of about fifty different persons, and under the command of David Frazer; and in the course of such voyage was totally wrecked with the cargo on entering the Cape of Good Hope on the 19th of September 1837. The plaintiff had no interest in the cargo or adventure. Frazer employed Messrs. Thomson, Watson & Co. merchants at the Cape, the firm consisting of the defendant and Harrison and Watson, to superintend the preservation and sale of the ship stores and damaged part of the cargo, and to receive the proceeds thereof. The ship and her stores and the damaged part of her cargo were sold by auction by Jones, an auctioneer at the Cape, who was selected by Thomson, Watson & Co. for that purpose, with the concurrence of Frazer. The ship and materials sold for the net sum of 18955·2 rix dollars, which at the usual rate of exchange is 1,421*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*, and of this sum Thomson, Watson & Co. received from the auctioneer the sum of 1,102*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* only, the difference, viz. 319*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.* being the value of certain articles belonging to the wreck purchased at the sale by Frazer and Anderson, the steward of the vessel, which sum of 319*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.* was not paid by Frazer or Anderson, but the whole of it was by the direction of Frazer charged in the accounts of Messrs. Thomson, Watson & Co., to his credit, as part of the proceeds of the wreck, and to his debit, as money advanced by them. Thomson, Watson & Co. made various payments at the Cape of Good Hope by the direction of Frazer, and after the sales were completed, and such payments and disbursements made, Frazer went from the Cape to India in a ship called the Courier. The accounts of the disbursements made by Thomson, Watson & Co. and their account current were annexed to the case, and likewise the account sales of the ship and damaged cargo. These accounts included a sum of 321*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* for port and other charges, which the plaintiff did not dispute, and also items amounting to 668*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.*, which he contended were unjustified. Frazer, previously to his departure for India, addressed a letter to Thomson, Watson & Co. of which the following is a copy:—

“ Cape Town, Oct. 21, 1837.

“ Messrs. Thomson, Watson & Co.

“ Gentlemen,—There are remaining in the Customs warehouse fifty-six packages of merchandise and forty-eight hams landed undamaged from the wrecked ship Royal William, late under my command; which I beg you will forward by the first favourable opportunity to Madras, to the consignment of Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co., in order that they may recover the amount of the average due on the said goods from the respective consignees. On closing the account of the said vessel, the balance in favour of me and the late ship Royal William, I shall be obliged by your forwarding, together with the accounts and vouchers, to Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co. and C. A. Gordon, Esq. for appropriation on account of the concern.

“ I remain, &c.

“ David Frazer.”

The accounts referred to in this letter were the accounts above mentioned; and as to the items constituting the sum of 668*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.*, the object of which did not appear upon the face of them, the case stated that they were for the providing and fitting out, by Frazer, of the Courier, in prosecution, on behalf of the charterers, of the adventure contemplated by the charter-party, and to convey the passengers and the undamaged part of the cargo upon the voyage which had been interrupted, and in which Frazer himself proceeded to Calcutta. The plaintiff also contended that the defendant was responsible in this action for the sum of 319*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, the price of the articles purchased by Frazer and Anderson before mentioned. The work for which commission is charged by the defendant as above, was in fact done by Thomson, Watson & Co., and the charges in respect thereof, and of their agency, were admitted to be fair and reasonable, if such charges could be set off in the present action. On the 19th of February 1838, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co. as follows:—

“ We have been requested to address you on the subject of the salvage of the Royal William, lately wrecked at the Cape of Good Hope. We have been requested to claim the proceeds of the vessel, and to take measures for the recovery of them. We beg you to say whether you hold these proceeds, and are prepared to pay the same to the owner of the vessel.”

In reply to which the following letter was written, on the 3rd of March 1838, by Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co., to the plaintiff's solicitors:—

"In reply to your favour of the 19th ultimo, which has remained thus long unanswered in consequence of the detention of the writer in Scotland by the snow storms, we beg to state that we received certain remittances from the Cape of Good Hope on account of the salvage ex Royal William, Frazer, wrecked there; that we had a statement prepared by a proper party from the papers in our possession relative to the affairs; and that we hold at the disposal of the parties interested, who can prove their right, the respective amounts enumerated in the statement, which we have shewn unreservedly to all applicants."

The plaintiff's solicitors also wrote the defendant the following letter on the 19th of February 1838:—

"Sir,—We have been desired to address you relative to the proceeds of the sale of the ship Royal William, damaged at the Cape of Good Hope, and sold there, and the proceeds received by your house. The instructions which we have received are to apply to you for these proceeds; and we have to request you will forward to us a cheque for the amount, or inform us when they will be ready to be paid, that we may send for them."

And the following correspondence also occurred between the respective solicitors of the plaintiff and defendant:—

"Gentlemen,—I am desired by Mr. R. J. Thomson, to inform you in reply to your letter to him of the 19th inst., that the proceeds of the sale of the wreck of the Royal William, and all the accounts connected therewith, have been received by Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co. and C. A. Gordon, Esq., both of the Baltic Coffee House, Threadneedle Street, to whom I beg to refer you on the subject."

"Sir,—It is not material to the party, on whose behalf we addressed Mr. Thomson relative to the proceeds of the Royal William, whether they are paid by him or by Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co., but at present we cannot obtain them from either. It appears that those proceeds amounted to about 1,100*l.*, and Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co. inform us, that they are prepared only to pay a sum of about 200*l.* You inform us that Messrs. Thomson, Watson & Co. are not liable to any person on the subject of the application. We were directed to address to Mr. Thomson, which makes us doubt whether there may not be some misconception amongst the parties; we would, therefore, ask of you to be so good as to inform us whether Messrs. Thomson, Watson & Co. sold the wreck of the vessel, and received the proceeds of it; and if so, what they have done with the same."

"Gentlemen,—As the wreck of the Royal William and the damaged part of the cargo were sold by the master of that vessel from absolute necessity, and 3,338*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.*, the proceeds thereof, remitted to and now actually received in cash, by Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co. and Mr. C. A. Gordon, I must again refer you to them on the subject. I am not aware what part of the proceeds may be applicable to the wreck, but as Messrs. Ouchterlony and Mr. Gordon are in possession of all the vouchers and documents, and have had an estimate made of the proportion due to each claimant, they can, no doubt, give you every necessary information."

203*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* was the sum due to the ship-owner out of the proceeds of the wreck, over and above the disputed amounts of 578*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* and 319*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, and that sum was, before and at the time of the commencement of this action, in the hands of Ouchterlony & Co., ordered to be paid to whomsoever was entitled to it, as having been the owner at the time of the wreck, and had, since the trial of this cause, been paid by them to the plaintiff under an agreement that such payment should be without prejudice.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was, under the circumstances stated, entitled to maintain an action against the defendant to recover any portion of the proceeds of the wreck. If the Court should be of opinion that no action was maintainable, then a nonsuit was to be entered; if they thought an action was maintainable, then the verdict was to be entered for such amount as the Court should direct. And it was agreed that the Court might draw such inferences and conclusions from the facts of the case as the jury might have drawn.

Crowder and Greenwood, for the plaintiff.
—The present action is maintainable against the defendant for the whole amount claimed. The case states that the master was appointed by the owner; and, consequently, the possession of the vessel was not given up to the charterers, and if the action can be supported, the plaintiff is the proper party to bring it. The question is, whether the plaintiff, as owner, can sue the defendant for the proceeds. It will be said that he cannot, because there is no privity of contract between them, the defendant acting under the master, to whose order he has paid over the proceeds. The plaintiff, and not the master, was the principal of the defendant, and it was his duty to retain the proceeds for the benefit of the plaintiff. In Hunter v. Parker (1) the authority of the master to sell the ship was regarded as incapable of delegation; and the sale here must be taken to have been made by the plaintiff, and not by the master. The disbursements were made, not for the benefit of the charterers, and they cannot be set up as against the plaintiff, who is entitled to recover all the proceeds beyond the mere expenses of the sale. Regarding the sale as a sale by the master, he had no authority to dispose of the wreck, so as to put it out of the power of the plaintiff to recover the proceeds in the present action. His authority was limited and restricted to the necessity of the case; and though he might have authority to sell the ship, yet that would be for the benefit of the owner, and not of the charterers. Because, however, he had authority to sell, it was not a necessary consequence that he had power to dispose of the proceeds in this mode.

[MAULE, J.—Does not the power to sell involve the power to receive the purchase-money?]

It is laid down in Abbott on Shipping, p. 138, 8th edit., that the authority of the Master is strictly limited to what is absolutely necessary. Referring to Cary v. White (2), it is said, "This case, while it establishes the principle of the personal responsibility of the owners, shews also that the creditor is required to prove the actual existence of the necessity of those things which give rise to his demand." The Master can only do what is strictly necessary and no more: for example, if a creditor furnishes goods to the master of a vessel, he must prove the necessity for the articles in order to charge the owner. So here, though the sale may have been necessary, there was no necessity that the money should be paid to Frazer's order.

[MAULE, J.—Do you say that the purchaser could not pay the master ready money for the wreck?]

He must pay the owner or his agent.

[MAULE, J.—It is not stated that the owner had not an agent at the Cape. It would lead to great inconvenience, if, in order to limit the master's power, he was to be at liberty to sell on credit to any person he might choose.]

Littledale, J. held, in Mynn v. Joliffe (3), that an agent to sell an estate had no authority to receive the purchase-money.

[MAULE, J.—The auctioneer is not intrusted with the estate, nor has he the power to hand it over. A ship must necessarily be handed over at once to the purchaser.]

But if Frazer had authority to receive the purchase-money, it was not competent for him to give an order to credit him for 319*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, the price of the articles purchased by himself and the mate. The 578*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.* too, must be taken to have been paid by order of the master for the benefit of the charterers. It is said, in Story on Agency, p. 75. s. 98, "In some cases, the nature and extent of the incidental authority turn upon very nice considerations, either of actual usage or implications of law. Thus, an agent employed to make, or negotiate, or conclude a contract, is not as of course to be treated as having an incidental authority to receive payments which may become due under such contract. An insurance broker was held, in Todd v. Reid (4), only to be entitled to receive payment for the assured, in money; and, therefore, that a custom to set off the general balance due from the broker to the underwriter, in the settlement of a particular loss, was void. Bartlett v. Pentland (5) and Scott v. Irving (6) are to the same effect.

[MAULE, J. referred to Stewart v. Aberdeen (7).]

There the defendant knew the plaintiff to be the owner of the vessel, and he was not justified in paying the proceeds to the charterer, nor was he authorized to make disbursements not for the benefit of the owner. The proceeds might just as well have been applied to purchase another ship as in the mode they have been applied, and to allow such payments as these would open a wide door to fraud.

[COLTMAN, J.—Is there any distinction between the payment made to the order of the Master and the disbursements?]

Alderson, B. says, in Barker v. Greenwood (8), "An agent, with a general authority is, as it seems to me, only bound to receive payment in such a way as thereby to put it in his power completely to discharge the duty he himself owes to his principal. If, therefore, he is bound to pay the whole over to his principal, he must receive it in cash from the debtor; and a person who pays such an agent, and who means to be safe, must see that the mode of payment does enable the agent to perform this his duty. If, therefore, the agent be not a creditor of this principal, he must receive the whole in cash, for otherwise he does not, by the act done between him and the debtor, put himself into the situation of being able to pay it over." In Story on Agency it is also said that "a person dealing with a factor or broker, though a general agent, is not clothed with authority to pledge, deposit, or transfer the property of his principal for his own debts; and if he receives such a deposit or pledge, the title is invalid, and the property may be reclaimed by the principal."

Channell, Serj. and Cleasby, for the defendant.—No privity existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, which will enable the plaintiff to maintain this action; and even if there had been, the defendant had discharged himself by the payments made to the order of Frazer and the remittance to England under his directions. The sale at the Cape was necessary and proper, and the owner has admitted that by bringing this action for the proceeds. The Court expressed their opinion in Hunter v. Parker that the master of a ship has authority to sell her for the benefit of all parties, if in consequence of injury to the ship during the voyage, there is no prospect of bringing her to its termination; and they held that, at all events, if the owner receives the proceeds, he ratifies the act of the master in selling her, and is prevented from afterwards recovering back the ship. Frazer, therefore, having under the circumstances authority to sell, the defendants were employed by him, and received the proceeds as his agent and subject to his orders. Stephens v. Badcock (9) shews that although Frazer may have been the plaintiff's agent, there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. In that case an attorney, who was accustomed to receive certain dues for the plaintiff his client, went from home, leaving his clerk at the office, who, in the absence of his master, received money on account of those dues for the client, which he was authorized to do, and gave a receipt signed by him for the attorney. The attorney was in bad circumstances when he left home, and never returned; but it did not appear that his intention so to act was known at the time of payment to the clerk, who afterwards refused to pay the money over to the client: and in an action against him for money had and received it was held that the action did not lie, the defendant having received the money as the agent of his master, and there being no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. Here, too, the ship was mortgaged, and the defendant not knowing the state of the account between the mortgagor and mortgagee, could not tell who was entitled to the proceeds. In Story on Agency, sect. 127. p. 179, it is said "that an agent is not ordinarily permitted to set up the adverse title of a third person to defeat the rights of his principal against his own manifest obligations to him, or to dispute the title of his principal. If, therefore, he has received goods from his principal, and has agreed to hold them, subject to his order, or to sell them for him and to account for the proceeds, he will not be allowed to set up the adverse title of a third person to the same goods to defeat his obligation. An exception, however, is allowed, where the principal has obtained the goods fraudulently or tortiously from such third person. The same principle is upheld in equity as in law; and, therefore, if an agent received money for his principal, he is bound to pay it over to him, and he cannot be converted into a trustee for a third person, by a mere notice of his claim. It is upon a somewhat analogous principle connected with the want of privity, that an agent employed by a trustee is accountable only to him, and not to the cestui que trust, and a sub-agent is accountable to the superior agent who was employed, and not generally to the principal. Cases, however, may occur where by the usage of trade or otherwise a sub-agent is employed where the original agent would not be responsible for the conduct of the sub-agent, and where, therefore, the appropriate remedy of the principal would be directly against the sub-agent." The present case does not fall within any of these exceptions. The ruling in Mynn v. Joliffe, that an agent employed to sell an estate has not authority to receive payment, does not affect the present question, for that was the case of land, whereas the contrary has been held with regard to goods—Capel v. Thornton (10). If then the defendant would have been justified in paying the proceeds of the sale to Frazer, he was justified in remitting them to his order; and so with respect to the price of the goods bought by the captain and mate. If the defendant can be said to have received it, he must be taken also to have paid it over to Frazer.

Crowder replied.

MAULE, J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—This case was argued before my Brothers Coltman, Williams, and myself, in the absence of the Lord Chief Justice, who was counsel in the cause. The Judges who heard the argument have agreed on the judgment I am to pronounce. This is an action of assumpsit for money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff, for interest, and for money due on an account stated. The defendant pleaded—first, non assumpsit; secondly, payment; thirdly, a set-off of money due from the plaintiff to the defendant, and one Harrison Watson, whom the plea alleges to be out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and to have made the promises alleged in the declaration jointly with the defendant. The issues joined on these pleas came on for trial before Lord Chief Justice Tindal, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to a case which stated, in effect, that the plaintiff was the registered owner of the ship Royal William at the time of the transaction in question. The plaintiff had chartered the ship to C. A. Gordon, for a voyage from London to Madras and Calcutta, and back to London. Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co., of London, were jointly interested with C. A. Gordon in the charter-party. The master of the ship for the voyage was D. Frazer, mentioned in the charter-party as appointed by the owner. The ship had also been mortgaged by the plaintiff, for securing the payment of a sum of money which was unpaid at the time of the remittance of the proceeds of the wreck, and exceeded the amount of those proceeds. The mortgagees had effected a policy of assurance on the ship, and had received money from the underwriters, for which they had given credit to the plaintiff. The ship sailed on the voyage with a cargo belonging to fifty different persons, and, with the cargo, was totally wrecked at the Cape of Good Hope. The plaintiff had no interest in the cargo or adventure. The master, D. Frazer, employed the defendant and his partner, H. Watson, who were merchants at the Cape, to superintend the preservation and sale of the ship stores and damaged part of the cargo, and to receive the proceeds thereof. The defendant and his partner accordingly employed an auctioneer, who sold the ship, damaged cargo, and stores. The net proceeds of the sale were received by the defendant and his partner, with the exception of £19*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, which was the amount of certain articles belonging to the wreck which had been bought at the sale by the master, Frazer, and Andrews the mate, which was not actually paid by Frazer or Andrews to the auctioneer, or by him to the defendant and his partner, but which, by order of Frazer, had been credited to him by the defendant and his partner, as money received on his account, and debited to him as money advanced to him. The defendant and his partner, before any claim made on them by the plaintiff, or any one else, had paid over the whole of what they had received on the account of ship and cargo either to the master, Frazer, or to his order at the Cape, or to Messrs. Ouchterlony & Co., to whom Frazer had directed them to remit the balance on account of whom it might concern, with the exception of what they retained to cover the disbursements necessarily incurred by them in the execution of the duty of superintending the preservation and sale of the ship and cargo, and their own charge for agency, which was fair and reasonable. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff insists that the defendant is liable to pay him the whole, or some part, of what was received by him and his partner on account of the ship. The defendant insists that he was accountable to Frazer only, and not to the plaintiff; or, at least, that, after having fully accounted to Frazer, and paid over the balance to his order, he is not liable to the plaintiff.

There can be no doubt that the sale was, under the circumstances, necessary, and, indeed, this was not disputed in the argument. Where a ship continues to retain the character of a ship, and to be capable of being used as such, with or without repairs, difficult questions may arise as to the master's authority to sell, and a sale in such a case is to be viewed with suspicion, the master's duty being, in general, to proceed on the voyage, if possible; or, at least, not to sell the ship without a strong necessity, or the express authority of the owner. But in the present case, where the ship is totally wrecked, and a large part of the cargo damaged, in a distant country, there can be no doubt of the right and duty of the master to sell. Indeed, it does not appear what other course, consistent with any regard to the interest of those concerned, it was possible for the master to have adopted. But the plaintiff, though not disputing the right to sell, denies the right of the master to receive the proceeds, or, at least, to dispose of them by ordering the defendant to pay them either to persons at the Cape, or to Ouchterlony & Co., of London, to whom the balance was remitted.

With regard to the right of the master to receive the proceeds, the case of Mynn v. Lolife was cited, in which it was decided that an agent employed to sell an estate is not, as such, authorized to receive the purchase-money; and there is no doubt that, on the sale of an estate, to imply such an authority would be most inconvenient and unnecessary, it being clearly for the interest of the vendor that he, and not his agent, should receive the purchase-money; and no inconvenience to any one arises out of the limit to the authority of the agent which excludes his right to receive the money. The proper course is, clearly, that the vendee should retain the money and the vendor the estate till the conveyance is made, and thus neither of them runs any risk of losing the money. But, in the present case, if the master was not to receive the money, he must either give credit to the purchasers of the ship and cargo, leaving the owners to receive it from them, or must employ some third person, of his own selection, to receive the money from the purchasers, and pay it to those who were interested in the ship and cargo. The inconvenience of either of these alternatives is so great and manifest, that it leaves no doubt that the authority of the master to receive the proceeds is a necessary incident to his authority to sell. And it appears to us, that an authority to receive the proceeds involves an authority to order payment of them bond fide to such person as the master may think fit: a payment under such an order being, in effect, a payment to the master. It differs from the cases cited of payments where no money is disbursed by the debtor or received by the agent, but where the debt of the agent is discharged by being set off against the money which he has to receive from his creditor on account of his principal. In the present case, the defendant actually pays the money, and has no advantage which he could not have if he paid it into the hands of the master. In the case of the set-off, the debtor gains an advantage by his mode of dealing with the agent, which he could not have had if he had dealt with the principal. The payments having been ordered and made bond fide, which we must take to be the case, nothing being stated in the case or suggested in the argument to the contrary, it does not appear to us to be material for what purpose they were ordered, any more than it would be material to inquire into any application which the master might have made of money paid into his hands. The sum of 319*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, the amount of goods bought by the master and mate, does not, we think, fall under a different rule from the rest of the proceeds of the sale. It might, indeed, be said not to have been money actually received by the defendant, but we think it was properly treated by him under the order of the master, as having been received for the master, and advanced to him by his order. This sum of money, together with that paid under the master's orders to persons at the Cape, and to Ouchterlony & Co., and with that properly retained by the defendant and his partner on account of their disbursements and services, constitutes the whole amount with which the defendant is in any way chargeable; and this having been properly paid and retained, it follows that the defendant has duly accounted for all that he was answerable for. Whether the action could have been maintained if the plaintiff, or all those interested in the ship and cargo, had intervened before the money had been paid by the orders of Frazer, it is not necessary to determine.

But there are strong reasons for considering the defendant and his partner as the agents of Frazer only, and not accountable to those interested in the ship and cargo, even if they had intervened before payment. In a learned work cited in the argument, Story on Agency, s. 203, n., the author states the rule thus:—"A sub-agent employed by an agent is, in general, accountable to the agent only, and not to the principal; for there is no reciprocity of contract between them." And this doctrine is supported by several cases which he refers to, among which is the case of Stephens v. Badcock, where the Court held, that a clerk who had received money for his master on account of the plaintiff, was not answerable to the plaintiff, whose remedy was against the master, though the clerk had not paid the money to him. In the case of Cartwright v. Hatley (11), a son employed under and accountable to his father, was held not to be accountable to his father's principal; and in Pinto v. Santos (12) (which in its circumstances bears some resemblance to the present case), it was held, that bankers who had received from an agent the proceeds of a ship which belonged to different persons in different shares, with notice of the agency of the party from whom the money was received, and of the rights of those who were entitled to it, were liable to account to the agent only from whom they received the money, notwithstanding the intervention of the plaintiff, who was entitled to the largest share. See, also, the case of Sims v. Brittain (13), in which the surviving part owners of a ship were considered not entitled to maintain an action for money had and received against persons whom a deceased part owner (who was the ship's husband) had employed to receive and pay money on account of the ship, on the ground of want of privity between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The principle on which these cases were determined would, probably, govern the present case if the circumstances required its application. But the defendant and his partner having duly paid over, under sufficient authority, all for which they were liable before any intervention of the plaintiff or any other of those interested in the fund, we think it clear that the defendant is not now liable to the plaintiff, but is protected by his plea of the general issue, if he never could have been liable, or by the pleas of payment and set-off, if his liability was determined by his accounting: in either of which events, by the agreement of the parties, a nonsuit is to be entered.

An affidavit to deprive a plaintiff of costs, under the 129th section of the County Courts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, must shew that the cause of action arose wholly or in some material point within the jurisdiction of the county court within which the defendant dwells or carries on business at the time of the action brought.

In this case a rule had been obtained, calling upon the plaintiffs to shew cause why the judgment to be signed in this cause should not be for the amount of the debt recovered only without costs, or why the plaintiffs should not carry in the record, and the defendant be at liberty to enter a suggestion thereon to deprive the plaintiffs of their costs, the verdict being for a sum less than 20*l.*, for which a plaint might have been entered in a county court.

The affidavit stated that the plaintiffs carried on business at Wapping in Middlesex, within nine miles of the defendant's residence at Woolwich, which is within the jurisdiction of the county court of Kent, and that the action was brought for a balance of 3*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*, for goods sold and delivered at Wapping aforesaid.

Lush shewed cause.—The affidavit upon which this rule was moved does not negative the cases mentioned in the 128th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, in which the superior courts have a concurrent jurisdiction with the new county courts; there is nothing, therefore, to shew that the plaintiffs ought to be deprived of their costs by the operation of the 129th section of that act. It is not shewn that the cause of action arose wholly or in some material point within the jurisdiction of the county court, wherein the defendant dwelt at the time the action was brought.

Simon, in support of the rule.—The affidavit is sufficient, as the circumstances therein stated shew that the case is within the first part of the 56th section of the act, which gives the county court jurisdiction. In addition it states that the plaintiffs carry on business within twenty miles of the defendant's residence, which is within the jurisdiction of a county court; and it is unnecessary also to state that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the court within which the defendant dwelt at the time of the action brought. By the 60th section of the act a summons may issue, though the cause of action does not arise within the jurisdiction.

[WILLIAMS, J.—The question is not, whether the jurisdiction of the county court existed, but whether the action must have been brought there.]

It is submitted that it is sufficient to shew that the plaintiffs might have gone to the county court, and have there recovered against the defendant.

Per Curiam.—In order to deprive a plaintiff of his costs it is not sufficient to shew that he might have sued in the county court, it should be shewn that it was incumbent on him to have sued there. There is nothing in this affidavit to shew that the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the court where the defendant dwelt, so as to preclude the plaintiffs by the 28th section of the County Courts Act from suing in the superior courts; and this rule must, therefore, be discharged.

Rule discharged, with costs.

After an act of bankruptcy, committed by A, the plaintiffs, who were subsequently appointed assignees, directed A's shop to be kept open as usual. The defendants, with notice of the act of bankruptcy, purchased goods at the shop, which were delivered to them on the 28th of February, and the plaintiffs were appointed assignees on the 24th of March. Applications were made on the 9th and 23rd of April to the defendants, by the direction of the plaintiffs, as assignees, for payment for the goods supplied on the 28th of February, and a formal demand of them was made and refused on the 14th of May:—Held, that the above facts furnished no evidence of an affirmation by the assignees of a contract of sale, and that the defendants were liable in trover.

Trover. The first count of the declaration was by the plaintiffs, assignees of T. Sutton, a bankrupt, for certain goods of the said T. Sutton, which came into the possession of the defendants before the bankruptcy. The second count was for certain other goods, the property of the plaintiffs, assignees of the said T. Sutton. The defendants pleaded, first, not guilty; whereon issue was joined. Secondly, as to the first count, that the said T. Sutton, before he became bankrupt, was not possessed, &c. Issue thereon. Lastly, as to the second count, that the plaintiffs were not possessed, &c. Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Patteson, J., at the Warwickshire Summer Assizes, 1846, it appeared that the bankrupt was a draper at Atherstone; and that on the 23rd of February 1846 he committed an act of bankruptcy. The fiat issued on the 3rd of March; the adjudication took place on the 5th; and the plaintiffs were appointed assignees on the 24th of March 1846. The defendants were in partnership as wine-merchants, at Atherstone; and the bankrupt and the defendants were in the habit of dealing with each other. At the time of his bankruptcy, T. Sutton was indebted to the defendants on a balance of accounts; and on Friday, the 27th of February, the defendants went to the shop of Sutton, and bought goods to the amount of 6*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*, which were sent to their house on Saturday the 28th. The defendants knew that Sutton was a bankrupt at the time the goods were purchased, and were informed by the shopman, who delivered them, that they must be paid for to the bankrupt's estate. On the 14th of May a formal demand of the goods was made by the assignees, when the defendants said they had used them. It also appeared that the present assignees, before their appointment, directed the shop of the bankrupt to be kept open, and sales to take place as usual, from Monday the 23rd of February, when the act of bankruptcy was committed by Sutton, who then left his business, till the night of Saturday the 28th of February. Upon the close of the plaintiffs' case, the defendants' counsel applied for a nonsuit on the ground that the assignees, under the circumstances proved, could not maintain trover. His Lordship refused to nonsuit at that stage of the cause, and the defendants then put in the following letters:—

"April 9, 1846.

"In re Sutton (a bankrupt).

"Gentlemen,—I am directed to apply to you for the sum of 11*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*, for goods supplied to you on the 25th and 27th of February last, which be pleased to remit to me without loss of time.

"I am, &c., for R. V, official assignee.

(Signed) "G. S."

"To Messrs. Sanders & Sanford."

(Inclosed were accounts of the goods supplied at the above dates, amounting to 5*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* and 6*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.* It was admitted on the argument, that the claim for the former sum could not be maintained; and the question turned upon the right of the assignees to recover the sum of 6*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*)

"Rugby, April 23, 1846.

"Gentlemen,—I am directed by Mr. Sutton's assignees to apply to you for payment of the sum of 11*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*; and you will be so good as to pay the same to me, with 5*s.* for this letter, by Thursday next, as in case of non-payment I have positive directions to sue you for the same. I am, &c.,

"W. F. W."

"To Messrs. Sanders & Sanford, Atherstone."

The following letter was then put in by the plaintiffs:—

"Atherstone, 28th April, 1846.

"Dear Sir,—Messrs. Sanders & Sanford consulted us on the subject of the claim made against them by the assignees of T. Sutton, as appears in your letter to them of the 23rd inst. We carefully considered all the circumstances, and advised that they were not liable to pay that claim, but were legally entitled to set off the amount of their claims on the bankrupt's estate. Since that time we have taken the opinion of Mr. J. B. on the matter, and he concurs with us; and if it be determined to bring an action, we will accept service of the writ and appear. We are, &c. &c.

"P. & P."

"To W. F. W, Esq., solicitor, Rugby."

The question of notice, on the part of the defendants, of the act of bankruptcy on the 27th of February, was left to the jury, who found that the defendants had notice of the bankruptcy at the time of the sale. The learned Judge then nonsuited the plaintiffs, with liberty to move to enter a verdict for them. A rule having been obtained, pursuant to the leave reserved,—

Whitehurst and Mellor shewed cause (Jan. 24).—The act of bankruptcy was committed on the 23rd of February, but the shop of the bankrupt was kept open by the direction of the plaintiffs till the night of Saturday the 28th, on which day the goods in question were delivered to the defendants, and the plaintiffs were appointed assignees on the 10th of March. The goods were, therefore, in point of law, sold by the plaintiffs. The letter of the 9th of April, written by their desire, adopts and confirms the contract of sale, to which the defendants have always assented, and consequently there has not been a conversion. It was said that this question does not arise upon the form of the pleadings, but it is submitted, that the facts proved amount to not possessed, and could not have been expanded on the record—Stancliffe v. Hardwick (1), Pickard v. Sears (2). The plea of not possessed relates to the time of the conversion, because a plaintiff cannot be expected to go to trial armed with proof that ten years ago the goods belonged to the bankrupt. The question of property must then depend upon the time of the conversion by the defendants, and if the property passed at the time of the sale or delivery of the goods, the assignees were rightly nonsuited. If the delivery on the 28th of March was unauthorized, then, as both the party who assists in an unauthorized delivery and the party who receives are guilty of conversion, it must follow that the shopman delivering, who was acquainted with all the circumstances, is also guilty of conversion—Kynaston v. Crouch (3), which could scarcely be insisted on, as the goods were sold and delivered in the usual way of business. The delivery then on the 28th of March was not wrongful, and so there was no conversion on that day. The assignees may affirm or disaffirm a sale, at their option. It is admitted that to shew an affirmation there must be some decisive act on their part, and it is submitted there were many such acts in this case. The bankrupt's shopman was directed by the assignees to sell; it may, therefore, be said that the delivery which necessarily followed the sale was their act, and the money was twice demanded by them as on a sale of goods. The principle of affirmation is well laid down by Lord Kenyon, in Smith v. Hodson (4). The assignees must act consistently throughout,—they cannot, as it is said, blow hot and cold. Brewer v. Sparrow (5),

Pearson v. Graham (6) and Needham v. Raubone (7), were also referred to. The letter of the 28th of April from the defendants' attorney, put in as an answer to the defendants' case, has no reference to the point of affirmation: its effect is to say, the defendants had no notice of the act of bankruptcy, and are therefore protected by the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1. The plaintiffs now rely upon a conversion on the 14th of May, and endeavour, by a formal demand of the goods, to do away with and repudiate all the numerous acts of affirmation which had taken place between that day and the 27th of March; but it is not competent for them so to do, and thus annihilate a contract for the sale of goods entered into and completed by a servant acting under their own directions, assented to by them for five weeks, and after repeated applications for the value of the goods as for a debt owing to them—Gregg v. Wells (8), Coles v. the Bank of England (9).

Waddington (Humfrey with him).—It cannot be doubted that there was a conversion on the 28th of February. The case of Hurst v. Gwennap (10) is exactly in point. Here there was really no affirmation at all. The meaning of the letters is this: the assignees say, "We will waive the tort if you will pay the money."

[WILDE, C.J.—I understand this case thus, "If you do not elect to take the goods as a sale from us, if you insist upon it as a sale from the bankrupt, and so claim a set-off, we will bring an action for a tort."]

Exactly so. The letter of the 23rd of April is no waiver of a tort and affirmation of a contract: but if it were, was there any acceptance on the other side? It is submitted there was nothing of the kind. The answer to it of the 28th of April says in effect, "we had no notice of the act of bankruptcy, and upon that issue we shall resist your claim." There is no case which carries the doctrine of affirmation of contracts so far as is here attempted. Brewer v. Sparrow is easily distinguished; there money had been paid on a balance of accounts, and that operated as an estoppel. As there has been no payment, the defendants here are in the situation of the defendant in Kynaston v. Crouch, and may be sued in trover. If payment could have been shewn to have been received by the assignees, then this case would be governed by Brewer v. Sparrow; but as no payment was made, it is quite extravagant to say there was any waiver.

[CRESSWELL, J.—If a person sells by the direction and on behalf of those who are subsequently appointed assignees, can they affirm the sale as a contract after they are appointed? Their title accrues by relation, can their affirmation do so also?]

It is extremely doubtful; there is no saying what miracles the difficult doctrine of relation may work. Perhaps the subsequent affirmation would operate as a waiver, but it could not change the original character of the transaction. But, however this may be, the plaintiffs rely upon the point that there is no evidence of affirmation in this case.

The judgment of the Court was now (May 12) delivered by—

WILDE, C.J.—This was an action of trover brought by the plaintiffs, assignees of Thomas Sutton a bankrupt, for the purpose of recovering the value of certain goods which had belonged to the bankrupt, and which had been sold by the bankrupt's shopman after an act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt having absconded, and after notice of the act of bankruptcy received by the defendants. Subsequently to the appointment of the plaintiffs as assignees, their agent sent a bill of parcels to the defendants as for goods sold by the bankrupt to the defendants, and the solicitor of the plaintiffs demanded payment of the amount of such bill of parcels. The defendants refused to pay for the goods, whereupon the plaintiffs demanded the goods, and upon the refusal of the defendants to deliver them brought the present action of trover.

Upon the trial, it was contended, on the part of the defendants, that by the delivery of the bill of parcels and demand of payment as for goods sold and delivered by the bankrupt, the plaintiffs had affirmed the sale and could not afterwards disaffirm it and maintain trover; and upon this objection the plaintiffs were nonsuited, leave being given to them to move to enter a verdict in their favour for the amount demanded, if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. It appears by the Judge's report of the evidence, that the sale was made by the bankrupt's servant, after the bankrupt had absconded, and altogether without authority, and after notice of the act of bankruptcy to the defendants. It is therefore clear that the defendants, by receiving the goods under such unauthorized sale, were guilty of a conversion as against the assignees of the bankrupt. There was no evidence to shew that the plaintiffs, or their agents, had any notice that the bankrupt was indebted to the defendants at the time of the delivery of the bill of parcels, nor at the time when the demand was made for payment; and it was proved that before the delivery of the goods the shopman who sold them informed the defendants that the goods must be paid for to the estate of the bankrupt. Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs obtained the present rule nisi to set aside the nonsuit and to enter a verdict for them; and upon the argument upon the rule, the principal point discussed was, whether the plaintiffs had by the acts before mentioned affirmed the sale by the shopman as a sale by their agent, and so precluded themselves from maintaining an action of trover? The Court is of opinion that such was not the effect of those acts; and that the utmost effect to be given to them is, that there was a qualified offer on their part to adopt the sale, that is, if the defendants would pay for the goods, and that when the defendants refused to pay for them, it was competent to the plaintiffs to repudiate the sale altogether and bring the present action. In the case of Brewer v. Sparrow assignees were held to have adopted the dealings of the defendant with the estate of the bankrupt, which took place after an act of bankruptcy, and with notice, by adjusting an account of receipts and payments in respect of such dealings, and by receiving the balance due upon the result of such an account, treating all the transactions as valid; but in the case of Morris v. Robinson (11), where a quantity of indigo shipped at Calcutta on freight had been improperly sold under the order of a court of Vice-Admiralty at the Mauritius and the proceeds paid into court, the owner of the indigo was held entitled to maintain trover against the defendant who had purchased and received thirty-two chests of the indigo so sold, notwithstanding the plaintiff's agent, under a power of attorney executed by the plaintiff, had made an unsuccessful application to the Vice-Admiralty Court to obtain the proceeds paid into court of certain other of the chests of indigo sold under the same circumstances as those purchased by the defendant. And in Burn v. Morris (12), where trover was brought for a 20*l.* bank note which the plaintiff had lost, and which the defendant had received from a woman who had found it, and had exchanged it at the bank, notwithstanding the plaintiff had received from the woman who found it the sum of 7*l.*, being part of the proceeds which had been obtained by the defendant by the exchange of the note at the bank (the 7*l.* being allowed only in reduction of damages), the plaintiff was held, notwithstanding its receipt, entitled to maintain trover; and upon Brewer v. Sparrow being cited, the Court said "that case was distinguishable by the fact that the assignees had there received a sum as the whole balance due to them upon the footing of the account." And in the case of Hurst v. Gwennap goods had been delivered by a bankrupt to the defendant upon sale or return, after an act of bankruptcy, but without notice. The assignees, after their appointment, required the defendant to say whether he would keep the goods or not. The defendant elected to keep the goods, whereupon the assignees delivered a bill of parcels as upon a sale by the bankrupt to the defendant, and demanded payment of the amount. The defendant refused to pay, claiming a set-off, as in the present case, whereupon the assignees, without further demand, brought trover, and were held entitled to recover, and the Court confirmed the ruling of Lord Ellenborough at Nisi Prius. We are, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs by demanding payment for the goods as upon a sale by the bankrupt, which demand was not acquiesced in by the defendants, did not preclude themselves from maintaining trover upon refusal of the defendants to pay according to such demand. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to make this rule absolute to enter a verdict for them for the value of the goods so received by the defendants under the circumstances before stated.

APPEAL from the Courts of Revision, under 6 Vict. c. 18.

1848. }
 Jan. 20; } BURTON, APPELLANT; LANG-
 May 12. } HAM, RESPONDENT.

Parliament—Vote—Occupation as Tenant, under 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 20.—Committee of Lunatic.

*By letters patent, the whole management of a lunatic's property, both real and personal, was granted to a committee, who was directed to render a yearly account of the estate to the Court of Chancery. The committee occupied land of the lunatic worth 393*l.* per annum. He described himself as tenant, and debited himself with that sum as rent, in the yearly account rendered to and allowed by the Court of Chancery:—Held, that the committee did not occupy as tenant lands or tenements, within the meaning of the 20th section of the Reform Act.*

At a court held before the revising barrister, duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the parish of Cottesbrooke in the southern division of the county of Northampton, Mr. E. S. Burton objected that Mr. H. Langham was improperly on the register as tenant, under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 20. The barrister stated the following

CASE.

Mr. Herbert Langham is committee of the estate of his brother Sir James Hay Langham, and holds lands in Cottesbrooke, as occupier, to the value of 393*l.* per annum. The said Herbert Langham proved that his accounts are from time to time transmitted for examination and approval to the Court of Chancery, and a document was produced by the said Herbert Langham, entitled "The ninth account of Herbert Langham, as committee of the estate of Sir J. H. Langham, bart.," bearing the signature of Edward Winslow, one of the commissioners of lunacy, and the seal of the court in which the name of Mr. H. Langham appeared as tenant, in the tenants' volume, at the rent of 393*l.* per annum.

The said H. Langham stated, that after the passing of the account he retained a balance of about 1,500*l.*, out of which, after paying a jointure on the estate, he defrayed the expenses of repairs and improvements on the property. He further stated, that he was appointed committee on the 21st of June, A.D. 1837; that he took possession of the lands about Lady-day, 1843, succeeding to an occupying tenant, and that he has continued to hold them up to the present time. He also stated that he occupies Cottesbrooke House, and the adjoining fields. Part of the furniture in the house is his own.

Mr. Wood, steward of Cottesbrooke estate, stated on oath, that he was examined by the Master, with the accounts, and that in such examination the specific lands for which Mr. H. Langham claimed to vote were inquired into, with a view to their condition and value.

Mr. E. S. Burton objected that Mr. H. Langham, as such committee, was improperly on the register as tenant, under the 20th section of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45.

I found that Mr. H. Langham held as occupying tenant, and retained his name on the list of voters.

Signed, E. W, revising barrister.

This case came on to be heard on the 11th of November 1847, and was then remitted to the revising barrister to be stated more fully. The following additional facts were returned, as required by the Court:—

First. The following was the description of the respondent's qualification:—

Christian Name and Surname.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Name of Property, &c.
Langham, Herbert.	Cottesbrooke.	House and Land, Occupier.	Cottesbrooke.

"Know ye also, that we of our special grace and of our certain knowledge and mere motion, have given, committed and granted, and by these presents for us, our heirs and successors, do give, commit and grant unto the said Herbert Langham, the custody, regulation, occupation, disposition and receipt, as well of all manors, messuages, lands, tenements, houses, farms, revenues, services and hereditaments, with the appurtenances, and all rents, revenues and profits thereof, which the aforesaid Sir James Hay Langham hath or ought to have in possession or reversion, or which by any lawful ways and means, at any time or times hereafter, may or ought to come, descend, or accrue to the said Sir James Hay Langham, or which any other or others hath or may have to the use and profit of the said Sir James Hay Langham, in the county of Northampton, &c., or elsewhere, within our kingdom of Great Britain, as also the custody and government of all the goods and chattels, farms, stock of cattle, &c., and other the commodities and profits whatsoever, to the said Sir James Hay Langham belonging or in any manner appertaining, and also the use and negotiation of the same to the use and behoof, profit and advantage of the said Sir J. H. Langham, and for the maintenance, sustenance and support of the said Sir J. H. Langham and his family (if he hath any, or in any time to come may have); and also for the maintenance, preservation, and repair of the messuages, lands, tenements, houses, farms, and the residue of the premises of the said Sir J. H. Langham, to have and to hold the aforesaid custody, regulation, occupation, disposition and receipt of the aforesaid manors, messuages, lands, tenements, houses, farms, goods and chattels of the said Sir J. H. Langham, and all and singular other the premises above given, committed and granted, or mentioned to be given, committed and granted unto the said Herbert Langham from the date of these presents, so long as it shall please us, or during the continuance of the lunacy of the said Sir J. H. Langham. Provided always, that the said Herbert Langham, his executors and administrators, shall render a true account of the issues, revenues and profits of the manors, messuages, lands, tenements, &c. and of the goods, chattels and debts aforesaid, and of the profits thereof and of the rest of the premises, once in every year at least, and as often as and whensoever to the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, &c. for the time being shall seem meet, and shall obey and fulfil all and every the order and orders of the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, &c. made or hereafter to be made anyways touching or concerning the premises, or any part thereof, or the issues or profits thereof, or any account or accounts thereof."

Third. An account of the receipts and disbursements on account of the estate of Sir J. H. Langham, rendered by the respondent for the twelve months next preceding the 28th of August 1846, signed, sworn to by the respondent as correct, and allowed by the certificate of a Master in Chancery, was set out in the case. The name of the respondent appeared in this account thus :

Name of Tenant.	One Year's Rent due Lady-day, 1846.	Rents Received.	Deductions for Income Tax.	Arrears due.
Herbert Langham, Esq.	£. s. d. 393 0 0	£. s. d. 393 0 0	£. s. d. 6 3 8	None.

Fourth. A fuller statement of the circumstances under which the respondent took possession of the land.

On the 25th of March 1841, W. D, who rented and occupied a farm at Cottesbrooke, belonging to Sir J. H. Langham, quitted. At the same time J. G, who rented and occupied another farm belonging to Sir J. H. Langham, also quitted. Mr. Herbert Langham (the committee) entered upon the occupation of both farms, for which he debited himself in his accounts the sum of 31*l.* 10*s.*, which sum was made up as under:—

The rent paid by W. D. ....	£27 10 0
Ditto ditto by J. G. ....	4 0 0
	<hr/> 31 10 0

On the 25th of March 1843, T. F, who rented and occupied a farm belonging to Sir J. H. Langham at Cottesbrooke, at the rent of 210*l.* per annum, quitted. Mr. Herbert Langham entered upon the occupation of it, and charged himself with the same sum as T. F. had paid for rent, viz. —210*l.*, and with the 31*l.* 10*s.*, making total rent 241*l.* 10*s.*

The above is the occupancy upon which the respondent made his claim for a vote, the greater part of which he still occupies together with Cottesbrooke House. In consequence of J. G, the tenant of the park and other land at Cottesbrooke, having become insolvent, Mr. Herbert Langham entered upon the occupation of the said park and some land adjacent thereto.

The extent of the lands held by the respondent amounts to 210 acres. Mr. Wood, the bailiff of the estate of the respondent, on annually passing his account, makes a report, verified by affidavit, as to the general condition and costs of repairs of the estate. It did not appear in evidence before me, that Mr. Herbert Langham had the power of making any leases of the lands belonging to the lunatic.

It also appeared, by the evidence of Mr. Herbert Langham, that since his appointment as committee he had actually paid no rent, and that no receipt was given to him by any person, but he had debited himself with the above annual sums, and that the balance now in his hands was upwards of 1,600*l*.

Fifth. The respondent receives the produce of the lands held by him at Cottessbrook entirely to his own use and benefit, and does not account for any part of it to the estate of the lunatic. The sum stated by the respondent as rent paid for the said land, is included with the accounts of the rents of the other tenants on the estate, as will be seen by reference to the account.

Humfrey, for the appellant.—The letters patent do not make Herbert Langham tenant of the house and land for which he claims to vote. The words are, "we do give, commit, and grant the custody, occupation, and receipt of all messuages, &c., and all revenues, rents, &c., which the said lunatic hath, or ought to have, to the said Herbert Langham, to the use and profit of the said lunatic, so long as it shall please us, or during the continuance of his lunacy." The committee would cease to have any power over the estate if the lunacy ceased or the letters patent were revoked, and till either of those events happens they operate as an absolute grant to the committee of all the lands, &c. to the use and profit of the lunatic. Herbert Langham is really a trustee, and as such cannot be tenant of any lands of which he is trustee. The Attorney General v. Dixie (1) and The Attorney General v. Lord Clarendon (2) are express decisions to that effect. Next, the committee has the sole management of the lands, &c.; he cannot lease to himself, and he cannot distrain upon himself, because he has the reversion in himself. The statute 1 Will. 4. c. 65. ss. 19, 23, 24. empowers the Lord Chancellor to direct the committee of a lunatic to make leases when applied for, and that shews conclusively he cannot do so simply as committee.

[WILLIAMS, J.—Would he not be entitled to vote if he occupied the land on a quantum meruit ?]

No—the words of the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 26. require that the party should occupy as tenant, and be liable to a rent of 60*l*.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Suppose that for some reason over which the committee had no controul the land he occupied was entirely unproductive, what rent would he have to pay or account for to the Court ?]

None at all. If the lunatic were to become sane, or to die in the middle of a year, the committee could not require a notice to quit, nor could he be called upon to pay anything after the day that either event happened; it cannot, therefore, be said that he is liable to a yearly rent. He is in an anomalous position; he occupies neither as owner nor as tenant, but as committee, which approaches most nearly to the character of trustee.

Manning, Serj., for the respondent.—It is not disputed that a committee takes no estate in the land—Knipe v. Palmer (3). He has no more authority than the donee of a power under a will, in respect of which the donee takes no estate whatever, and for that reason the late act of parliament gives a committee an estate to enable him to make leases. The cases in Chancery relating to trustees do not apply. It is the practice of the Court of Chancery which prevents the trustee from being tenant to the lands of which he is a trustee, in order to guard against all chance of fraud—otherwise, as the trustee has the legal estate, he could make leases.

[WILDE, C.J.—The question is, can the Crown grant a tenancy of a lunatic's estate? and if so, what evidence is there of such a tenancy here ?]

There is evidence of it, and all the evidence that can be produced. The Court of Chancery, which represents and acts for the Crown, accepts Herbert Langham. In the account he renders as committee, he describes himself as *tenant liable to a rent of 393*l*. from year to year*—he is therefore estopped from denying his character and liability as tenant.

[MAULE, J.—That does not make him tenant: it makes him accountable for that

(1) 13 Ves. 519.

(2) 17 Ibid. 401.

(3) 2 Wils. 130.

sum, but not accountable as tenant. The Court of Chancery looks to the substance of matters; it does not care about defining the character of the occupation.]

It makes him accountable for so much rent. It is clear the committee occupies, and if so, he must occupy as owner, tenant, or bailiff. The first character is out of the question; and either of the two latter, if he be liable to the required amount of rent, is sufficient to confer the right to vote.

[WILLIAMS, J.—The committee occupies the mansion-house—if it were demolished by lightning, would he be liable to pay rent?]

That depends upon the nature of his tenancy. A tenant from year to year is not liable in the event of demolition by lightning. Suppose the lunatic were to become sane, and rent were due, he could distrain; for he would say to the committee, "you called yourself tenant, and paid rent as such." The occupation makes him liable "as tenant," and that is all that is necessary under the act.

[MAULE, J.—Has the committee power to let from year to year, by virtue of the letters patent?]

It is submitted that he has not, without the sanction or adoption of the Court of Chancery. That Court is the exponent of the will of the lunatic, and has adopted the respondent as tenant. Suppose a stranger occupied and paid rent, he could not say I am a disseisor and no tenant, neither can the respondent say so here.

[MAULE, J.—The Reform Act means that a party who is entitled to vote must be tenant and liable as such to pay 50*l.* a-year—he must have the interest of tenant; he must be tenant and occupy in that character. A committee may make himself liable for rent, but he cannot make himself tenant.]

Humfrey, in reply.—A party who claims to vote under this section of the act, must occupy under a demise, by which he is liable as tenant to a yearly rent of 50*l.* The respondent may be estopped as to questions affecting himself from saying he is not tenant, but that does not make him legally tenant, which is what the act requires.

the decision of the revising barrister, who had allowed the name of the respondent, Herbert Langham, to be retained on the list of voters for the county of Northampton. Herbert Langham claimed to vote in respect of a qualification as occupier of a house and land; the vote was objected to on the ground that he did not occupy as tenant. The revising barrister decided that he did, and the appeal was against that decision. The property in respect of which the vote was claimed, is part of the property of Sir James Hay Langham, a lunatic. By letters patent of the 21st of June 1837 (1st Vict.) the custody of the person of the lunatic was granted to Dame Elizabeth Langham. To Herbert Langham (the respondent) was given, committed, and granted, the custody, regulation, occupation, disposition and receipt as well of all manors, messuages, lands, tenements, houses, farms, revenues, services, and hereditaments, with the appurtenances, and all rents, revenues, and profits thereof, which the aforesaid Sir James Hay Langham hath or ought to have in possession or reversion, &c., as also the custody and government of all the goods and chattels, farms, stock, cattle, &c. to the said Sir James Hay Langham belonging, to hold the said aforesaid custody, &c. so long as it should please us, during the continuance of the lunacy of the said Sir James Hay Langham; provided always that the said Herbert Langham, his executors, &c. shall render a true account of the issues, revenues, and profits of the manors, messuages, and lands, and of the goods and chattels, &c. once in every year at least, and as often as and whensoever to the Lord Chancellor should seem meet, and shall obey all order and orders of the Lord Chancellor made or hereafter to be made touching the premises. After this grant some of the tenants of Sir J. H. Langham quitted their farms, and Herbert Langham entered upon the occupation of them, to the extent of 200 acres with a house, received the produce to his own use and benefit, and in his annual account passed before a Master in Chancery in July 1847 entered himself in the column of the tenants; and in the column of rents due at Lady-day 1846, he inserted opposite his name the sum of 393*l.*, and in the column of receipts entered that sum as received.

The question for our decision is, whether the circumstances stated shew that Herbert Langham occupied the land as tenant, so as to be entitled to a vote under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 20, and after some hesitation we have come to the conclusion that he did not occupy as tenant.

The letters patent did not confer on him any estate, but merely the custody of the lands; he did not, therefore, by virtue of his appointment as committee, become tenant. No other act is shewn to have been done, by any person either having an estate, or power to create a tenancy, by virtue of which the respondent could become tenant; and the only evidence relied upon to prove a tenancy is the account rendered in the Court of Chancery, wherein he entered his own name as tenant, and 39*l.* the annual rent due at Lady-day 1846, and that sum as received by him; but he could not make himself tenant by his own act, nor could the Master in Chancery make him tenant by allowing that account. The account might, indeed, preclude the committee from saying he had not received profit to the amount entered, but it would not confer on him an estate as tenant, or render him liable to distress, or to an action for rent. We, therefore, think the decision of the revising barrister was wrong, and that the appeal must be allowed.

May 12.

Principal and Factor—Sale for Repayment of Advances after Consignment—Authority coupled with an Interest.

A factor for sale cannot sell the goods of his principal, in the exercise of a sound discretion, contrary to the principal's orders, for the purpose of reimbursing himself for advances made to the principal, after the consignment. There is not, in such a case, an authority coupled with an interest which is irrevocable; although the advances made subsequently to the consignment might be a good consideration for an agreement that the original revocable authority to sell should become irrevocable.

*The declaration (which was in assumption) stated that the plaintiffs had consigned a cargo of wheat to the defendants as corn-factors for sale; that the defendants promised to obey the lawful orders of the plaintiffs; that the defendants sold a portion of the wheat for 6*s.* 4*d.* per bushel, and that the plaintiffs ordered them not to sell any more for less than 7*s.* Breach, that the defendants sold for less.*

First plea—That, after the consignment, the defendants were under advances to the plaintiffs in respect of the consignment; that they gave notice to the plaintiffs to pay the amount, or that they would sell the residue of the cargo to reimburse themselves, that the plaintiffs failed to pay, and that the defendants, in the exercise of a sound discretion, for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and to reimburse themselves, sold at the best price which could be obtained.

Second plea, that the defendants had a lien on the residue of the cargo for advances made after the consignment, and, after notice and default, sold in the exercise of a sound discretion for the best price.

On demurrer, held that these pleas were bad in substance.

*Assumpsit. The declaration, which is set out in 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 39, stated, that whereas the defendants were and are corn-factors at Liverpool, and that heretofore, to wit, on the 23rd of June 1842, in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, had consigned and delivered to them as such factors a cargo, consisting of 8,563 bushels of wheat, to be sold and disposed of by the defendants, as such factors, for and on account of the plaintiffs, for reasonable commission and reward, the defendants promised to obey and observe the lawful orders and directions of the plaintiffs to be given by them to the defendants, with regard to the sale and disposal of the wheat: that the defendants afterwards sold and disposed of a small part of the wheat at 6*s.* 4*d.* per bushel, and although the plaintiffs ordered them not to sell any more for less than 7*s.* per bushel, yet the defendants sold for less. There was a second count similar to the first.*

The defendants pleaded two special pleas to each of the counts, to which pleas the plaintiffs demurred specially. Judgment having been given for the plaintiffs on the demurrers (1), the defendants obtained leave to add two pleas to each of the counts of the declaration (2).

The first of the additional pleas to the first count was as follows: that after the said cargo of wheat in the said first count mentioned had been so consigned to the defendants as such factors as in the said first count mentioned, and before the committing by the defendants of any of the said alleged breaches of promise in the said first count mentioned, to wit, on the 1st day of November, A.D. 1842, the defendants, as such factors as aforesaid, became and were under advances to the plaintiffs, in respect of the said consignment of the said cargo of wheat in the said first count mentioned, to a large amount, to wit, to the amount of 3,000*l.*, and which said sum, so advanced by the defendants, as such factors as aforesaid, to the plaintiffs, was then due and payable by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and which said advances the defendants had come under by reason of the defendants having (after the making of the promise in the first count mentioned, and whilst the defendants, as such factors as aforesaid, had authority from the plaintiffs to sell the said cargo of wheat in the first count mentioned at such times and for such prices as they, the defendants, in exercise of their discretion as such factors, thought it best for the plaintiffs that the cargo should be sold, and before the giving of any of the orders in the said first count mentioned by the plaintiffs to the defendants, to wit, on the 12th day of July, A.D. 1842,) accepted divers bills of exchange for the plaintiffs, and at their request, against, and on the security of the said cargo, in the said first count mentioned; and thereupon afterwards, and before the committing by the defendants of any of the said alleged breaches of promise in the said first count mentioned, to wit, on the 1st of November, A.D. 1842, they, the defendants, gave notice to the plaintiffs that they, the defendants, required the said sum of money so advanced by the defendants as such factors as aforesaid, in respect of the said consignment of the said cargo of wheat in the said first count mentioned to be repaid to them, the defendants, by the plaintiffs, and that if the plaintiffs did not repay to them, the defendants, the said sum of money, they, the defendants, would sell the whole of the residue of the said cargo of wheat in the said first count mentioned, and out of the money to be produced by such sale would repay themselves the said sum of money so advanced by the defendants as in this plea aforesaid. And the defendants further say, that although, after they, the defendants, had given the plaintiffs the said notice in this plea mentioned, and before the committing by the defendants of any of the said alleged breaches of promise in the said first count mentioned, a reasonable time for the plaintiffs to have repaid to the defendants the said sum of money so advanced by the defendants had elapsed, yet the plaintiffs did not nor would repay to the defendants the said sum of money, or any part thereof, but wholly neglected and refused so to do, and the whole of the said sum of money at the time of the committing by the defendants of the said several alleged breaches of promise in the first count mentioned remained due and unpaid from the plaintiffs to the defendants; and the defendants aver, that at the time when the defendants gave the plaintiffs the said notice in this plea mentioned, and from thence continually until and at the several times when the defendants so sold the said residue of the said cargo of wheat as in the said first count mentioned, the defendants believed it to be and it was for the benefit and advantage of the plaintiffs that the said residue of the said cargo of wheat should be sold, and that the sales of the said residue were beneficial and advantageous sales for the plaintiffs, and were made by them, the defendants, in the exercise of a sound discretion as such factors for sale as aforesaid for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and as and at such times and for such prices as they, the defendants, in the exercise of a sound discretion as such factors as aforesaid thought it best for the plaintiffs that the said residue of the said cargo of wheat should be sold; wherefore the defendants, at the several times when, &c. in the said first count mentioned, as well for the benefit of the plaintiffs as for the purpose of reimbursing and repaying to them, the defendants, the said sum of money so advanced by the defendants as in this plea aforesaid, and in the exercise of such sound discretion as aforesaid, sold the said residue of the said cargo of wheat in the said first count mentioned, at the said price in the said first count mentioned, the same being the best price which could be then obtained for the said residue of the said cargo of wheat, and with the monies produced by the said last-mentioned sales, being a less amount than the amount of the said advances, did then repay and reimburse to them, the defendants, so much of the said sum so advanced by the defendants to the plaintiffs as aforesaid, as the said monies so advanced as aforesaid were sufficient to repay and reimburse, as they lawfully might, &c. Verification.

Second additional plea to the first count, that before and at the time of the giving the after-mentioned notice by the defendants to the plaintiffs, &c. the plaintiffs were indebted to the defendants in a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 3,000*l.*, for advances before then made by the defendants as such factors as aforesaid to the plaintiffs in respect of and against consignments of goods before then made by the plaintiffs to the defendants as such factors as aforesaid, for the purpose of such goods being sold and disposed of by the defendants as such factors as aforesaid for the plaintiffs, and by reason of the plaintiffs' being so indebted to the defendants, the defendants as such factors before and at the time of the giving the notice hereinafter mentioned, &c. had a lien upon the said residue of the said cargo of wheat, and upon the proceeds of the residue of the said cargo of wheat after the same was sold, for the said sum of money so due and owing from the plaintiffs to the defendants, and had a right to have the said last-mentioned sum of money paid and satisfied to them, the defendants, out of the said proceeds of the said cargo of wheat; and thereupon they, the defendants, after the plaintiffs had become and whilst they were so indebted to the defendants, and before the said alleged breaches of promise in the said first count mentioned, to wit, on the 1st of November 1842, gave notice, &c. The plea then stated the terms of the notice as in the first additional plea; that a reasonable time for paying the money had elapsed; that the plaintiffs had not paid; that the defendants believed it to be, and it was, for the benefit of the plaintiffs to sell the residue of the cargo; that the sales in the first count mentioned were advantageous to the plaintiffs; and that the defendants in the exercise of a sound discretion as factors for sale for the benefit of the plaintiffs as well as for reimbursing themselves, sold for the price in the first count mentioned, the same being the best that could be obtained, and paid themselves as much of the sum due from the plaintiffs as the produce would satisfy. Verification.

There were two similar additional pleas to the second count of the declaration. To all these pleas the plaintiffs demurred specially.

Channell, Serj. (Taprell was with him) Nov. 10, 1847, in support of the demurrer.—An averment has been introduced into these pleas to the effect that the defendants as factors made the sale in question in the exercise of a sound discretion, for the benefit of the plaintiffs and to reimburse themselves. This has been done in pursuance of a suggestion thrown out during the argument on the former demurrer (3). But it is contended, that the authorities do not support the pleas as now pleaded. The passages formerly cited from Story on Bailments, s. 308, p. 207, and Story on Agency, s. 375, p. 333, do not shew that a factor has any such rights as those contended for in these pleas. In Pothonier v. Dawson (4), which may be relied upon on the other side, Gibbs, C.J. puts the decision upon the ground of a contract between the parties, which is not averred here. In Story on Agency, s. 37, p. 330, it is said, that "if goods are consigned to a factor for sale, and he makes advances upon them, he is of course invested with a right to sell them, and may out of the proceeds satisfy his lien, or use it by way of set-off," and it is afterwards said that in certain cases the factor may sell to repay himself advances, even invito domino. But in this case we must assume from the declaration that the defendants undertook to obey the lawful orders of the plaintiffs, and that the particular orders mentioned were lawful. The defendants might have traversed the promise, or that they had received the goods on the terms specified, or have denied that the orders were lawful. If, in truth, the defendants had power to sell under the circumstances mentioned in the pleas, there must have been a new contract substituted for that stated in the declaration.

(3) 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 43.

(4) Holt, N.P. 383.

[MAULE, J.—If the effect of the pleas is, that the defendants did not enter into the contract on the terms stated, that amounts to the general issue. The fault of the plea seems to be, that it goes too far. This is not an action for a tort, but upon a contract; and the plea shews that before the breach of the contract declared on, that contract had been put an end to.]

Supposing the facts stated in the plea to be true, they ought to have been differently pleaded, either as a substituted contract, or as a release.

Crompton, in support of the pleas.—These new pleas are good both in substance and in form. The declaration is founded on an executed consideration, and where that is the case, the promise which should be averred in the declaration is the promise implied by law—Hopkins v. Logan (5). Maule, B. there says that “an executed consideration is no consideration for any other promise than that which the law would imply; if it were, there would be two co-existing promises on one consideration.” Brown v. Crump (6), Roscorla v. Thomas (7) and Jackson v. Cobbin (8) are authorities to the same effect. The words “lawful orders” in the declaration mean only orders which are not illegal, in relation to the state of affairs. The consignment was general, and the declaration is founded on a promise to do that which it is the duty of a factor to do. A factor has by law a right to sell to reimburse himself, with the proviso that the sale is made in the exercise of a sound discretion and for the benefit of his principal. The defendants, therefore, had a power coupled with an interest, in which case the power is irrevocable. This is a part of the law of the land, and not a particular custom. The distinction between the general law merchant and particular custom is pointed out in the notes to Wigglesworth v. Dallison (9). In M'Lean v. Dunn (10) Best, C.J. points out the mischief which would arise if under such circumstances the factor had not a power to sell. He says, “It is admitted perishable articles may be sold. It is difficult to say what may be esteemed perishable articles and what not; but if articles are not perishable, price is, and may alter in a few days or a few hours.” There is no case in the books hostile to this proposition. At the last argument, Raleigh v. Atkinson (11) was cited as hostile, but it has not been relied upon on the present occasion. In that case the factor received the goods originally, with a limit as to the price at which he was to sell. The case of Graham v. Dyster (12), which is mentioned in Mr. Justice Story's book, as supporting his view, is not distinctly in point.

[MAULE, J.—In that case the factor had a right conveyed to him to sell and to go on quà factor to exercise his power and interest, without the principal being able to interfere.]

The American authorities on this subject are of great importance. The principal cases cited by Mr. Justice Story are Parker v. Brancher (13) and Brown v. M'Gran (14). In the latter case, where, after an elaborate argument, a solemn judgment was pronounced by a court of appeal, the Court uses these words (15):—“But the main objection to the instruction (of the Judge below) is of a more broad and comprehensive nature. The instruction in effect decides, that in the case of a general consignment of goods to a factor for sale, in the exercise of his own discretion as to the time and manner of the sale, the consignor has a right, by subsequent orders, to suspend or postpone the sale at his pleasure, notwithstanding the factor has, in consideration of such general consignment, already made advances or incurred liabilities for the consignor at his request, trusting to the fund for his due reimbursement. We are of opinion that this doctrine is not maintainable in point of law.” According to the Code of Commerce of Holland, arts. 80, 81, 83, a factor has a right to apply to a court for leave to reimburse himself under similar circumstances, which tends to shew that this is not merely a matter of custom but of general mercantile law. In several commercial cases parties are obliged to apply to the Courts abroad for leave to do that which they may do of themselves in England, as in the case of stoppage in transitu.

Channell, in reply.—To support these pleas it would be necessary to shew that the right of the factor to sell exists as a necessary legal inference from the circumstances; and if the circumstances are only such as might warrant a jury in coming to the conclusion that the right existed, then the pleas are bad. In the American case of Brown v. M'Gran two of the Judges dissented, and the judgment of the majority was treated as that of the Court. It is to be remarked, too, that in that case the consignment and advances were contemporaneous. The expressions used in the judgment in Graham v. Dyster tend to shew that there must be an express contract in order to give the factor the power contended for:

WILDE, C.J. now (12th May) delivered the judgment of the Court (16).—The substantial question in this case is, whether a factor, who has made advances on account of his principal, has the right to sell the goods in his hands contrary to the orders of his principal, on the principal making default in repaying those advances. It is now settled law that a factor has a lien for his advances, but the defendant claims more than a lien. He claims a right, if the principal when called on to repay the advances makes default in doing so, to sell the goods at such prices and times as, in the exercise of a sound discretion, he thinks best for his principal. No case, in any English court, can be produced in support of this doctrine. Yet it is a right which one would expect to find enforced every day if it existed. The silence of our law books is a strong argument against the existence of such a right. It is true that in the case of Graham v. Dyster, Bayley, J., in considering whether a factor, under the circumstances of that case, had authority to pledge, is reported to have said, "The fact that the plaintiff had drawn bills against the consignment, and had also drawn in like manner against other consignments, made no difference with respect to the raising an implied authority to pledge. The only difference which the practice makes is, that it conveys to the factor the right to reimburse himself. He may sell on credit, and discount the bills." But these remarks were made with reference to a factor who had express authority, which had never been revoked, to sell at his discretion; and they furnish no authority for maintaining that, in a case where the principal has prohibited the sale, under prescribed limits, he may notwithstanding sell. But it is said, a factor for sale has an authority as such, in the absence of all special orders, to sell, and when he afterwards comes under advances, he thereby acquires an interest, and having thus an authority and an interest, the authority becomes irrevocable. The doctrine here implied, that whenever there is in the same person an authority and an interest, the authority is irrevocable, is not to be admitted without qualification. In the case of Raleigh v. Atkinson the goods had been consigned to a factor for sale, with a limit as to the price. The factor had a lien on the goods for advances, and the principal, in consideration of those advances, agreed with the factor that he should sell the goods at the best market price, and realize thereon against his advances. The Court held that this authority was revocable, on the ground that there was no consideration for the agreement. Now, in that case there was an authority given, and one which the principal was fully at liberty to give, and the party to whom it was given had an interest in it, yet the authority was held to be revocable. The effect of that decision was attempted in argument before us to be eluded, by referring to the circumstance that the factor received the goods originally with a limit as to the price of sale, but we do not think that circumstance material, since the limit originally imposed was done away with, by authority afterwards given to sell at the best price. Such an authority requires no consideration to support it. An authority is in its nature revocable by the donors of it—see Vynior's case (17). It is only when it is sought to make it

(16) Wilde, C.J. Coltman, J., Maule, J. and Williams, J.

irrevocable that a consideration is required to give it that effect. On the subject of authority being rendered irrevocable, accompanied by interest, there is not much to be found in the law books. In Walsh v. Whitcomb (18) Lord Kenyon is reported to have said, "There is a difference as to powers of attorney; they are revocable from their nature; but there are these exceptions: where a power of attorney is part of a security for money, then it is not revocable. Where a power of attorney was made to levy a fine as part of the security, it was held not to be revocable. The principle is applicable to every case where a power of attorney is necessary to effect any security." Gaussen v. Morton (19) and Watson v. King (20) were decided in conformity to the case of Walsh v. Whitcomb, and the result appears to be, that when no agreement is entered into on a sufficient consideration, whereby an authority is given for the purpose of securing some benefit to the donee of the authority, such an authority is irrevocable. This is what is usually meant by an authority coupled with an interest, which is commonly said to be irrevocable. But we think this doctrine applies only to cases where the authority is given for the purpose of being a security, or, as Lord Kenyon expresses it, as a part of the security, not to cases where the authority is given independently, and the interest of the donee of the authority arises afterwards, and is incidental only: as, for instance, in the present case, as disclosed by the pleas, the goods were consigned to a factor for sale—that confers an implied authority to sell; afterwards the factor makes an advance. This is not an authority coupled with an interest, but an independent authority, and an interest subsequently arises. The making such an advance may be a good consideration for an agreement that the authority to sell shall be no longer revocable, but such an effect will not, we think, arise independent of the agreement. There is no authority or principle in our law, that we are aware of, which leads us to think it will. If such be the law, where is it to be found? It was said in the argument, that it was the common practice of factors to sell in order to repay advances. If it be true that there is a well understood practice with factors to sell, that practice would furnish a ground for inferring that the advances were made upon the footing of such an agreement, that the factor should have an irrevocable authority to sell in case the principal made default. Such an inference would be a very reasonable and proper one; but it would be an inference of fact and not a conclusion of law. These pleas, therefore, in which the right to sell for advances, on default made by the principal to repay them, is treated as a conclusion of law, cannot be supported. There will, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiffs on the pleas demurred to.

WILDE, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the Court (1).—This was an action of ejectment, brought to recover the possession of premises in the county of Cornwall, which had been occupied, for several years, under a lease for lives subject to a certain rent ; but which lease had determined, a considerable time before the day of the demise in the declaration, by the deaths of the persons upon whose lives the term depended. It was proved, upon the trial of the cause, that those under whom the lessor of the plaintiff claimed, and the lessor of the plaintiff, had continued to receive the rent reserved by the lease up to a short time before the bringing of the present ejectment. Upon the part of the lessor of the plaintiff, it was alleged, that the deaths of the persons upon whose lives the term in the lease depended had been improperly concealed ; that the rent had continued to be paid and received as under the lease, and as far as concerned the lessor of the plaintiff, and the former owner of the premises, in the belief that the term continued, and that the present ejectment had been brought immediately upon the discovery of the fact that the term had in truth expired. Upon the part of the defendant it was contended, first, that after the expiration of the lease referred to, a new lease for lives had been granted which had not expired, such new lease being at the same reserved rent as the old lease, and that the rent had been paid and received under such new lease up to the time of bringing the ejectment ; or, it was contended secondly, that if the granting of such new lease could not be proved, the law would imply from the receipts of rent since the expiration of the old lease a new tenancy from year to year ; and that as such presumed tenancy had not been determined by a notice to quit, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this ejectment. Upon the trial the determination of the old lease was proved ; but it did not appear that the lessor of the plaintiff, or those under whom he claimed, had ever been apprised of that fact until recently before the commencement of this ejectment ; and it was therefore insisted, as before stated, on the part of the plaintiff, that the receipt of rent since the determination of the lease had been in ignorance of the fact of that determination ; and that, therefore, such receipt could not, under the circumstances, be made the foundation of an implied new tenancy from year to year. The verdict was found for the lessor of the plaintiff ; and a rule nisi was afterwards obtained, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why a nonsuit should not be entered, or why there should not be a new trial. The new trial was asked upon the ground that the evidence offered on the part of the defendant, for the purpose of proving the grant of the new lease of the premises since the determination of the old lease, had been improperly rejected. We have considered what has been urged at the bar in support of this part of the rule, and have referred to the Judge's notes of the trial, and it appears to us that there is no ground for granting a new trial upon this objection. The evidence, which was alleged to have been improperly rejected, was a statement of a witness called, upon the part of the defendant, to prove a conversation which took place, fourteen or fifteen years ago, between the witness and the former owner of the property, through whom the lessor of the plaintiff made title, that such former owner had said that the land had been re-leased, but without mentioning either term, or lives, or rent, or any of the stipulations of the supposed lease. It appeared, upon the discussion of the rule, that, upon such evidence being given, the learned Judge intimated that it was much too loose to be available as evidence of the grant of a new lease, and that the counsel on the part of the defendant acquiesced in the opinion so expressed, and that no further reference during the trial was made to such evidence. No argument took place upon the subject at the trial: the Judge was not asked to make a note of the evidence, or of the rejection of it, or to leave it to the jury; and in truth there was a complete acquiescence, not merely in the opinion expressed by the learned Judge, but also in the insufficiency of the evidence; and, under such circumstances, no objection can now be maintained upon the subject. I may add, that the Court is quite satisfied that the Judge was correct in his view of the effect of the evidence; and that such evidence never could have been made available as proof of a new lease having been granted.

The remaining question to be considered is that which was reserved by the learned Judge, namely, whether the jury ought to have been directed, that the law implied a tenancy from year to year from the receipt of rent, since the determination of the old lease under the circumstances proved; or whether it was properly left to the jury to say if the rent had been received as under the old lease, in ignorance of the determination of such lease, or under some new agreement come to between the parties, such question being left, accompanied by a direction, that if the premises had been occupied since the determination of the old lease, under any new engagement, the defendant was entitled to a verdict. We are of opinion that the learned Judge acted correctly in leaving to the jury the question of fact, whether the premises had been occupied by the defendant, and rent had been received from him as under the old lease in ignorance of its determination, or under some new agreement; and we think it would not have been proper to have directed the jury that the law implied, from the receipt of rent under the circumstances proved, some agreement creating a yearly tenancy which could not be determined without notice to quit. It is clear that, upon proof of the payment of rent in respect of the occupation of premises ordinarily let from year to year, the law will imply that the party making such payments holds under a tenancy from year to year, and it was so ruled in Bishop v. Howard; but it is equally clear, that it is competent to either the receiver or the payer of such rent to prove the circumstances under which the payments as for rent were so made, and by such circumstances to repel the legal implication which would result from the receipt of rent unexplained. The principle that the payment of rent may be explained for the purpose of protecting parties from the legal consequences which would otherwise follow from such payments, is recognized by Mr. Justice Buller, in Williams v. Bartholomew (1), and was allowed in Rogers v. Pitcher (2); and it is consistent with the general principle of the law. In this case, if the receipt of the rent by the lessor of the plaintiff had been unexplained, a tenancy from year to year ought to have been presumed according to the decision in Bishop v. Howard; but the lessor of the plaintiff did not leave the receipt of rent unexplained, but gave evidence for the purpose of shewing that such receipt of rent had taken place under a mistake of fact in respect of the determination of the old lease, which determination had been improperly concealed from him. Upon that explanation the question in the cause was no longer, what was the legal presumption from the unexplained payment of rent? but, whether the evidence offered to explain the receipt of rent on the part of the plaintiff did establish that, in point of fact, the rent had been received in relation to the old lease, and not upon a new agreement? That was a question of fact, which, we think, was properly left to the jury; and the jury were properly directed that if such rent had been received in relation to any new agreement, the verdict should be for the defendant: such direction being in conformity with the principle, that from the payment of rent unexplained the law would imply a tenancy from year to year with the incidents attached to it, namely, the necessity of a regular notice to quit before the defendant's possession could be disturbed. We therefore, think, there was no misdirection, and that the rule must be discharged.

In an action for money had and received to the plaintiff's use, non assumpsit puts in issue both the receipt of the money and the existence of the facts which make it a receipt to the use of the plaintiff.

In such action the defendant pleaded, that the money claimed was paid to him and others, as members of a committee of management in a railway scheme, by way of deposits on shares allotted by them to the plaintiff, at his request, and that the plaintiff and the other shareholders agreed to form a partnership for carrying on the undertaking. That the plaintiff sought to recover his deposits, on the ground that the scheme had not been prosecuted for a time which he alleged to be unreasonable. That after the passing of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28. a meeting was duly held, at which it was resolved that the partnership should be dissolved, and the undertaking abandoned. That the affairs then became liable to be wound up as on the dissolution of a partnership, by mutual consent. That the plaintiff's claim was part of the affairs to be wound up, and that they had not been wound up, nor had a reasonable time for winding them up elapsed, at the commencement of the suit:—On special demurrer, this plea was held bad, as amounting to the general issue.

Assumpsit, for money had and received.

Plea, as to 52l. 10s., parcel, &c., to the following effect: that before the passing of the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, intituled, 'An Act to facilitate the dissolution of railway companies,' a prospectus had been issued for the promotion of a certain intended partnership, for carrying into effect an undertaking for constructing a railway, to be called the Direct Western Railway, which could not be constructed without the authority of parliament, and that no act had been obtained for that purpose; that by the said prospectus, the defendant and several other named persons were declared to be a provisional committee; and it was also declared that the capital should consist of 300,000l., divided into 120,000 shares of 25l. each, and that the allottees of such shares should pay 2l. 12s. 6d. on each share allotted to them. That the defendant and the other members of the provisional committee were also the managers of the undertaking; that the plaintiff became a subscriber for twenty shares, which were allotted to him; and that the defendant and the other members of the committee received 2l. 12s. 6d. from the plaintiff in respect of each of such shares, amounting in all to 52l. 10s. That the plaintiff, the defendant, and the other shareholders then entered into an agreement for the formation of a partnership for carrying on the undertaking; and that the plaintiff sought to recover the 52l. 10s., because the scheme was not prosecuted for a time which the plaintiff alleged to be unreasonable. The plea then went on to state, that after the passing of the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, the committee made the proper returns under the act, and called a meeting, and an adjourned meeting, according to the provisions of the act, at which latter meeting the company and partnership were, according to the act, dissolved, and the prosecution of the undertaking abandoned and discontinued; and thereupon and by force of the statute the affairs of the company became liable to be wound up, according to the rules applicable to partnerships dissolved by mutual consent of all the partners; and that the said sum of 52l. 10s. became subject to the resolution for dissolving the company, and that the plaintiff's claim in this action was part of the affairs of the company to be wound up as aforesaid; and that, at the commencement of the suit, the affairs of the company had not been wound up, nor had a reasonable time elapsed for winding up the same. Verification.

Pigott, in support of the demurrer.—(Nov. 17, 1847).—The act of parliament relied on in the plea (the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28,) does not afford a sufficient answer to a claim by a shareholder, to recover back a deposit paid on a scheme which has failed. It will be argued that the 25th section affects his rights, because it provides that the dis- solution is not to alter the rights of creditors who are not shareholders, the affairs on dissolution being directed by the 24th section to be wound up, according to the rules of partnership concerns, and as if the dissolution had been by mutual consent. The legislature must have meant by this only to prevent shareholders from suing for specific performance. But the plea is bad even if the act applies, because it consists of an avoidance without a confession. At what time can it be said that the right of action existed consistently with the plea?

Wilkes, contra.—The plea is good, both in substance and in form. The act was passed at a time when contests were going on between committeemen and shareholders. Walstab v. Spottiswoode (1) had decided that committees were liable to pay back deposits to shareholders on the scheme proving abortive; and this act was passed in consequence. Its meaning must be, that shareholders who would otherwise have been entitled on the authority of Walstab v. Spottiswoode to recover their deposits, are thereafter to be entitled to get their share on the winding up of the concern, but not to bring an action for it. If the plea is good in substance it is good in form also. Even supposing the shareholder had a right to his action before the passing of the act, it was taken away by the act. There is sufficient colour in the plea. It amounts to a confession that there may have been a cause of action before the act, and that would be sufficient to give colour to the plaintiff—Ward v. Robins (2), Morant v. Sign (3).

[WILLIAMS, J.—Does the statement that the money was received for a deposit amount to a statement of a colourable receiving to the plaintiff's use?]

The defendant could not have shewn that the 9 & 10 Vict. had passed, under the plea of non assumpsit. Supposing that part of the plea which relates to the statute to be struck out, there would be a confession without an avoidance. The plea is sufficient if it states nothing inconsistent with the allegation that this was money had and received to the plaintiff's use. It would be otherwise if it contained anything inconsistent with the declaration.

Pigott, in reply.—There is no confession at all in the plea. The plea raises a defence exactly similar in principle to that in Solly v. Neish (4). There where, to a declaration for money had and received, the defendant pleaded that the money was the proceeds of goods pledged, with a power of sale to the defendants, by persons whom the plaintiff allowed to hold the goods as their own, and which were the joint property of those persons and the plaintiff, and that the defendant was willing to set off against the proceeds of the goods the advance made on them, this plea, the Court said, would have been bad on special demurrer, as amounting to the general issue.

[MAULE, J.—The Court there held that the plea shewed a substantial defence, but did not admit the right of the plaintiff as to money had and received.]

The result of the plea in this case is to shew affirmatively under the act of parliament that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The plea contains facts which are a sufficient answer without express colour, and is, therefore, bad, as amounting to the general issue.

WILDE, C.J. (May 12th, 1848) delivered the judgment of the Court.—[After stating the pleadings, his Lordship proceeded]—The Court is of opinion that the plea is bad, because it amounts to the general issue. It is, therefore, unnecessary to advert to the other causes of demurrer. The general issue of non assumpsit, in an action for money had and received, operates as a denial both of the receipt of the money and the existence of those facts which make such receipt by the defendant a receipt for the use of the plaintiff. Upon reference to the plea, it will be seen that the facts therein stated are set forth to shew that the money sought to be recovered never was received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiff, and it is therefore an argumentative traverse of the implied promise stated in the declaration; but this is in effect the general issue, and all the facts stated might be given in evidence under non assumpsit. The case is similar in principle to that of Solly v. Neish, where, in an action for money had and received, the plea set forth the circumstances under which the money sought to be recovered had been received by the defendant, and from those circumstances claimed a right of set-off, and the plea was held bad as amounting to the general issue. The case also of Clarke v. Dignam (5) is in point. In that case the general issue had been pleaded to an action for money had and received, and it appeared that the money sought to be recovered had been received by the defendant as attorney in an action brought in the plaintiff's name against one Duncombe, and the defendant proved that the plaintiff had allowed his name to be used in such action at the request of Edwards, who really employed the defendant, and was indebted to the defendant in an amount exceeding the sum claimed by the plaintiff, and which the defendant therefore claimed as a set-off. It was objected on the part of the plaintiff, that as the defendant had upon the record acted as the attorney for the plaintiff, he ought to discharge himself by proving the payment of the amount to Edwards. Mr. Baron Parke said, "No. It all arises on the general issue. The defendant disputes all the facts from which the legal inference arises, that the money was had and received to the use of the plaintiff;" which was assented to by the Court. In the present case, the whole object and effect of the plea is to shew that the promise stated in the declaration will not be implied in law from the facts and circumstances set forth. It is, therefore, nothing more than the general issue, and there must be judgment for the plaintiff.

Ejectment for a farm and premises called Llanolly, in the county of Radnor. The cause came on to be tried at Presteign, at the Summer Assizes, 1845, when a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, subject to a case, the material parts of which were as follows:—The deeds shewing the title of Thomas Phillips as tenant in tail were set out. John Phillips (the lessor of the plaintiff) claimed the premises as heir-at-law and devisee of his brother, T. Phillips, who became, upon the death of his mother, tenant in tail in possession of the said farm and premises. On the 4th of January 1844, T. Phillips, by an agreement in writing not under seal, demised to the defendant the premises sought to be recovered in this action for three years from the 2nd of February 1844, at the yearly rent of 90*l.*, payable half-yearly. T. Phillips died without issue on the 3rd of August 1844. No notice to quit had been served on the defendant before the commencement of the present action, (the day of the demise was the 21st of May 1845,) and it was contended that there had been no disclaimer by him of the title of the lessor of the plaintiff.

In the month of September 1844, the lessor of the plaintiff, with his attorney, Mr. Pugh, went to the farm occupied by the defendant, went over it with him, and told him that the lessor of the plaintiff claimed the greatest part of the farm then in the defendant's occupation, as tenant in tail under a deed of settlement, and that the defendant would be required to pay to the lessor of the plaintiff such proportion of the rent as he was entitled to. The defendant said he would come over to Mr. J. Phillips (the lessor of the plaintiff), after the next half-year's rent was due, and pay it to him. The defendant did not go over, and thereupon Mr. Pugh wrote to him on the 7th of March 1845 as follows:—"I beg to inform you that Mr. J. Phillips is entitled as heir-at-law to eighty-eight acres of the land you hold, called Llanolly Farm, and which you rented of the late Mr. T. Phillips, and I request you to come over to my office at Haye to attorn to Mr. Phillips, and to agree to the rent to be paid to him in future." The defendant called on Mr. Pugh a few days after, and said it was not usual to pay rent which became due on the 2nd of February before Haye fair day (the 17th of May). Mr. Pugh saw the defendant again on the 19th of May, and he then said, "Mr. Phillips's brother claims the property, and I sha'n't pay Mr. Phillips any rent, but I'll place it in the bank, and afterwards pay it over to the person entitled to it." Shortly after this conversation the present action was brought. The particular parcels of land claimed by the lessor of the plaintiff were not specifically pointed out, nor was any stated amount of rent demanded of the defendant. Mr. Pugh also said that he might have told the defendant the lessor of the plaintiff claimed as heir-at-law.

Channell, Serj., for the plaintiff.—Allowing that Thomas Phillips was tenant in tail of the premises sought to be recovered in this action, still the agreement in writing of the 4th of January 1844, made between Thomas Phillips and the defendant, even if it amounted to a lease, is, by stat. 32 Hen. 8. c. 28, void (or voidable) against those in reversion or remainder, for that statute requires a lease by writing, indented, under seal. Secondly, if the agreement amount to a lease, and is voidable only, this ejectment by the succeeding tenant in tail has avoided it. Thirdly, if the agreement does not amount to a lease, and a tenancy from year to year was created thereby, there has been a disclaimer by the defendant, and then this action can be maintained without any previous notice to quit or demand of possession. First, the agreement (if it be a lease) of the 4th of January 1844, is void against the lessor of the plaintiff, who, at the time of its execution, was a remainder-man or reversioner within the stat. 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. "If a tenant in tail make a lease for years, and die without issue, it is void as to them in reversion or remainder, though it be made according to the said statute" (1), and the same is laid down in Cruise's Dig. p. 70, 4th edit. This lease was void from its commencement. In order to operate against the issue in tail, and those in reversion and remainder it should have been sealed. If the agreement be voidable only and created a tenancy from year to year, it is submitted there has been a disclaimer by the defendant, and it is not necessary to give any notice to quit. Doe d. Calvert v. Frowd (2) is an authority in favour of the plaintiff, and decides that if a tenant refuse to pay rent to the owner of the property, that is a sufficient disclaimer; it is not necessary that the tenant should claim the land himself.

Talfourd, Serj. for the defendant.—It is admitted that the agreement of the 4th of January 1844 amounted to a lease if the party demising had the power to make a lease, and that it is not made in conformity with the provisions of the 32 Hen. 8. c. 28. Still it is not a void lease, but voidable only, and is not avoided by bringing this action.

[WILDE, C.J.—The entry is admitted by the consent rule, and the day of the demise is subsequent to the consent rule. Is not that entry a sufficient avoidance of the lease?]

The acts of the lessor of the plaintiff shew an intention to confirm the lease, not to avoid it; he does not demand possession of the land, but requires the tenant to attorn to him, and that was substantially acceded to by the tenant. Next, there has not been any disclaimer, and a notice to quit was necessary. Assuming the agreement of the 4th of January 1844 to be a lease, a disclaimer by words is not sufficient—Doe d. Graves v. Wells (3), Denn d. Brune v. Rawlins (4). The defendant occupied as tenant and was recognized as such down to the time of this ejectment, and to make him a trespasser a notice to quit was necessary. He was at least a tenant from year to year; and as the required amount of rent was never fixed, and the lands claimed were never pointed out, the defendant could not pay till the exact proportions were ascertained—Doe d. Williams v. Cooper (5), Doe

WILDE, C.J. now (Feb. 15, 1847,) delivered the judgment of the Court (8).—In this case the ejectment is brought to recover possession of certain farms and lands situate in the county of Radnor, in the principality of Wales, in the occupation of the defendant. The ejectment came on to be tried in August 1845, at the Summer Assizes, then held at Presteign, in and for the county of Radnor, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, by consent of the parties, subject to an order of Nisi Prius, by which it was referred to a barrister, to state a case for the opinion of this Court, and to state, among other things, what estate and interest was conveyed by certain deeds of settlement, therein particularly mentioned; and the cause comes before the Court upon the special case, stated by the referee under the authority of the order of Nisi Prius. The case states a number of deeds connected with the title under which the lessor of the plaintiff claims, and many facts connected with questions which existed between the parties at the time of the reference, to which it will not be necessary to advert for the purpose of the judgment of the Court, inasmuch as, upon the argument, the general title of the lessor of the plaintiff was admitted; and the questions submitted to the judgment of the Court were quite independent of the matters referred to, and were brought within a very narrow compass. It was admitted upon the argument, that the lessor of the plaintiff was tenant in tail under the limitations of certain deeds of settlement, and that he was entitled to recover in this action, unless the defendant could establish a valid defence upon the objections specifically submitted to the Court. [After stating the facts relevant to the questions before the Court, his Lordship proceeded.] Upon these facts, it was admitted on behalf of the defendant, that the lease granted by Thomas Phillips, the last tenant in tail, was not in conformity to the statute, or valid as against the lessor of the plaintiff. But it was said that the lease was voidable only, and that an actual entry was necessary to avoid such lease, before the day of the demise in the declaration. It was further contended, that, by the communication set forth in the case, a tenancy had been created between the lessor of the plaintiff and the defendant, which it was necessary to determine by a notice to quit, before the lessor of the plaintiff could recover the possession. For the plaintiff, it was insisted, first, that the lease, under which the defendant claimed, was void, and required no entry to vest the right of possession in the lessor of the plaintiff. Secondly, that the confession of entry in the consent rule was conclusive evidence of a sufficient entry, if any were necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover. Thirdly, it was insisted for the plaintiff that no tenancy had been created between his lessor and the defendant. Fourthly, for the plaintiff, it was contended, that if a tenancy was created, the conduct of the defendant amounted to a disclaimer to hold as tenant to the lessor of the plaintiff, and therefore determined the tenancy. The title of the lessor of the plaintiff being admitted, as before stated, it is only necessary to consider the objections opposed to his recovery of possession. The first objection is, that the lease by the tenant in tail is not void, but voidable only. The authority cited for the proposition was Co. Litt. 45, b. Whether the whole passage really establishes the proposition for which it is cited may be open to some doubt, as applied to the present case; but it is not material to be considered, as it was admitted that, at all events, the lease would be avoided by entry; and if, therefore, a sufficient entry has been made, the question whether the lease is void or voidable becomes immaterial.

It has become common learning, that an actual entry is only now necessary in one case, and that is to avoid a fine with proclamations; and the only ground upon which it is held to be necessary in that case is, the supposed stringency of the express words of the Statute of Fines, 4 Hen. 7. c. 24. By that statute, it is enacted, "that, after the engrossing of every fine to be levied, &c. of any lands, &c., the same fine be openly and solemnly read and proclaimed in the same court, the same term, and in three terms then next following, the same engrossing in the same court on four several days in every term, &c. and the said proclamation so had and made, the said fine to be a final end, and conclude as well privies as strangers to the same, except women coverts (other than been parties to the said fine), and every person then being within the age of twenty-one years, in prison, or out of the realm, or not of whole mind, at the time of the said fine levied, not parties to such fine, and saving to every person or persons, and to their heirs, other than the parties in the said fine, such right, title, claim, and interest as they have to or in the said lands, &c., the time of such fine engrossed; so that they pursue their title, claim, or interest by way of action or lawful entry, within five years next after the said proclamation had and made; and also saving to all other persons such action, right, title, claim, and interest in or to the said lands, &c. as first shall grow, remain, or descend, or come to them after the said fine engrossed and proclamation made by force of any gift in the tail, or by any other cause or matter had and made before the said fine levied, so that they take their action or pursue their said right and title, according to the law, within five years next after such action, right, title, claim, or interest to them accrued, descended, remained, fallen, or come."

In all other cases where entry is necessary to vest the possession, or right of possession, proof of actual entry is not necessary; but the confession in the consent rule is deemed to be sufficient evidence that the required entry was made. The authorities to this effect abound. In Oates d. Wigfall v. Brydon (9) a question arose as to the effect of the consent rule as proof of an ouster by one tenant in common of another. Lord Mansfield, after stating that the meaning of confessing lease, entry and ouster was to bring the matter to the mere question of the plaintiff's possessory title, said, that actual entry was held necessary to avoid a fine, from the words of the statute, as the word "action" could not mean "ejectment." In all other cases the confession of lease, entry and ouster is sufficient; and so it is now settled that it is sufficient for an ejectment brought for a condition broken. In Jenkins d. Harris v. Prichard (10), a fine had been levied, and the Court adjudged an actual entry not to be necessary to be made in order to avoid a fine at common law as that was, being without proclamations. In Goodright d. Hare v. Cator (11), a question arose whether an entry was necessary to sustain the ejectment, which was brought to recover possession upon condition broken by non-payment of rent. Lord Mansfield said: "We have looked very particularly into the cases for 200 years back, and we find great contrariety of opinion, whether an actual entry is necessary to maintain an ejectment on a clause of re-entry for non-payment of rent; but in the most distant period the better opinion has been that it is not. This was Lord Hale's opinion, and is mentioned as such, and as that of L. C. J. Scroggs, by Lord Holt in Little v. Heaton (12). But we look upon it as having been fully settled, in 1703, by the opinion of all the Judges, upon deliberation and consideration of all the cases, that an actual entry is only necessary to avoid a fine. And so the practice has been ever since. The reason of the thing is agreeable to the practice; for it is absurd to entangle men's rights in nets of form without meaning; and an ejectment being a mere creature of the court, passed for the purpose of bringing the right to an examination, an actual entry can be of no service. In the case of fines, it is required by a positive rule of law, and clearly necessary under the statute 4 Anne, c. 16." In Doe d. Duckett v. Watts (13) a fine had been levied, but before the proclamations had been made an ejectment was brought, and it was insisted that the plaintiff could not recover for want of entry before the ejectment. The Court refused a rule nisi upon the ground of misdirection, in ruling that the consent rule rendered proof of actual entry unnecessary. Lord Ellenborough there said, "The statute 4 Hen. 7. makes a fine with proclamation a bar, saving the rights of persons who pursue them by action or lawful entry within a certain time. In Oates v. Brydon (14), Lord Mansfield said, that the confession of lease, entry and ouster was sufficient in all cases, except in the case of a fine with proclamations, in which case it was necessary to prove an actual entry."

In the note to Doe d. Duckett v. Watts, it is said, "Lord Coke seems to consider the statute of Edw. 1. as repealed by the Hen. 7, so far as to render an entry of the party's claim at the foot of the fine unavailable at this day. Certainly it must be unavailable against a fine levied with proclamations according to the latter statute; and since the statute 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. the party having a right of entry has twenty years within which to make his entry after his right accrues; but by the statute 4 Anne, c. 16. s. 16, no claim or entry on lands shall be of any force or effect to avoid any fine levied with proclamations, or shall be a sufficient entry or claim within the statute of Jac. 1, unless an action shall be thereupon commenced within one year after, &c. and prosecuted with effect. Upon the whole, it seems now, that for every purpose, except that of avoiding a fine with proclamations, in which case the statute of Hen. 7. requires an entry, the bringing of an ejectment will serve the same purpose: and indeed, if the good sense of the thing is to be regarded, it seems better adapted to answer any useful purpose for which an actual entry on the land was originally required, or can at this day be made." See also Duppa v. Mayo (14).

Even if any question could now be made, whether an entry is necessary to avoid a fine at common law, it seems perfectly clear that in all other cases where entry is necessary, the confession in the consent rule is sufficient evidence of the fact of such entry. We therefore think, there is no objection to the plaintiff's recovery, upon the ground that he has not proved a sufficient entry; if, indeed, entry was necessary. Upon the objection urged, that an undetermined tenancy existed on the day of the demise, we are of opinion that no tenancy was ever created between the parties. The utmost extent of the evidence is, to shew a negotiation between the parties, with a view to a demise, if the parties could agree, and that such negotiation was determined by the defendants' acts and refusal to pay rent to the lessor of the plaintiff. The negotiation had not advanced to the adjustment of the amount of rent, or any of the other material terms of tenancy. It is plain that the defendant did not consider that he had become tenant to the lessor of the plaintiff; as, if he had so become, he could have had no pretence for refusing to pay the lessor of the plaintiff any rent, upon the ground of an adverse claim, which he peremptorily did: but if the defendant did hold as tenant to the lessor of the plaintiff, by agreement made between them, in that case the setting up an adverse title as a ground for refusing to pay any rent to the plaintiff, was a disclaimer of his then holding as tenant to the plaintiff. In Doe d. Calvert v. Freed, and most of the other cases where the question of disclaimer has arisen, the parties in possession have not claimed to be tenants under contracts made with the persons asserting a right of entry by force of the disclaimer; but the claim of tenancy by such persons was by operation of law, by virtue of contracts of demise and tenancy made with other persons, through or under whom the parties claim who insist on the right of possession; but in this case, the defendant claims to retain possession upon the ground that he has agreed to hold the land as tenant; and when a person so circumstanced says, as the defendant did, "I will pay you no rent until it is settled who is entitled to the property, and will then pay to the person who shall establish his title thereto," we think this must be deemed to be a disclaimer of an existing relation of landlord and tenant, and a putting of the person of whom he now professes to hold as tenant to the proof of his title; and he cannot therefore effectually resist an ejectment made necessary by his own conduct, in repudiating a title under which he claims to retain possession of the land.

We think, that the relation of landlord and tenant never existed between the lessor of the plaintiff and the defendant; and that Case for the infringement of the copyright of a musical publication.

Pleas—First, not guilty; second, that there was no subsisting copyright; third, that the plaintiff was not the proprietor of the copyright.

The cause was tried, before Erle, J., at the Sittings for Middlesex, after Trinity term, 1846, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 40s. damages and costs, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, and with liberty to either party to turn the facts into a special verdict. On the defendant moving to enter a nonsuit, pursuant to the leave reserved, it was agreed between the parties and ordered by the Court, that the verdict should be subject to a case, with liberty to either party to turn the same into a special verdict. The following are the material parts of the case:—The plaintiff is an Englishman, domiciled in England, formerly carrying on business as a music publisher in Prince's Street, Hanover Square, now in New Burlington Street, and the defendant is also a music publisher, carrying on business in Holborn. The author of the musical composition called "Die Elfen Walzer" is Joseph Labitzky, a native of Carlsbad, in the kingdom of Bohemia, in the empire of Austria, and domiciled there. Previous to the month of September 1842 the copyright of the said musical composition "Die Elfen Walzer" was sold, by letter, to the plaintiff, by Johann Hoffmann, a native of Prague, and domiciled there, he having previously purchased it of the said Joseph Labitzky, of which said letter the following is a copy:—

"Messrs. Cocks & Co. London.

"Leipsig, August 8, 1842.

"In order of Mr. J. Hoffmann, of Prague, I over send you with this an exemplar of the épreuves corrigées of Labitzky's Waltz op. 86. The term of publication is fixed on the 1st of September. You will credit the amount of the honorar, as usually, to Mr. John Hoffmann. I am, Sir,

"Yours most obediently,

"Friedrick Hofmeister."

Which letter was written and signed by Friedrick Hofmeister, by the authority and direction of Johann Hoffmann. The said musical composition was first published abroad on the 1st of September 1842. On the same day an entry was made, by the direction and on the behalf of the plaintiff, in the Book of Registry of Copyrights and Assignments kept at the Hall of the Stationers' Company, pursuant to the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, intituled "An Act to amend the law of copyright;" of which entry the following is a copy:—

Time of making the Entry.	Title of Book.	Name of Publisher, and Place of Publication.	Name and Place of Abode of Proprietor of Copyright.	Date of first Publication.
Sept. 1, 1842.	Die Elfen Walzer, composed for the Piano Forte by Joseph Labitzky	Messrs. Cocks & Co. 20, Princes Street, Hanover Square, London.	Robert Cocks, of No. 3, Ladbroke Terrace, Middlesex.	Sept. 1, 1842.

The said musical composition was published and sold by the plaintiff at his shop in Prince's Street, Hanover Square, for the first time on the said 1st of September 1842, the plaintiff having received a proof copy about ten days before, and printed it according to the day named for the publication.

On the 7th of August 1845, the plaintiff purchased of the defendant at his shop, in Holborn, a copy of the same musical composition printed and published by the defendant. An indenture, purporting to be under seal, dated the 18th of July 1843, was made between Johann Hoffmann and Joseph Labitzky, the said author, of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, and executed by Hoffmann and Labitzky, and duly stamped, so as to be a valid deed according to the Austrian law, which prevailed where Hoffmann and Labitzky resided, whereby Hoffmann and Labitzky, in consideration of the sum of 111*l.* paid by the plaintiff, sold and assigned to him the copyright, among other compositions, of the said "Die Elfen Walzer," and all their interest therein. By the Austrian law, which prevails both in Bohemia and Prague where Labitzky and Hoffmann respectively at the time of the sale of the said copyright resided, a copyright may be assigned by word of mouth without any writing. An author is the proprietor of the copyright, and has a copyright for his life and thirty years afterwards by virtue of his authorship, and an author may transfer the copyright to another individual for one country, after having published it himself.

The jury, in answer to a question from the learned Judge, found, as a fact, that there had been no publication abroad of "Die Elfen Walzer" prior to the publication in this country, but that the publication abroad and in England was simultaneous.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to maintain his action against the defendant for the piracy of the said musical composition. If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain his said action, then the verdict was to be for the plaintiff, on all the issues; but if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then a nonsuit was to be entered.

Talfourd, Serj. (January 19) for the plaintiff.—It is contended for the defendant in the first place, that a foreigner domiciled abroad cannot have a copyright in this country. But Pisani v. Lawson (1) shews that an alien domiciled abroad may have personal rights here, and may sue in the English courts in respect of injuries to such rights. De Londre v. Shaw (2) and Page v. Townsend (3) are relied on for the defendant. In the former case the Vice Chancellor certainly said, "the Court does not protect the copyright of a foreigner;" but there was no real question there of copyright, the matter in dispute being an imitation of labels and seals on bottles containing medicine, and it turned upon the plaintiff's right not to have inferior articles palmed off upon the public as of his manufacture. Page v. Townsend was decided upon the terms of a particular statute, the 17 Geo. 3. c. 57, which was passed for the protection of prints engraved, designed, etched or worked in Great Britain. That act purported to be for the protection of British Art, but no such words occur in the Copyright Act. In Bentley v. Foster (4), it was held that an alien domiciled abroad publishing a work first in this country is entitled to copyright. D'Almaine v. Bossey (5) shews that the English assignee of a foreign composition, first published in England, is entitled to the protection of the copyright laws in England. The second question is whether, as there was in this case no publication in England before the publication abroad, the plaintiff is entitled to protection. For the defendant it is contended, that the contemporaneous publication abroad disentitled the plaintiff to maintain his action. This point arises on the case of Chappell v. Purday (6), where it was said, that if a foreign author, not having published abroad, first publishes in England, he may have the benefit of the statute. In Clementi v. Walker (7), where it was held, that after a publication abroad, no copyright was acquired by a subsequent publication here, at a considerable interval, and after another publication here, it seems that the case would have been differently considered, if the author had published promptly here, and had made the first publication here. From the case of Chappell v. Purday it appears that a foreigner, author of a work unpublished abroad, may communicate his copyright to a British subject. In the present case there was no publication abroad before the publication here, for the publications were contemporaneous. The third question is, whether the plaintiff has derived a good title from the original author. The case states that the copyright was "sold by letter" to the plaintiff by Johann Hoffmann, of Prague, who had purchased it of Labitzky, the author.

[MAULE, J.—Is not the meaning of the letter this—that Hoffmann having bought Labitzky's copyright, and wishing to publish it at Prague and in England on the same day, engages the plaintiff to have it published in England?]

That point was not raised at the trial. It is stated in the case that there was a sale. Copyright, as defined in the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. s. 2, is personal property, and can pass like other personal property. In Power v. Walker (8) Lord Ellenborough said that the assignment of a copyright should be in writing; but at common law there is no difference between oral contracts and contracts in writing, unless they are by deed. At all events, this contract was made abroad, where a parol agreement is stated to be sufficient.

Channell, Serj. for the defendant.—It is necessary for the plaintiff to make out the existence of a copyright, and that the right had vested in him. The plaintiff relies in part on the entry made under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, at Stationers' Hall on the 1st of September, as establishing a prima facie case. That is an entry by the plaintiff himself, by which he asserts a title in himself. Such a proceeding would not generally be in accordance with the principles of law. It is not to be forgotten, that the 11th section of the act provides that the entry shall be only prima facie evidence. The plaintiff registered on the 1st of September, as proprietor. Now, was he at that time proprietor? He says he derived his title from Labitzky, the author, through Hoffmann. The entry does not shew the assignment to the plaintiff, although the act contemplates the entry of an assignment, and an assignment by entry. But Labitzky had no copyright in England, and therefore he could not transfer any copyright to the plaintiff. The question has been argued on the other side, whether a foreigner can have a copyright in England, and attention has been drawn to the case of Chappell v. Purday. The doubt raised there was not as to the party being an alien, but his being an alien living abroad. But supposing a foreigner residing abroad or his assignee can have a copyright, he must acquire it by a first publication here, and the cases have decided that if the first publication was made abroad, there is no copyright here. Though the case finds that the publication abroad was simultaneous with the publication here, it does not follow that the first publication was here. If the first publication was not made here, the foreign proprietor had no right which he could assign. If the letter did not operate as an assignment, the deed of July 1843 cannot be relied on as the assignment, as there had been a previous publication by the plaintiff in September 1842. It cannot be said that that was a publication by Labitzky or Hoffmann.

Talfourd, Serj. in reply.—The authorities do not establish that a foreigner living abroad cannot have a copyright in England. Bentley v. Foster and Chappell v. Purday shew the contrary. The publication here was a first publication; there was none before it. Then as to the title, the letter operated as a sufficient assignment by the law of the country; but if it did not, it appointed the plaintiff agent for Hoffmann to make the first publication in England, and then there was a perfect assignment by Hoffmann to the plaintiff by the deed of 1843.

WILDE, C.J.—(May 12,) delivered the judgment of the Court (9).—This was an action on the case for the infringement of the copyright of a musical publication. The defendant pleaded Not guilty; secondly, that there was no subsisting copyright in the publication; and, thirdly, that the plaintiff was not the proprietor of the copyright. The cause was tried before

(9) Wilde, C.J., Maule, J., Cresswell, J., and Williams, J.

Mr. Justice Erle, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to a special case, which stated in substance that the plaintiff is an Englishman domiciled in England, and Joseph Labitzky, a native of Carlsbad, in the empire of Austria, and domiciled there, was the author of the work. By the law of Austria, which prevails at Prague, where Johann Hoffmann is domiciled, as well as at Carlsbad, an author has copyright in his works for his own life and thirty years after, and may assign it by word of mouth. Johann Hoffmann became the purchaser and assignee of the copyright of the work in question from Labitzky, and afterwards sold it to the plaintiff, by a letter, dated the 8th of August 1842, written and signed by authority of Hoffmann, which letter was set out in the case, and stated, amongst other things, that the period of publication was fixed for the 1st of September. On the 1st of September 1842 the plaintiff made an entry in the register at Stationers' Hall, and stated therein that he was the publisher and proprietor, and that the date of the first publication was the 1st of September 1842. On the 18th of July 1843 a formal assignment of the copyright of this and other musical compositions was made to the plaintiff by indenture between Labitzky and Hoffmann of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part. The defendant sold a copy of the same work, published by himself, on the 7th of August 1845. The jury found that there had been no publication abroad prior to the publication in England; but that the publications abroad and in this country were simultaneous. Three points were raised and discussed at the bar: first, whether a foreigner domiciled abroad can have a copyright in this country; secondly, whether he can have it where there is not a publication here before publication abroad; and, thirdly, if it can exist under such circumstances, whether the plaintiff had derived a good title from the original author. As to the first point no legal principle was suggested as the foundation of the argument that an alien friend is not to have copyright in a work composed by him abroad, and first published in England. There are, indeed, some dicta in the books, to the effect that a foreign author is not protected against a publication of his work in England. Probably those dicta were intended to apply only to cases where a foreign author has published his work abroad, and not in England. In Chappell v. Purday, this subject is fully discussed; and although an opinion was expressed that a foreign author has not any copyright in England, unless he publishes his works here, yet it was decided that when he publishes here he has such copyright, unless he has, by previous publication abroad, made the work publici juris, as was said in Guichard v. Mori (12). There are two cases of D'Almaine v. Boosey and Beniley v. Foster, where it has been expressly held that a foreigner composing a work abroad, and first publishing it in England, has copyright, and is protected; and in Clementi v. Walker, where it was held that, after a publication abroad, no copyright was acquired by publication here after a considerable interval, and after another person had without fraud, and in the regular course of trade, published the same work in this country, an opinion was expressed that the case would have been different had the publication here promptly followed that which had preceded it abroad, and been the first publication in this country. The cases of De Londre v. Shaw and Page v. Townsend, which were cited during the argument, are not authorities the other way. The first was an application for an injunction to restrain the defendant from imitating certain labels and seals made and printed in France, and it was refused on the ground that De Londre had no interest in them, although the Vice Chancellor of England added that the Court does not protect the copyright of a foreigner. If this dictum was intended to apply to foreign authors who have not published in this country, it does not apply to the present case; if it was intended to apply to the case of a foreign author who has published his work here, the same learned Judge in Beniley v. Foster, where the point was raised, expressed a deliberate opinion in opposition to that which he had before thrown out. In the second (Page v. Townsend), an application was made for an injunction to protect the supposed copyright in certain engravings executed and published abroad, and the question turned on the meaning of certain statutes which were held to have been passed only for the protection of prints engraved, etched, drawn, or designed in Great Britain, and the last of them, the 17 Geo. 3. c. 57, is in express terms so limited in its operation. The general rule is, that an alien may acquire personal rights and maintain personal actions in respect to injuries to them. He cannot maintain real actions because he cannot hold land: see Pisani v. Lawson. It appears to us, then, upon the authorities, as well as upon principle, that an alien ami, the author of a work of which he is also the first publisher in England, and which has not been made publici juris by a previous publication elsewhere, has a copyright in that work whether it be composed in this country or abroad.

The second question argued at the bar is scarcely separable from the first, viz., whether the copyright, which the author or his assignee would otherwise have had in this country, was defeated by the contemporaneous publication abroad. If it be correct to say that a foreigner, the author of a work composed abroad and published in this country, is, by the municipal law of this country, entitled to a copyright in the work, how can such a right be defeated by a contemporaneous publication abroad? In the popular sense of the word each would be the first publication; but if neither could be so called, the result would be the same, for, in order to defeat the claim of copyright, a prior publication in some other place or by some other party should be proved.

The third question raised was, whether the plaintiff had proved a good derivative title under the original author. It is stated in the case that by the law of Austria, which prevailed where Labitzky, the author, and Hoffmann, his assignee, were respectively domiciled, the author had a copyright, and that such copyright might be assigned by word of mouth; that Labitzky sold and assigned his copyright to Hoffmann, and that Hoffmann, before the publication of the work, sold his copyright to the plaintiff. But it is also stated that the sale was effected by a letter written from Leipzig, which was set out in the case, and some discussion took place as to the sufficiency of that letter to effect a sale. The terms of it are ambiguous, and it certainly has as much the aspect of evidence of a previous sale as of an instrument by which the sale was effected. But the parties themselves have stated that it was a sale, and we think they must be bound by that statement. Now the recent statute, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. s. 3, enacts, "that the copyright of every book published in the lifetime of the author shall endure for the time there specified, and shall be the property of such author or his assigns." And the 2nd section (the interpretation clause) had before provided that "the word assigns shall be construed to mean and include any person in whom the interest of an author in copyright shall be vested, whether derived from such author before or after the publication of any book," &c. There being, then, a sale in this case, valid by the law of Austria, where it was made, the interest of the author became vested in the plaintiff before publication, so as to make him an assign within the meaning of the 3rd section; and he, therefore, had a good derivative title. This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the arguments that were offered to the Court on the supposition that the plaintiff might be compelled to rely on the assignment by the deed executed in 1843; and as we think that a foreign author, publishing his work in this country before anything had been done either here or abroad to prevent the acquisition of copyright, has a copyright protected by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, and that his interest may be assigned before publication, and in this instance was well assigned to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff's publication took place before anything had happened to prevent his becoming entitled to protection, our judgment must be in his favour.

ELDERTON v. EMMENS.

Costs, Taxation of—Costs of the Cause—Costs of Witnesses—Arrest of Judgment—Practice.

A declaration contained four counts. The defendant pleaded the general issue to the whole declaration, and special pleas to each count. The verdict was for the defendant on the general issue to the first, third, and fourth counts, and on all the other issues for the plaintiff. Judgment on the second count (upon which the plaintiff succeeded), was arrested:—Held, that the defendant was entitled to the general costs of the cause.

In this case the declaration was in assumpsit, and consisted of four counts. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit to the whole declaration, and special pleas to each of the counts. A verdict was found for the defendant on the general issue to the first, third, and last counts, and for the plaintiff on the general issue to the second count; upon the second count judgment was arrested. The special pleas were found for the plaintiff. The Master on taxation allowed no costs to either party upon the issues joined on the second count. He allowed the defendant the general costs of the cause, and also a sum of fifty guineas for three copies of a deed, which the defendant had received notice from the plaintiff to produce at the trial, and he refused to allow the plaintiff the costs of witnesses called to prove the special pleas upon which he succeeded, upon the ground that their evidence was not solely applicable to those pleas. A rule had been obtained, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the Master should not review his taxation of costs.

Byles, Serj. and H. Hill shewed cause (Jan. 12).—The defendant is entitled to the general costs of the cause, in which he has succeeded, and the count upon which judgment was arrested must be considered as struck out of the record. At common law neither party is entitled to costs, which are given to the plaintiff in all cases in which he recovers damages by the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 1. The 23 Hen. 8. c. 15. gives the defendant costs if the verdict happen to pass against the plaintiff in certain actions, since extended to all actions by 4 Jac. 1. c. 3, and the practice, under these statutes, has always been to give the defendant his costs, although he does not obtain a verdict on every part of the record. In Archbold's Practice, vol. 2, 1376, it is said, "If there are several issues, and one is found for the plaintiff, and the others for the defendant, if that found for the plaintiff be the substantial issue in the cause, and upon which he will be entitled to recover his debt or damages, or any part of them, he will be entitled to the postea, and to the general costs of the cause. If, on the other hand, the defence raised upon the issue found for the defendant furnishes substantially a defence to the whole action, then the defendant will be entitled to the postea, and the general costs of the cause—Tidd's Practice, 9th edit. 977, Hart v. Cutbush (1), Frankum v. the Earl of Falmouth (2). See also Day v. Hanks (3), Thornton v. Williamson (4), and 1 Sesand, 300, notes (b) (c). In Norris v. Waldren (5) the plaintiff was entitled to damages, and as that case was decided upon the Statute of Gloucester, it is no authority for the present plaintiff. Here the defendant would be entitled to judgment, except for the bad count, on every part of the record; and it would be an extraordinary result if the plaintiff, by inserting a bad count in the declaration, could deprive the defendant of costs, to which if such count had been omitted he would be entitled. The record must be taken as if the bad count was entirely eradicated therefrom—Goodburne v. Bouman (6). It is not easy to distinguish this case from James v. Brook (7); but it is submitted, that that decision cannot stand. It was there assumed, that as the Reg. Gen. Hilary term, 2 Will. 4. c. 74, and Hilary term, 4 Will. 4. c. 74, only deprive the plaintiff of the costs of the issues upon which he fails, he is not to pay the costs of the cause when he has succeeded on one issue. The general practice in such cases was entirely overlooked in the argument in James v. Brook, and also in the judgment, but the New Rules do not apply to the state of circumstances as they existed in that case, nor is the present to be governed by them. As to the other points, the costs of the particular items are in the discretion of the Master. The plaintiff gave the defendant notice to produce the deed, and it was therefore necessary that copies of it should be made for his counsel. It is settled by Crowther v. Elwell (8), that where the evidence of several witnesses applies to several issues, success on one issue does not entitle the party successful on that issue to all the costs of such witnesses.

Telford, Serj. and Hoggins, in support of the rule.—The defendant should not have pleaded over, but ought to have demurred to the bad count. As he has not taken the proper course, he must pay all the costs in respect of the second count, and also of the special pleas. There can be no reason why the plaintiff should not have his costs of the special plea to the second count. If non assumpsit had not been pleaded to that count, he would have received the costs, and why is he to be placed in a worse position when he has succeeded on non assumpsit to that count? The case of James v. Brook is not distinguishable from the present case, and was rightly decided. That was an action for slander. The declaration contained three counts. The defendant pleaded the general issue to the whole, and several special pleas to each count, on which issues were joined. Defendant had a verdict on the general issue to the first and second counts. The plaintiff succeeded on all the other issues. Judgment was arrested on the third count; and it was held, that the defendant was not entitled to the general costs of the cause. The statutes 23 Hen. 8. c. 15. and 4 Jac. 1. c. 3. contemplate cases in which the defendant succeeds upon the entire record. The cause exists as a whole, and the costs are of the same nature. If the defendant does not wholly succeed he is only entitled under the New Rules to the costs of the particular issues found for him; and the Master was wrong in allowing the defendant the general costs of the cause, when there is not a general and complete judgment in his favour. The copies of the deed were wholly unnecessary, and it cannot be said that evidence of witnesses was not exclusively applicable to the special plea to the first count, because it also applied to the special plea to the second count. The justification in both special pleas was the same in substance, varied only in form so as to meet the respective averments in the first and second counts of the declaration.

WILDE, C. J. now (May 12,) delivered the judgment of the Court (9).—The plaintiff declared against the defendant, as secretary of the Church of England United Life and Fire Assurance Trust and Annuity Company, on two counts, on two different contracts to employ him as attorney and solicitor to the company. There were also counts for work and labour, and on an account stated. The defendant pleaded to the whole declaration, that the company did not promise, and a special plea to the first and second counts respectively, justifying the discharge of the plaintiff. Replication de injuriâ. To the third and fourth counts, payment and satisfaction. At the trial, a verdict was found for the plaintiff on the issue joined on the pleas to the first and second counts, subject to a motion to enter a verdict for the defendant on the issue of non assumpsit, as to the first count. The verdict was for the defendant on the general issue as to the third and fourth counts, and for the plaintiff on the special pleas. A rule nisi was afterwards obtained by the defendant, to enter a verdict for the defendant on the plea of non assumpsit to the first count, and to arrest the judgment on the second count; which rule was after argument made absolute. The Master, on the taxation of costs, allowed to the defendant the general costs of the cause, and allowed, as part of them, the costs of three copies of the company's deed of settlement, which was very long; he also refused to allow the plaintiff the costs of certain witnesses called by him in support of the issue on the special plea to the first count, on which he succeeded, because their evidence was applicable to other issues also. A rule nisi for reviewing the Master's taxation was granted, and the points were fully discussed on shewing cause. As to the first point, (which was the most important,) it was contended that the right of the defendant to costs depended upon the statute 23 Hen. 8. c. 15, (extended to all actions by the 4 Jac. 1. c. 3,) which enacts, that in certain actions, "if the plaintiff, after the appearance of the defendant, was nonsuited, or that on any trial a verdict happen to pass by lawful authority against the plaintiff, the defendant in every such action shall have judgment to recover his costs against the plaintiff, to be assessed and taxed at the discretion of the Court," &c., and that this statute did not entitle the defendant to costs, unless the verdict was in his favour on the whole record, whereas in this case the verdict was in favour of the plaintiff on both the issues raised as to the second count, upon which the judgment was arrested. The case of James v. Brook, decided by Mr. Justice Erle, in the Bail Court, reported in 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 168, is certainly expressly in point, and if that was rightly decided this rule should be made absolute. But after mature consideration, it appears to us that the statute 23 Hen. 8. c. 15. (as it has been construed in several cases) applies, although the defendant cannot have the verdict in his favour on every part of the record. Thus in Day v. Hanks, in which the declaration contained two counts in case, for the disturbance of two distinct commons, and as to the first the defendant suffered judgment by default, and as to the second took issue, and obtained a verdict, the Court held, that as to that the defendant was entitled to judgment and his costs, although he could not have a verdict and judgment on every part of the record. And in Thornton v. Williamson, (an action of trespass quare clausum fregit,) the defendant pleaded two different rights of way, on which the plaintiff took issue, and new assigned extra viam, as to which the defendant suffered judgment by default. At the trial, the damages were assessed on that judgment, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict on the issue as to one right of way, and the defendant on the issue as to the other; and it was held that the defendant was entitled to the general costs of the cause, although it was manifest that he had not a general verdict in his favour, nor could have judgment upon every part of the record. Cross v. Johnson (10) is to the same effect. The attention of Mr. Justice Erle does not appear to have been drawn to those cases by the counsel who argued in James v. Brook. It was there assumed that the statute 23 Hen. 8. c. 15. did not give the defendant costs in such a case, and the question was treated as depending on the New Rules as to the allowance of costs on particular issues found for the plaintiff or defendant; but we think that the statute does apply to this case, which differs from those only in the circumstance, that as to the second count the plaintiff obtained a verdict, and judgment was arrested. But it seems difficult to say upon what principle a plaintiff is to be in a better position when he has obtained a verdict, on an issue joined on a count so defective that he could have no judgment, than where he has a judgment by default on a good count, as in Day v. Hanks. As far as costs are concerned, the count on which judgment is arrested is moved out of the way. There is no effective verdict where judgment is arrested; and although it may be true that the defendant cannot have judgment on every part of the record, yet on the whole record the judgment is in his favour, and we think the Master was right in allowing him the general costs of the cause. As to the issues found for the plaintiff, on the pleas to the first, third, and fourth counts, the Master would not allow him the costs of his witnesses, because they were not exclusively applicable to those issues, but also to others which were found against him. The Master was the proper party to judge whether the evidence of the witnesses was exclusively applicable to the issues found for the plaintiff, and as he has decided that it was not, the plaintiff, not being entitled to the general costs of the cause, was not entitled to have them allowed according to the several decisions—Lordster v. Dick (11), Knight v. Woore (12), Crowder v. Elwell. The remaining point, namely, the allowance of the copies of the deed, we think was in the discretion of the Master, and we see no reason for saying that the manner in which he exercised that discretion was in contravention of any rule of law or practice of the Court. The rule therefore for reviewing his taxation must be discharged.

Promissory Note—3 & 4 Anne, c. 9. s. 1.
—Indorsement—Negotiability—Pleading.

A note payable to the maker's own order is not a promissory note negotiable under the stat. 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9. s. 1. But the maker of such a note may, by indorsing it, give the holder a right of action on it against him.

A declaration describing such a note as a "promissory note" might be bad on demurrer, but is good after being pleaded over to. So, though an allegation that the defendant indorsed such a note might be bad on demurrer, it is sufficient after plea.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the defendant on the 11th of September 1845 made his promissory note in writing, and thereby promised to pay to his, the defendant's, own order, 75*l.* for value received, two months after the date thereof, which period had elapsed before the commencement of the suit, and the defendant then indorsed the same to the plaintiff, whereof the defendant had due notice, and then, in consideration of the premises, promised to pay the amount of the said note to the plaintiff, according to the tenour and effect thereof.

dorsing of the note by the defendant; and others not material to be adverted to.

At the trial, before Erle, J., at the London Sittings after Trinity term, 1846, a note in the following form, stamped with a three shilling stamp, was given in evidence:—

"London, September 11, 1845.

"£75.—Two months after date I promise to pay to my own order the sum of 75*l.* for value received.

"C. L. De Winton, Lieut. 16th Regt.
"To Sir J. Kirkland & Co.

80, Pall Mall, London."

Indorsed—"C. L. De Winton, Lieut. 16th Regt."

A verdict was found for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him.

Byles, Serj. having obtained in Michaelmas term, 1846, a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the defendant, or to arrest the judgment,

Channell, Serj. and Atherton (Dec. 6th, 1847) shewed cause.—The question in this case is, whether the plaintiff has a right to sue as the indorsee of a promissory note made by the defendant, payable to the defendant's own order. It is contended for the defendant, that such a note is not within the provisions of the 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9. s. 1, so as to become negotiable by virtue thereof. The case of Flight v. Maclean (1) in the Exchequer seems to support that view, while the case of Wood v. Mylton (2), in the Queen's Bench, decides that such a note is negotiable under the statute. In Flight v. Maclean the plaintiff had judgment on the second count of the declaration, and therefore he had* no necessity for pressing the point upon the first count. Wood v. Mylton was exactly like the present case, except that there was an intermediate indorsement there, which, of course, does not affect the question. The argument for the defendant in Flight v. Maclean resolved itself into two parts: the first purporting to shew that the note was not negotiable by law, and the other that it disclosed no contract on the face of it. The case of De la Chaumette v. the Bank of England (3) was the only one cited on the first point. Lord Tenterden is there reported to have said, "Before the statute of Anne a promissory note was not transferable in England by indorsement; but by the law of France and other countries such an instrument is transferable by indorsement: if so, is it by the law of merchants or by positive enactment?" Of the cases cited on the other point, Champion v. Plummer (4), Cooper v. Smith (5) and several others turned on the question, whether the memorandum sufficiently shewed a contract under the Statute of Frauds; and Green v. Davies (6) merely decided that a memorandum which was held to be a promissory note ought to be stamped as such. In a case of Hooper v. Williams (7), tried at the Spring Assizes for Surrey in 1847, before Lord Denman, C.J., a note like this was treated as one payable to bearer; and it was objected that the note was incorrectly described, and that the stamp was insufficient, the stamp on a note payable to bearer being different from that on one payable to the maker's order. A verdict was agreed to be taken for the defendant, with liberty to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for him. The Court of Exchequer granted a rule nisi accordingly, and the case is now pending for argument. The application for the rule nisi in the present case was based on the ground that the paper produced at the trial did not prove the averments of the making and indorsing of a promissory note. Whether the statute of Anne applies or not, the instrument was such an one as is described in the declaration, and the plaintiff has therefore made out the affirmative of the issues. All that the declaration means, and the pleas deny, is, that the defendant put his name to the instrument described, and on the back of it.

The next question then is, whether an action lies on such an instrument as the one described,—and undoubtedly it does not, unless the statute of Anne is applicable. The preamble of the 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9. may be taken as a legislative statement of the law as it existed before the act, and it recites that "notes in writing signed by the party who makes the same, whereby such party promises to pay unto any other person or his order, are not assignable or indorsable by the custom of merchants." The 1st section enacts, "That all notes in writing, whereby any person promises to pay a sum of money to any other person, or his order, or to bearer, shall be construed by virtue thereof due and payable to such person to whom the same is made payable," and then proceeds, "and also every such note payable to any person or persons, body politic and corporate, his, her, or their order, shall be assignable or indorsable over in the same manner as inland bills of exchange are or may be according to the custom of merchants." When the whole of the provisions of the 1st section are looked at, this note must be taken to come within them. The recital, no doubt, is narrow; and if it is to be taken as restricting the enactments, this case must fall to the ground, for this note is certainly not such a one as is mentioned in the preamble, that is, a note payable to another person or his order. There are four beneficial provisions with regard to promissory notes in this section. The first does not relate to negotiability at all, but merely makes the money payable by virtue of the notes themselves. The words and spirit of the second provision are distinctly applicable to the present case,—"and every such note payable to any person or his order." If there are two possible constructions, one of which will carry out the apparent intention of the act, and give effect to all its parts, and the other is not in conformity with such intention, nor applicable to all the parts, the former construction is to be adopted. The statute of Anne, being a remedial one, is to be liberally construed. The cases of Clerke v. Martin (8) and Buller v. Cripps (9) shew the state of the law, for the amendment of which the statute was afterwards passed. In Brown v. Harraden (10), where it was held that promissory notes and bills of exchange were put on the same footing in all respects by the statute, the Judges shew that the object for which the statute was passed was to give relief to the merchants who had previously been inconvenienced by the non-negotiability of their notes. In Burchell v. Slocock (11) and Smith v. Kendall (12) the statute was held to extend to notes payable to a particular person, without adding "or to his order," or "to bearer." These two cases shew that the operation of the statute is not to be limited by the preamble, for the instruments there were not "payable to any person or his order." In Milne v. Graham (13) the statute was held to apply to promissory notes made in Scotland. The word "such" in the second provision of the act cannot be taken as restricted to the notes mentioned in the preamble, and if it is to be restricted at all, it must apply to the last antecedent which includes notes payable to bearer. But the language of the second provision differs from that of the first, as it applies to notes payable to any person, not any other person, and if construed liberally, must be taken to apply to a note payable to the maker's own order. Such instruments are common, and till now no doubt has been raised that they fall within the statute. For these reasons, the plaintiff makes out a good title to sue, and there is no ground for arresting the judgment or entering the verdict for the defendant.

Byles, Serj. and Peacock, in support of the rule.—The authorities are equally balanced as to the point in dispute. The Court of Queen's Bench gave the grounds of their judgment in the case of Wood v. Mytton, but they do not seem satisfactory. They say, "the second clause of the statute by the words 'every such note' adopts the description in the first, exclusive of the payee, and adds a different description of the payee, omitting to specify the bearer, but extending to any person; it includes, therefore, in terms notes payable to the maker or his order." But the object of changing the phraseology may have been to comprehend the bearer, while the construction adopted by the Queen's Bench is inconsistent with the third and fourth provisions, which enact, that the payee or indorsee of such notes may bring actions upon them as upon inland bills of exchange, against the maker or indorser. If this note can be considered as one payable to the bearer, it ought to have been so described. An instrument should be set out in pleading according to its legal effect. The cases, of which Baker v. Lade (14) is the leading one, are collected in 2 Wms. Saund. 97, b, &c. It is quite another question, whether an indorsement may not amount to a new making of the note. In order to make the indorsement equivalent to a new making, it would require to be special, and if that be relied on it must be taken to be traversed in that sense, and was not so proved at the trial. A note payable to blank, there being no fraud, is not a good promissory note. In The King v. Randall (15), a bill payable to blank or order was held not to be a bill of exchange on a trial for forgery; and in The King v. Richards (16), an instrument payable to blank or order was held not to be an order for the payment of money. A promissory note payable to blank, and one payable to bearer, are different; and different stamp duties are payable in respect of them—Moyser v. Whitaker (17).

in the first and only material count of his declaration, stated that the defendant made his promissory note in writing, and thereby promised to pay to his, the defendant's, own order, 75*l.* for value received, two months after the date thereof, which period had elapsed before the commencement of the suit; that the defendant thereupon indorsed the same to the plaintiff, whereof the defendant then had notice, and then in consideration of the premises promised to pay the amount of the said note to the plaintiff according to the tenour and effect thereof. To this count the defendant pleaded, first, that the defendant did not make the said promissory note in manner and form; and secondly, that the defendant did not indorse the said promissory note in manner and form, &c. The other pleas are not material to be adverted to. On the trial, it appeared that the note was a note drawn payable to the order of the maker, and indorsed by him in blank. A verdict was found for the plaintiff. There was leave reserved to the defendant to enter a verdict, if the Court should think the verdict ought to be entered for him. In the ensuing term, my Brother Byles moved for and obtained a rule nisi, in the alternative, for entering a verdict for the defendant, or for arresting the judgment. On the argument before us, it was insisted that the note in question being made payable to the order of the maker, was not a promissory note within the statute of the 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9; and if so, it was contended that the plaintiff could maintain no action upon it. Upon the proper construction to be put on this statute, the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Exchequer have differed; and in this conflict of authorities it will be necessary to examine minutely the provisions of the act, having regard to the nature of the instrument referred to. In considering them, with reference to the question in this case, a doubt arises, whether if a man makes a note payable to his own order, he can, with any propriety of language, be said to have made a promissory note at all. It is true, no precise form of words is necessary to constitute a promissory note, but still it ought to have the essentials of a contract. Now, no man can make a contract with himself. There ought to be two parties to a contract. See Champion v. Plummer.

In the case of a promissory note there ought to be a promisor and a promisee. It is indeed not necessary that the payee of a note should be expressly named, as decided in Green v. Davies and Chadwick v. Allen; but the person to whom the note is to be paid ought, at least, to appear by implication, as in the cases just cited. The legislature may indeed make use of a term in a sense not strictly appropriate to it; but it is to be presumed until the contrary appears that the terms made use of are intended to bear their appropriate meaning. Prima facie then, a statute, when it speaks of promissory notes ought to be understood to mean what answers to the proper notion of a promissory note, that is to say, an instrument whereby one man promises to pay some one else a sum of money. Is there in the act anything to shew that the legislature had in contemplation, among others expressly referred to, notes payable to the makers' own order. The first part of the section of the statute, as was observed in the case of Wood v. Mytton in the Queen's Bench, consists of a preamble to the four enacting clauses. Looking first to the preamble we see it expressly refers to notes payable to another person or his order. When we look at the enacting clauses, the description of notes referred to is enlarged; the first clause referring to notes payable to any other person, his, her or their order, or to bearer, but not comprising notes payable to the order of the maker. The second clause requires a more particular examination. It runs thus: "every such note payable to any person or persons, his or their order, shall be assignable or indorsable over in the same manner as inland bills of exchange are or may be, according to the custom of merchants. Now, the word "such" is a word of reference, and cannot upon the ordinary rules of reference be understood as referring to any other notes than such notes as had been mentioned before. It is said, however, and truly said, that the phraseology in the second clause differs from that in the first. The words "any person" being substituted in the place of the words "any other person," it was said may well include the maker himself. But the words of the clause are "notes payable to any person or persons, his, her, or their order." Now, a note payable simply to the order of the maker cannot with pro-piety be said to be payable to any person whatever: for to whom is it payable? Not to the maker, for it does not purport to be so; nor yet to any other person. It imports, in fact, no existing obligation to pay money to any person whatever; and if lost or stolen before indorsement, and afterwards circulated, can in no way bring a charge upon the maker. If we proceed to the third clause we find it has reference, in terms perfectly general, to the person or persons to whom such money is or shall be by such notes made payable. What are the notes here referred to by the words "such notes"? Those words are equivalent to "the notes before mentioned;" and the clause ought to be understood as referring to the notes mentioned in the preceding clause, or at least as including them; and therefore the provisions of the third clause may furnish a further key for the determination of the question, what description of notes are included in the second clause. The provisions of the third clause are, that the person or persons to whom such sum of money is or shall be by such notes made payable, shall and may maintain an action for the same against the person or persons who signed the same. Such a provision is clearly inapplicable to a note made by the maker payable to his own order, since it is impossible for him to sue himself. It follows that the third clause is not intended to comprehend within it notes payable to the order of the maker; and if the third clause includes within it, as we think it does, all the notes mentioned in the second clause, that clause is also to be understood to have reference only to notes on which the maker is liable to be sued by the payee or the bearer. It seems to us, therefore, that the act of parliament, in speaking of promissory notes, is to be considered as referring to notes payable to the order of some other person than the maker, and to notes payable to bearer, but not to notes payable to the order of the maker. An instrument so drawn is an incomplete instrument, being in the nature of a conditional engagement, in case he should afterwards indorse the note, to pay to the person to whom, by such indorsement, he should direct it to be paid. Such an instrument is of no legal or binding effect, until something further is done to give it validity. It is another question, what is the nature of such a note after it has been indorsed and put in circulation. As no particular form of words is essential to form a valid promissory note, such a note, if indorsed to J. S. or order, imports a promise to pay J. S. or order the money therein mentioned: yet if the maker of such a note indorses it in blank, and circulates it, he must, we think, be considered as engaging to pay the amount to that person who may be the lawful holder of it for value, that is, in effect, to the bearer. It must be taken as against the person indorsing such an instrument that he intended it to be a valid instrument, when he paid it away, and that his indorsement should have the same effect as the indorsement by the payee of a note, payable to the order of a person other than the maker would have. It remains to consider what is the result of that as far as the present case is concerned. In order to decide whether the verdict for the plaintiff is right we must consider what the declaration means. It alleges that the defendant made his promissory note in writing, and thereby promised to pay to his own order 75*l.*, and that the defendant indorsed it to the plaintiff.

The first of those two allegations is open to the observation that there is an inconsistency in calling that a promissory note which appears not to be one. This may have been ground of demurrer; but the defendant having pleaded over to it, it must have a reasonable construction put upon it, and although the words "promissory note" are inappropriate, yet coupling them with the explanation given by the subsequent part of the allegation, which shews in what sense the words "promissory note" are used, they are intelligible, and the allegation may be taken to mean that the defendant made a note in writing, containing a promise to pay to his own order 75*l.* The plea denies that the said defendant made the promissory note in the declaration mentioned. This traverse must be understood as denying the making of the promissory note in the same sense in which the declaration alleges it,—that such a note as is alleged was actually made. The second allegation is, that the defendant indorsed the said note to the plaintiff. What must be understood to be the meaning of this allegation when pleaded over to? The term "indorsing" may not be strictly applicable to such an instrument, which is not properly indorsed over; but not being demurred to, it may be understood in any sense which the words will bear, and which will make the pleading good. In the case of bills or notes which are indorsed over, the allegation that the defendant indorsed the bill to the plaintiff means that he indorsed the bill under circumstances which give the plaintiff a right to sue upon it—Marston v. Allen (19) and Adams v. Jones (20). The allegation in this declaration respecting the indorsement may well bear that sense, and the plea, when it denies the indorsement, must be understood in the same sense. Now the fact of indorsing the note in blank, and delivering it to the plaintiff, was proved, and if the right to sue was thereby vested in the plaintiff, the verdict was properly found for him. The question, then, stripped of all technicalities, comes to this: can the maker of such a note, by indorsing it, give a right of action? and upon the grounds already pointed out we are of opinion that he may. The verdict, therefore, which has been found for the plaintiff, will stand. On the same ground, the motion to arrest the judgment must fail. The allegations on the record shew substantially, if not in a correct technical form, the true facts of the case, and those facts, as we have already intimated, do, we think, shew a title in the plaintiff to recover.

Dec. 6.

Promissory Note—Statute 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9.—Indorsement—Negotiability—Pleading.

The declaration stated that the defendant made a promissory note payable to his own order, and indorsed it to Smith & Co., who indorsed it to the plaintiff:—Held, that as against the maker and indorser this was a valid promissory note payable to Smith & Co. or order; that the note before indorsement was in the nature of a promise to pay to the person to whom the maker should afterwards indorse it; and that the declaration would have been bad on special demurrer for not setting out correctly the legal effect of the instrument.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated, that the defendant, on the 8th of March 1845, made a promissory note in writing, and thereby promised to pay to the order of him, the said defendant, the sum of 500*l.*, for value received, six months after the date thereof, which period had elapsed before the commencement of the suit, and the defendant then indorsed the said note to certain other persons, using and trading under the name, style, and firm of Smith & Co., and the said persons so using the name, style, and firm of Smith & Co., by and under the name, &c., indorsed the said note to the plaintiffs, and the defendant then, in consideration of the premises, promised the plaintiffs to pay the amount of the said note, according to the tenour and effect thereof.

To this declaration there were special pleas in confession and avoidance, but no traverse.

A verdict having been found for the plaintiffs on all the issues, a rule nisi was obtained to arrest the judgment, on the ground that the note stated in the declaration was not a negotiable instrument under the 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9. s. 1.

Bovill (6th Dec.) shewed cause.—The declaration must be taken since the New Rules, as if it averred that the defendant "according to the usage and custom of merchants," made the note in question. The note is within the statute of Anne. The "making" of a note consists in putting the maker's name to it and his delivering it to another person, and "indorsing" a note means indorsing the name and delivering the note so indorsed—Marston v. Allen (1). On the declaration, as it stands, this must be taken to have been a special indorsement to Smith & Co. The case of Allen v. Walker (2) shews that an indorsement is a new drawing.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Is it a new drawing in the same form?]

It is no note at all till it is delivered.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Then the drawing is an original one.]

The note becomes incorporated in the indorsement, and this indorsement was a promise to pay Smith & Co.; and then it is a note payable to another under the statute of Anne. Putting the name on the back of it made it negotiable.

[CRESSWELL, J.—This does not state an indorsement to Smith & Co. or order. The power to indorse is derived from the body of the instrument. There lies the difficulty.]

If it is an indorsement in blank it is payable to bearer, and so within the stat. of Anne.

J. Henderson, in support of the rule.—The question here is as to the arrest of judgment. It is said, on the other side, first, that the indorsement was a new drawing; and, secondly, that this was a promissory note payable to bearer. With regard to the first point, if the note can be taken as made payable to Smith & Co., it is not payable to their order, and therefore has no negotiable quality under the statute. The plaintiffs have no right to contend that the note is other than it appears to be in the declaration. A note payable to a person's order is payable to that person—Smith v. M'Clure (3), and therefore this note was payable to the defendant himself. Under any view of the case this document could be of no avail till it was indorsed. As to the second point, the instrument is not properly described in the declaration. It is said that it may be considered as payable to bearer, but then it should have been so described. In Gibson v. Minett (4), where the payee was a fictitious person, and it was held that an innocent indorsee might recover, the bill was described as payable to the bearer. If the words of the note itself do not imply that it is payable to the bearer the statute of Anne will give no assistance. It is admitted that this is not a negotiable instrument unless it comes within the statute, and also that it does not fall within the description of instruments mentioned in the preamble. The construction of the second clause now contended for is reasonable; and any other construction is inconsistent with the third and fourth clauses, which give a right of action to the payee or indorsee against the party signing the note. Was this note before indorsement a note payable to any person or persons? A note is not good if there is not a distinctly ascertained payee—Blanckenhagen v. Blundell (5). It was not decided in the case of Flight v. Maclean (6) whether a note like the present could be described as payable to bearer.

COLTMAN, J. (June 28,) delivered the judgment of the Court (7).—In this case, a motion was made to arrest the judgment. The declaration stated that the defendant made a promissory note, and thereby promised to pay to his own order 500*l.* six months after date, and then indorsed it to Smith & Co., who indorsed it to the plaintiffs. The defendant pleaded several pleas, on which issue was joined, all of which were found for the plaintiffs. On the hearing of the motion in arrest of judgment, the general line of argument with respect to the statute of Anne was referred to, which had been fully discussed in the case of Brown v. De Winton (8), and which it is not necessary to advert to in this case with particularity, as we have expressed our opinion upon it at length in giving judgment on that case. In the case of Brown v. De Winton, this Court held, in conformity with the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Hooper v. Williams (9), that if a man makes a note payable to his own order, and afterwards indorses it in blank and circulates it, it thereby becomes a valid note payable to bearer. It was contended, on the hearing of this motion in arrest of judgment, that however the case might be when the note was indorsed in blank, the first indorsement in this case must be taken to be a special indorsement, making the note payable to Smith & Co. only, and not to them or their order, and that they could not indorse it to the plaintiffs; but we think the principle on which the case of Brown v. De Winton was decided will extend to this case. The principle on which that case was decided is, that the note before it was indorsed was in the nature of a promise to pay to the person to whom the maker should afterwards by indorsement order the amount to be paid; and then, after that note is indorsed and circulated, it must be taken as against the party so making and indorsing the note, that he intended his indorsement should have the same effect that an indorsement by the payee of a note payable to the order of a person other than the maker would have had. Now, it is well established that if a note be made payable to J. S. or order, and J. S. in such a case indorses the note specially to Smith & Co., without adding "or order," Smith & Co. may convey a good title to any other person by indorsement—More v. Manning (10), Edie v. the East India Company (11), and other cases there cited. We think the effect of so making and indorsing the note in question was to make it, as against the maker and indorser, a valid promissory note, payable to Smith & Co. or order; and, therefore, that the declaration is open only to an objection upon special demurrer, for not setting out correctly the legal effect of the instrument. The rule for arresting the judgment must, therefore, be discharged.

Error from the Court of Common Pleas.

The plaintiff in error had brought an action of assumpsit against the defendant, for money had and received, and on an account stated. The venue was laid in Middlesex. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit; and at the trial the plaintiff was nonsuited. The record, after setting out the issue and the judgment of nonsuit in the usual way, proceeded thus:—"And it is further considered that the defendant do recover against the plaintiff 10*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, for his costs and charges for him about his defence in this behalf laid out and expended, by the Court here adjudged to the defendant, &c., with his assent, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided; and that the defendant have execution thereof, &c. Afterwards, to wit, on the 29th day of January A.D. 1848, the defendant comes here into court, by his attorney aforesaid, and prays the writ of our Lady the Queen of capias ad satisfaciendum, to be directed to the sheriff of Middlesex, commanding him that he take the plaintiff, if he be found in his bailiwick, and him safely keep, so that he may have his body before the Justices of our said Lady the Queen, at Westminster, immediately after the execution thereof, to satisfy the defendant 10*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, which, lately in our court, before our Justices at Westminster, were awarded to the said defendant, according to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, for his costs and charges by him laid out and expended about his defence in a certain action on promises lately brought in our said court by the said plaintiff against the said defendant, for that the said plaintiff did not prosecute the said action whereof the said plaintiff was convicted, together with interest upon the said sum of 10*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, at the rate of 4*l.* per centum per annum, from the 25th of January, A.D. 1848, on which day judgment aforesaid was entered up, and have you there this writ; and it is granted to him, &c. Afterwards, to wit, on the 9th day of February, A.D. 1848, before the said Justices at Westminster, comes the defendant, by his attorney aforesaid, and the sheriff, to wit, William Cubitt and Charles Hill, sheriff of the county aforesaid, returns to the said Justices that the plaintiff is not found in his bailliwick. Whereupon the defendant prays another writ of the said Lady the Queen of capias ad satisfaciendum, to be directed to the sheriff of Surrey, commanding him in form aforesaid. And it is granted to him returnable before the Justices at Westminster, immediately after the execution thereof."

Upon this record it was assigned for error, that this action was commenced, that the said judgment was given, and the said writs of capias ad satisfaciendum were respectively awarded subsequent to the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96; and that since the passing of the said act, to wit, on the 9th day of August, A.D. 1844, it hath been and is contrary to law to take or charge in execution the body of any person upon any judgment obtained in any of her said Majesty's superior courts, in any action for the recovery of any debt wherein the sum recovered shall not exceed the sum of 20*l.*, exclusive of the costs recovered by such judgment; and therefore, and by the law of the land, the said writs of capias ad satisfaciendum are and each of them is illegal, oppressive, and erroneous; prayer of judgment and that the awards of execution be set aside as erroneous.

Newton, in person.—The error assigned is, that by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. s. 57, execution by ca. sa. is taken away for costs of nonsuit in actions of debt and indebitatus assumpsit. That section is as follows: "That no person shall be taken or charged in execution upon any judgment obtained in any of her Majesty's superior courts, or in any county court, court of requests, or other inferior court, in any action for the recovery of any debt wherein the sum recovered shall not exceed the sum of 20*l.*, exclusive of the costs recovered by such judgment." The origin of the writ of ca. sa. is explained in Cassidy v. Stewart (1). There Tindal, C.J. says, "The writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, except in actions of trespass vi et armis, was unknown to the common law; nor is it given by the express words of any statute: it arises by consequence of law. The Statutes of Marlbridge, 52 Hen. 3. c. 23, and of Westminster, 13 Edw. 1. c. 11, having given the writ of capias ad respondendum in actions of account, and subsequent statutes having extended it to other actions—the 25 Edw. 3.

s. 5. c. 17, to debt and detainue, and the 19 Hen. 7. c. 9. to all actions on the case—the ca. sa. was, as a necessary consequence, held to lie upon the judgment to enable the plaintiff to obtain its fruits." The ca. sa. being thus in force, when costs were given to the plaintiff by the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. 1. c. 1, the defendant would be entitled to have it under the 23 Hen. 8. c. 15; the principle of which was to give to defendants a parity of execution with plaintiffs. Then the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. s. 57. takes away the writ where the debt recovered is not above 20*l.*, exclusive of the costs, within which words this case falls, as here nothing is recovered besides costs.

The 48 Geo. 3. c. 123, in which very similar words were used, was held to apply to plaintiffs in execution for costs of nonsuit—Roylance v. Hewling (2) and Bradley v. Webb (3). Those words are "persons in execution upon any judgment, for any debt or damages not exceeding 20*l.*, exclusive of the costs recovered by such judgment."

[ALDERSON, B.—In Roylance v. Hewling the costs became a debt by the judgment.]

[COLERIDGE, J.—Does not the statute contemplate that a sum is to be recovered besides costs?]

There is another objection to the present record. The award of the second ca. sa. is bad. It is like an ordinary alias writ, whereas being into another county, there should be a testatum clause—Towers v. Newton (4). Lastly, the ca. sa. is indorsed to levy interest. A judgment for costs only is not within 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 17.

[PARKE, B.—Do not the costs become a debt; and, therefore, interest recoverable as upon any other judgment debt?]

Bramwell, for the defendant in error.—The testatum clause is certainly omitted; but at any rate this will not affect the judgment; and the Court will only quash the award of the second ca. sa. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

PARKE, B.—All the Court are agreed that the 57th section of the 7 & 8 Vict.

c. 96. does not apply, and that the writ of ca. sa. is not taken away. The true construction is, that that section only applies to cases where something is recovered for debt, and something for costs, and where the sum recovered for the debt does not exceed 20*l.* then there is no ca. sa. It has been argued, that by analogy to the 48 Geo. 3. c. 123, this section may include the costs of nonsuit. But if the costs be treated as a debt, then the amount exceeds 20*l.*, so that the ca. sa. would not even then be taken away. But we are all of opinion that it only applies to judgments for the plaintiff, partly for debt and partly for costs. The award of the ca. sa. is therefore right. As to the second process into a different county that is wrong, without some reason being assigned. The usual reason is a suggestion that the party runs up and down, and is secreting himself in the second county. But this record is silent, and the award therefore bad. The second award of process must, therefore, be annulled, and set aside; and the rest of the judgment affirmed.

June 6. } PETERSON v. DAVIS.

Practice—Jurisdiction—Application on fresh Affidavits—Local Court—Costs—Suggestion on the Roll.

*The plaintiff having recovered a verdict for less than 20*l., the defendant applied to a Judge at chambers for leave to enter a suggestion to deprive the plaintiff of costs, on the ground that the matter was within the jurisdiction of a local court. The Judge at chambers refused to grant the defendant leave, on the ground that the affidavits were insufficient. Two fresh applications at chambers were disposed of, on the ground that the matter had been previously decided:—Held, that the Court might entertain an application upon affidavits of new and material facts.

The city of London Local Court Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. lxxi., gives a concurrent jurisdiction to the superior courts "where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant:"—Held, that this means twenty miles from the place where the defendant dwells.

(5) Tinmouth v. Taylor, 10 B. & C. 114, s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. K B. 104, throws great doubt upon the correctness of Royle v. Hewling.

Held, also, that an affidavit stating that the defendant carried on business at No. 133, Fenchurch Street, in the city of London, and dwelt in the city of London, did not sufficiently shew his dwelling-place to entitle him to a suggestion on the record to deprive the plaintiff of costs. The Court, however, gave the defendant leave to suggest that the plaintiff did not live more than twenty miles from the place where the defendant carried on business.

This was an action for goods sold and delivered; and at the trial of the cause, the plaintiff obtained a verdict for 12*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*

Lush obtained a rule nisi, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why so much of the final judgment as related to costs should not be set aside, or why the plaintiff should not be restrained from taking out execution for more than the amount of the debt recovered at the trial, or why upon payment by the defendant of the taxed costs of the judgment, the judgment should not be set aside and the plaintiff should not carry in the record, and the defendant be at liberty to enter a suggestion thereon to deprive the plaintiff of his costs, the verdict having been for a sum not exceeding 20*l.*, for the recovery of which a plaint might have been entered in the sheriff's court of the city of London, pursuant to the local statute, 10 & 11 Vict. c. lxxi.

The affidavits in support of the rule contained allegations to the following effect: that the defendant is a merchant carrying on business at No. 133, Fenchurch Street, in the city of London, where the writ of summons was directed and served; that the defendant, at the time of the issuing of the writ, dwelt and carried on his business in the city of London, with which the plaintiff was well acquainted; that both parties residing within the jurisdiction of the court established within the city of London for the more easy recovery of small debts and demands, pursuant to the said act of parliament, the plaintiff ought to have entered his plaint there; that at the commencement of the suit the plaintiff did not dwell more than twenty miles from the defendant; that he dwelt at No. 33, Poultry, in the city of London; that the defendant carried on his business as a merchant within the city of London for upwards of six calendar months next before the commencement of the action, and has continued to carry on his business there; that immediately after the trial, and on the same day, the defendant took out a summons before a Judge at chambers, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why a suggestion should not be entered to deprive him of his costs, the verdict being for less than 20*l.*, or why the proceedings should not be stayed till the first four days of this term to enable the defendant to apply to enter a suggestion; that on the following day the summons was attended before Coltman, J., when it was objected, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the summons was premature, and that the application ought to have been made to the Court, and that the affidavit filed in support of the application was not sufficient, inasmuch as it did not state that the plaintiff was not an officer of the local court; that the summons was dismissed without costs, upon which the affidavit was amended, and a similar application made on a fresh summons; that the Judge refused to hear the fresh application and dismissed the summons, and another summons calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why on payment of the verdict all proceedings should not be stayed, and for the like stay of proceedings to enable the defendant to move the Court to enter a suggestion; that the plaintiff's attorney immediately afterwards proceeded to tax the costs, whereupon, on the 19th of May, and before taxation, he was served with notice of the defendant's intention to apply to the Court for the present rule.

From affidavits, in answer, filed on behalf of the plaintiff, it appeared, that on the attendance of the summons before Coltman, J., the counsel for the plaintiff before entering into the merits of the case, offered the defendant's attorney an order as to the latter part of the summons, that all further proceedings should be stayed till the fifth day of the then next term to enable the defendant to make his application, but the defendant's attorney refused to take such an order; that the final judgment was signed on the 17th of May, and the costs taxed after the summons was dismissed. It was also stated that the house 133, Fenchurch Street was divided into offices, and let out to various persons only as offices for business, and not as a place of residence; that the defendant, at the commencement of the suit, had offices in the house, but never resided there. A clerk of the plaintiff swore that before the action he had frequently called at the offices without being able to see the defendant, and generally saw a clerk who informed him that the defendant had not yet come, and that on the 1st of April, while the plaintiff's clerk was waiting to serve the defendant with the writ, he was informed by the defendant's clerk that the defendant resided out of town, and did not dwell in the city of London.

Paterson (June 6) shewed cause.—The first objection is, that the application has already been heard and determined by a Judge at chambers, and the defendant is not entitled to come to the Court upon amended affidavits, which are amended not in the title or jurat, but in respect of something in the body which might have been brought before the Judge on the previous application. The authorities shew that if an affidavit is defective in the body of it, it cannot be amended so as to form the ground of a second application—The Queen v. the Great Western Railway Company (1). In that case there was a mere misdescription in the body of the affidavit, and yet the Court held that they could not amend it. Patteson, J. said there that he was wrong in a case of Sherry v. Oke (2), where he had held otherwise. In The King v. the Sheriff of Devon (3), it was held, that the full Court of Queen's Bench would not review the decision of a Judge in the Bail Court. So also in Thompson v. Becke (4). It may perhaps be said, on the other side, that the Judge at chambers had no jurisdiction to order a suggestion to be entered under the statute, because it does not contain, as such acts usually do, a direction to apply to the Court for that purpose; but the Judge has by his common law jurisdiction power to order such a suggestion, and in this case he has assumed that he had such jurisdiction. In Sir E. Wilmot's Notes, The King v. Almon (5), the jurisdiction of a Judge in chambers is considered, and it is said that "it is still the business of the Court that is done at chambers"—see also Lush's Practice, p. 799. The next objection is, that the application comes too late. The verdict was given on the 12th of May, about half-past twelve p.m. The defendant might have gone to the court the same day (which was the last day of term), or might have applied to the vacation Judge, if he had jurisdiction. Lastly, the affidavits are insufficient on the merits. They do not shew where the defendant dwells so as to negative the concurrent jurisdiction of the superior courts under the act (6). The words of the act are indeed negated; but the meaning of the words "where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant," must be from the place where the defendant dwells, and that should have been stated.

Lush, in support of the rule.—As to the first point, whatever may be the jurisdiction of the Judge at chambers, it never has been the practice to apply to him to enter a suggestion.

[MAULE, J.—Archbold in his Practice cites Baddley v. Oliver (7) to shew that a Judge at Nisi Prius has no power to make such an entry.]

It is not usual in Court of Requests Acts to specify the manner of application. In Smith v. Temperley (8) it was held, that the application should have been made to the Court within the first four days of Michaelmas term, judgment having been signed on the 7th of August; but if there had been any power to apply to a Judge at chambers in vacation, it would have been laches not to do so. The cases that have been cited on the other side are cases where the party has come twice to the Court. Pike v. Davis (9) expressly decides, that where a Judge at chambers dismisses a summons on the merits, the party may apply to the Court on additional affidavits. The cases of Baddley v. Oliver, Bond v. Bailey (10), Heale v.

Erle (11), and Johnson v. Beale (12) shew, that after a judgment in vacation, it is sufficient to come to the Court within the first four days of the ensuing term for a suggestion. Lastly, the affidavits are sufficient. The statute does not speak of the plaintiff's distance from where the defendant dwells: it is sufficient if it is not more than twenty miles from the place where the defendant carries on his business. The 112th section of the act must be construed along with the 40th section, which provides, that a summons may issue provided the defendant or one of the defendants shall dwell or carry on his business within the city of London or the liberties thereof at the time of the action brought. Under the act of the old City Court, which had a similar jurisdiction to the present court, a person occupying half a counting-house in London was held to seek his livelihood in London, and so to be within the act—Croft v. Pitman (13).

[CRESSWELL, J.—The words of the modern act clearly refer to the dwelling of the defendant.]

At all events, as the allegations in the suggestion are held to be traversable—Watson v. Quilter (14)—the Court will not refuse to grant it.

WILDE, C.J.—Two questions have arisen in this case; one of which is, whether the defendant is precluded from making the present application by reason of prior applications to a Judge at chambers. It appears that this matter was heard at chambers and disposed of on the merits, on the ground that the affidavits were not sufficient to entitle the defendant to the suggestion which he sought. The last two applications to a Judge at chambers were not disposed of on the merits, but because the matter had before been decided on by another Judge. The question which now arises is, whether the party can come to the Court upon affidavits of new and material facts. The Court is of opinion that the party is not precluded from doing so. Considering the vast quantity of business at chambers, and that there is not time there for very deliberate judgment, it would be very inconvenient if parties were to be concluded by the Judge's decision there, and it would be a hardship if such decision could not be reviewed, or a fresh application be made upon additional facts. The defendant asks for leave to enter a suggestion to deprive the plaintiff of costs. In order to induce the Court to grant his application, he ought to shew reasonable grounds for it; and the grounds are not sufficient if he does not furnish proper information from which the facts to be suggested on the record appear. It could not be contended, that where it is necessary to shew a party's residence, it would be sufficient to say that he resided in a particular county—in the county of York, for instance. There is an equal difficulty when it is alleged that a party resided in the city of London. The affidavits, on behalf of the defendant, shew that the defendant carried on his business in Fenchurch Street, and dwelt in the city of London. That does not furnish sufficient means of inquiry as to the residence. In every case like the present the affidavit should be such as to furnish fair information as to the residence, by stating the place of residence, or giving distinct means of inquiry. It appears to me that the defendant has not sufficiently shewn that he dwells in the city of London, so as to entitle him to the suggestion for which he applies. I think he is entitled to a suggestion that the plaintiff did not at the commencement of the suit live more than twenty miles from the place where the defendant carried on his business in the city of London; and the rule will be made absolute to set aside the judgment, and to enter a suggestion in those terms on payment of the costs of the judgment.

It was proved that a signed bill had been delivered to another member of the same committee at his place of business, and that the defendant was ap-* pointed a committeeman after part of the work had been done:—Held, not such a delivery within the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. as to render the defendant liable in this action. The bill should be delivered either at the office of the company, or at least to some person who can reasonably be considered to represent the committee.

Debt for work and labour done as attorney in respect of a railway project to be brought before parliament; for money paid; and on an account stated.

Third plea, except as to the account stated, that the action was brought after the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 73, and that the plaintiffs did not one calendar month before the commencement of the suit, deliver unto the defendant (he being the party to be charged therewith) or send by post to or leave for him at his counting-house, office of business, dwelling-house, or last known place of abode, or at either of such places, any signed bill in compliance with section 37. of that act.

Replication, that the plaintiffs did one calendar month before action deliver unto the defendant a signed bill in compliance with the said statute. Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Rolfe, B. at the Leicester Summer Assizes, 1847, it appeared that this action was brought against the defendant as a member of the provisional committee of the Great Manchester, Rugby and Southampton Railway Company; that the signed bill was delivered to one Moore (another member of that committee) at his place of business in Wood Street, Cheapside, and that the defendant was appointed a committee-man after a portion of the business, in respect of which the action was brought, had been performed, and retired from that office before some of the latter charges in the bill had been incurred. A verdict was found for the plaintiff for 492l. 10s.; and leave was reserved for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

Whitchurst had obtained a rule accordingly on the ground (amongst others) that there was no delivery of a signed bill to the defendant. [The arguments on the other points are omitted, as the judgment of the Court was confined entirely to the point reported.]

Humfrey and Phipson shewed cause.—The bill was made out and headed to the provisional committee. It was delivered personally to Moore, one of the committee. This is equivalent to personal delivery to one of two joint contractors, and therefore sufficient as against the other, or to both, or at their joint office of business within the language of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 37. The witness said, "I delivered a duplicate of this bill to Mr. Moore, in Wood Street, Cheap-side, his place of business:" that is a delivery of a bill against the provisional committee to one of the members at his place of business.

[WILDE, C.J.—Part of this business was done before the defendant joined the committee.]

[CRENSWELL, J.—Suppose a bill made out to Thompson & Co. (who as a firm are not liable) and delivered to Williams, a partner. It turns out that Williams and a third party, Johnson, are liable. Is Johnson bound by this delivery?]

Suppose a bill made out to the Equitable Company and delivered to A, a director, B. and C, co-directors, would be liable.

[CRENSWELL, J.—But the provisional committee are not the contracting parties. The managing committee are the contractors.]

There is no evidence to shew that the provisional committee are not liable.

[CRENSWELL, J.—I think there is some evidence. Prima facie they are not liable.]

The heading the bill to the provisional committee will not vitiate the bill, or its delivery to parties to be charged therewith.

[WILDE, C.J.—Is the defendant charged therewith if not mentioned nominatim, or as a partner in a firm which is liable?]

In Manning v. Glynn (1), where the bill was not addressed to any one, the words were "chargeable thereby." Crowder v. Shee (2), Finchett v. How (3), and Vincent v. Slaymaker (4), shew this delivery to have been sufficient, and Taylor v. Hodgson (5) decides that a letter accompanying a bill of costs may be referred to, to shew who is the party chargeable therewith. Suppose a bill made out to A, B, C, and D, nominatim, of whom three only are liable. Delivery to one of those three would be good as against him and the other two, notwithstanding the fourth is not liable. Thus, assuming there was a delivery to the provisional committee, which comprises all the members of the managing committee, is not that a good delivery to the latter body? Again, this bill has been taxed.

[WILDE, C.J.—Not by the defendant. Could he have taxed it here?]

That will depend on the question whether he was a co-contractor with Moore.

Whitehurst, contra (Keane with him).—This is not such a delivery as is required by the statute, or as will support the issue in its present form. The plaintiff's replication avers a delivery to the defendant. The statute provides several modes of delivery, all of which are material.

[WILLIAMS, J.—You must negative all the statutable modes of delivery.]

(He was then stopped by the Court.)

WILDE, C.J.—The Court are of opinion that, under the particular circumstances of this case, there was no sufficient delivery of the bill. This must not be looked on as an ordinary case of co-contractors, as the present concern is one of a particular nature. The parties came into it at different times. Moore joined prior to the defendant, and there are many and heavy items in the bill respecting work done as well before as after the defendant was a member of the committee. Now, what was the relation of Moore to the defendant? It must be borne in mind that this bill was not delivered to the provisional committee at their known place of business, but to Moore at his place of business. Without expressing an opinion as to how far in general a delivery to one of several is equivalent to a delivery to all the co-contractors; but looking at the defendant as a member of the managing committee, the Court are of opinion that the relative position of its members is of such a particular nature that this delivery cannot bind such of them as might be partially liable for a portion of the bill. This bill ought to have been delivered either at the office of the company, or, at least, to some person who can reasonably be considered as representing the committee.

COLTMAN, J.—There is a clear distinction between the case of provisional committeemen and the connexion generis.

*The declaration was in debt on a bond given by the defendants and L. for 8,000*l.* to be paid by them to the plaintiffs, or Everett, on request, whereby and by reason of the non-payment, &c. The defendants by their plea craved oyer and set out the bond and condition and recitals. The condition was that the defendants and L. should pay over sums of money assessed and collected by L. and that L. should demand the sums assessed and proceed against defaulters. Averment, that the defendants performed all things on their part to be performed.*

The plaintiffs replied praying that the deed and condition might be inrolled, and being set out on inrolment, demurred, on the ground, that they were falsely set out by the defendants on account of the recitals being introduced, and that the plea of general performance was bad:—Held, first, that it was not necessary to state a request in the declaration. Secondly, that the allegation "by reason of the non-payment," &c. was a sufficient denial of payment to the plaintiffs or Everett, after plea. Thirdly, that the plea was bad for not shewing performance by L. as well as by the defendants. Fourthly, that the plea was bad for averring general performance, instead of shewing what was done in performance of the condition.

Semble—First, that it is not the practice to demur for misrecital on oyer. Secondly, that the effect of the inrolment is to make the matter set out part of the declaration.

Which being read and heard, the said defendants say, that they, the said defendants, did from time to time and at all times after the making of the said writing obligatory and the said condition thereof well and truly observe, perform, fulfil, and keep all and singular the articles, clauses, payments, conditions and agreements in the said condition of the said writing obligatory specified, comprised, and mentioned in all things therein contained on their part and behalf to be observed, performed, fulfilled and kept according to the tenour and effect, true intent and meaning, of the said condition of the said writing obligatory. Verification.

The plaintiffs, as to the plea of the defendants, replied that the defendants had not truly set out the said writing obligatory and the condition thereto, and prayed that they might be inrolled ; which being done, and the bond and condition set out in the same words as in the plea, the plaintiffs demurred on the grounds that the plea sets out the recitals to the condition as if they were part of the writing obligatory itself, and that it is uncertain whether the defendants intend to allege that those recitals form part of the deed or part of the condition, or that they do not form part of either, but are mere averments ; and also that the general mode of pleading performance is insufficient, and the plea should have shewn that the defendants and Lee, or some or one and which of them, did pay all sums assessed and collected for the year ending the 5th of April 1847, and did duly demand the sums assessed, and did duly enforce the powers of the act against defaulters.

Needham (Channell, Serj. was with him), (June 9th,) in support of the demurrer.—The defendants, upon oyer, have mis-recited the deed ; and in such a case the plaintiff is entitled either to sign judgment as for want of a plea, or to pray in his replication, as he has done here, that the deed may be inrolled, and procure it to be inrolled, and then demur—Com. Dig. 'Pleader,' P. 1, 1 Wms. Saunders, 9, c. Wallace v. the Duchess of Cumberland (1) and Ferguson v. Mackreth (2).

[WILDE, C.J.—The Court would quash such a plea for irregularity. In Ferguson v. Mackreth, although the plaintiff demurred after the enrolment, the Court did not act upon the demurrer, but made a rule for quashing the pleadings of the defendant.]

[CRESSWELL, J.—The case of Smith v. Yeomans (3) throws some light on the question. In a note to that case it is said that a party is not bound in all cases to set out the whole of the condition. But if the defendant by his mode of setting out a bond has placed the plaintiff in a different position from that which he would otherwise be in, that cannot be said to be good.]

[MAULE, J.—If Ferguson v. Mackreth be looked at closely, it would appear that the Court thought they could not deal with the case on demurrer. But you say, that if this is a matter of practice, you may waive your right to strike out the plea, and may demur. You would have been entitled to say that, if the plea had set out the bond rightly, yet contained no answer to the declaration.]

[CRESSWELL, J.—You say, that on the defendants cravingoyer, the condition which is improperly stated becomes a part of the declaration. But then you get the true condition inrolled, and that becomes part of the declaration, and then the plea is good.]

[MAULE, J.—The proceeding is this. The bond is supposed to be produced in sight of the Court. The defendants say that it is read in its words. The officer reads it, and then it is the defendants' business to set out the contents. You say that the allegation by the defendants, that it is read in these words is false, and you pray that the Court may set them out. The bond is still the same as in the declaration.]

[WILDE, C.J.—The Court will allow you to withdraw your demurrer. It is not the practice to demur. It leads to unnecessary delay and expense.]

But the plea is bad in other respects. It is calculated to embarrass the plaintiffs, a portion of it being false and not traversable.

[MAULE, J.—You must take the inrolled condition as part of the declaration. The inrolment puts an end to the erroneous averment.]

The substantial objection is, that whereas the condition is for the performance by the defendants and Lee of certain matters, and by Lee himself of other matters, the plea is one of performance by the defendants. They aver that they have done their part, but not that Lee has done his. Besides, a plea of general performance is not sufficient when the condition is to do several things—Com. Dig. tit. 'Pleader,' 2, W, 33, Wimbleton v. Holdrip (4), Woodcock v. Cole (5).

(4) 1 Lev. 303.

(5) 1 Sider. 215.

Ogle, contra.—The general form of pleading performance is quite sufficient. Can it be said that if it was the duty of the collector to collect and pay over ten thousand different sums of money, the collecting and payment of those sums should have been set out? The argument for the plaintiffs goes to that extent. Those facts were more within the knowledge of the plaintiffs than of the defendants. At all events the declaration is bad. The breach here does not agree with the condition. The condition was to pay to the plaintiffs or Everett, and the breach is that the defendants have not paid to the plaintiffs. They may, consistently with this, have paid to Everett. When a contract is to do one of two things in the alternative, the breach should shew that the defendant has done neither. Thus, where the defendant undertook to return a horse in good plight, or pay so much money, and the breach was that he did not return the horse, the declaration was held bad—Wright v. Johnson (6). So also it was held that if a person promised to indemnify the plaintiff, or pay him 1,000*l.*, the declaration should shew that he had done neither—Gibbons v. Northcott (7). See also Com. Dig. tit. 'Pleader,' C, 44, 45. In the next place, the bond declared on was stated to be payable on request, and no request is averred. The request was a condition precedent to the payment. The case of a deed differs from that of a bill of exchange, in which the action is a sufficient request—Carter v. Ring (8), Nicholl v. Bromley (9), Simpson v. Sikes (10).

Needham, in reply.

WILDE, C.J.—The declaration is free from any objection. It is in the common approved form. It states that the bond was given for the payment of money on request, and it is not necessary to state, as it has been argued, that a request of payment was made. The plea consists of two parts,—the condition that the defendants should pay, and that Lee should do certain duties. The performance by the sureties would not be a performance under the bond. The sureties have contented themselves with saying that they have performed the condition on their part, but not that Lee has done what he was bound to do. It is said that it was not necessary for them to plead more, because the plaintiffs have more cognizance of the facts. But the defendants did not require to set out the particular sums received; and it would have been enough to state that Lee paid over all the sums which he had received. It appears to me that the declaration is good, and the plea insufficient; and, therefore, that there should be judgment for the plaintiffs.

COLTMAN, J.—It is not necessary to decide whether the party has set out truly what he intended to set out on oyer. I am rather disposed to think that the effect of setting out the deed on the inrolment is merely to substitute it for the other, and shew what is really the true document. I think the plea is clearly bad in substance, on the grounds pointed out by my Lord, and that the declaration is good.

MAULE, J.—I also am of opinion that the judgment should be for the plaintiffs. The defendants have set out as parcel of the bond something which is no part of it. In such a case the plaintiffs may choose to have the accurate instrument set out, so that the Court may see the true statement of that of which a false statement has been set out by the defendants. It is not necessary to consider the remedy under such circumstances; but the cases shew that there is a remedy in practice. As to the question on the pleadings, it is said that the declaration is bad, because the penalty of the bond being payable to the plaintiffs or to Everett, it ought to have negatived payment to the plaintiffs or to Everett. But it does so, for it says, "whereby and by reason of the non-payment, &c. an action hath accrued." That is a sufficient denial after plea. As to the declaration not stating a request, the old forms contain a statement that the money was payable on request, but never set out a request. The request here was not a condition precedent. Then comes the question on the plea, and it seems to me that the plea is bad in substance, for not shewing that everything had been done which was necessary to satisfy the condition. The form is objectionable. It should not have stated that the defendants had performed the condition—that being only an argumentative allegation—but should have shewn what they had done. But supposing that objection to be waived, yet there is this substantial matter left out. The condition was that Lee should pay the money received, and proceed against the defaulters; and the plea should have shewn that he had done so. The terms of the condition are, that Lee shall demand the sums assessed, and proceed against defaulters; and that Lee and the defendants shall pay the money over. It does not say they shall pay all the sums of money which may be assessed and collected, but which may be assessed and to be collected. I cannot think that this means that they were to pay all the money assessed, and that it was to be collected by Lee. But if these words were to have that force, and the general averment was to be taken to mean that the defendants had paid all that was to be collected, the plea was still open to the objection of form, that it averred general performance, instead of shewing what had been done in performance of the condition.

A rule nisi having been obtained for a nonsuit:—Held, first, that the consideration, as it originally stood, was sufficient to support the promise; secondly, that the Judge at Nisi Prius had power to make the amendment; and that it is not a sufficient objection to prevent a Judge from amending a declaration, that he would thereby deprive the defendant of the means of moving in arrest of judgment.

Assumpsit for breach of promise of marriage. The declaration stated, that whereas heretofore and before and at the time of the making of the promise of the defendant next hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on &c., the plaintiff was sole and unmarried, and resided at parts beyond the seas, to wit, at Toronto, in America, and thereupon, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, "in consideration that the plaintiff so then being sole and unmarried as aforesaid, at the request of the defendant, would go to Lisahoppin, in the county of Tyrone, in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland, for the purpose of marrying him, the defendant," he, the defendant, then promised the plaintiff to marry her, the plaintiff, in a reasonable time after her arrival at Lisahoppin aforesaid. And the plaintiff avers that she, confiding in the said promise of the defendant, in a reasonable time in that behalf after the making of the said promise, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, did, at the request of the defendant, go to and arrive at Lisahoppin aforesaid, in the county of Tyrone aforesaid, in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland, for the purpose of marrying the defendant, of all which the defendant then in a reasonable time in that behalf afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, had due notice; and although the plaintiff, after the making of the said promise, from the time of her said arrival at Lisahoppin aforesaid, till the expiration of a reasonable time next after her said arrival at Lisahoppin aforesaid, for the defendant to marry the plaintiff, was and continued to be sole and unmarried, and ready and willing to marry him the defendant, of which last-mentioned premises respectively the defendant also, to wit, during all such last-mentioned time, then had due notice, and although a reasonable time in that behalf after the arrival of the plaintiff at Lisahoppin as aforesaid for the defendant to marry the plaintiff had elapsed before the commencement of this suit, yet the defendant, not regarding his said promise, did not nor would in a reasonable time after the arrival of the plaintiff at Lisahoppin as aforesaid, or at any time before or afterwards, marry the plaintiff, but wholly neglected and refused so to do. By reason whereof, &c. (special damage).

Pleas—Non assumpsit, and several special pleas.

At the trial, before Wilde, C.J., at the Hampshire Summer Assizes, 1847, the counsel for the defendant applied for a nonsuit, on the grounds, first, that the evidence did not shew an acceptance by the plaintiff of the defendant's offer of marriage; and secondly, that the consideration for the promise was not sufficiently alleged in the declaration. The plaintiff's counsel contended that the declaration was sufficient, but applied for leave to amend, which was granted. A verdict was found for the plaintiff for 400*l.* damages, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

The declaration was afterwards amended by altering the consideration thus: "In consideration that the plaintiff, so then being sole and unmarried as aforesaid, at the request of the defendant, then promised the defendant to marry him, and would go to Lisahoppin, in the county of Tyrone, &c., for the purpose of marrying him the defendant, and would within a reasonable time of her arrival there marry the defendant, he, the defendant, promised," &c.

judgment. In Goldshede v. Swan (1), where the declaration stated an executory consideration for a guarantie, and the guarantie produced in evidence was ambiguous as to the consideration on the face of it, the Court held that the declaration might have been amended if it had been necessary. In Duckworth v. Harrison (2) the declaration was on an agreement of reference, and omitted to state a provision as to costs, which the agreement on its production was found to contain, and the Court held that this was a variance which would have been fatal but for the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 4. s. 23, and that the declaration might be amended under that statute. It is said, on the other side, that the consideration for a promise laid in a declaration cannot be amended under the statute; but there is no case in which that doctrine has been laid down. The statute is in general terms, and the object of it is to prevent a party from being defeated by reason of a variance which could not alter the conduct of the other party's case. But supposing the Judge at Nisi Prius had no power to amend, the next question is, whether the declaration, as it originally stood, was bad on motion in arrest of judgment. It is contended, on behalf of the defendant, that in order to constitute a good contract to marry, there must be reciprocal promises to marry, and that in this respect such a contract differs from others. In most cases of this sort reciprocal promises do exist; but why should not another consideration be sufficient to support a promise of marriage? In this case the defendant said, "If you will come from America for the purpose of marrying, and you are ready to do so, I will marry you;" and the plaintiff says she has done so in the spirit and terms of the communication. Contracts, according to the Roman and French law, are divided into synallagmatic or bilateral, and unilateral. There are many instances of unilateral contracts in our law. Thus a guarantie was held binding on the defendant, although it created no obligation on the part of the plaintiffs — Kennaway v. Treleavan (3).

(3) 5 Moo. & Wels. 408; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 20.

So forbearance by the assignee of a bond to sue the obligors is a good consideration for a promise by the obligors to pay at a certain time, although if the assignee sued in the obligee's name, the promise to forbear would be no answer — Mortin v. Burn (4); and see the notes in Forth v. Stanton (5), Barber v. Fox (6), and Mills v. Blackall (7). There is another class of cases in which the contract is unilateral, where a reward is claimed for the apprehension of a felon, as in England v. Davidson (8).

[MAULE, J.—There is the common case of master and servant, where the servant is bound to obey his master's lawful commands; the master is not bound to give him lawful commands.]

In Holt v. Ward Clarencieux (9) it was held that an infant might sue on a contract of marriage, although the other party could not enforce the contract. Bonds to marry or pay a sum of money have been held binding, although there was no mutuality — Atkins v. Farr (10) and Cock v. Richards (11). Probably the notion that promises of marriage must be reciprocal has arisen from the dicta in the Roman law, and the French law taken thence. The Digest, lib. xxiii. tit. 1, says, "Sponsalia sunt nuptio et repromissio nuptiarum futurarum;" but that refers to the ceremony of "sponsalia," or betrothal: a solemn act by the consent of the parties, not a mere promise to marry on a future occasion. For these reasons, it is submitted that the declaration was good as it stood originally; but if bad in arrest of judgment, that it was amendable, and that the amendment made was within the power of the Judge under the 3 & 4 tionally to meet the particular case—Bye v. Bower (12), Bowers v. Nixon (13). In Atkinson v. Raleigh (14), Lord Denman said that the object of the statute was “to prevent nonsuits on variances, and not to make pleadings good which are vicious in themselves.” In the same case Patteson, J. says, “the only effect of the amendment (there) would have been to prevent a motion in arrest of judgment. I doubt whether an amendment could have been made for this purpose at the trial.”

[CRESSWELL, J.—The ground for asking the amendment in that case failed. It was not sought for on the ground of variance.]

[MAULE, J.—Supposing there is a variance, is it an answer to an application for an amendment, that it would make a good pleading bad?]

That was decided latterly in the case of Laves v. Brown (15). The declaration, when amended, stated the promise in the usual form, the sufficiency of which was established in Harrison v. Cage (16).

[CRESSWELL, J.—Do you mean to say that there can be no consideration for a promise of marriage, except another promise to marry?]

There is none other mentioned in the books.

[MAULE, J.—If it were necessary to have a previous promise for a consideration, then that previous promise would be void for want of a previous one to support it, and thus no such transaction could take place.]

WILDER, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule for the nonsuit must be discharged. The first ground, in support of the rule, is, that the declaration was amended at Nisi Prius, without authority, the amendment being made in a part of the declaration material to the merits of the case. The meaning of the words in the statute “material to the merits of the case” has been so often considered as to render it unnecessary to say much about it at present. I take it they are something material to the real substantial question raised by the parties on the record in the case. Here the real question is, whether the defendant promised to marry, and whether there was a breach of that promise. The precise mode of laying the promise, or the consideration for the promise, does not seem to me to be material to the merits of the case. The doubt existing in my mind at Nisi Prius has since been removed, namely, whether if the declaration were open, as it at first stood, to a motion in arrest of judgment, that would affect the power of amendment. I thought it no part of my duty to consider what might be the consequential effect of my decision at Nisi Prius; and, therefore, I thought it right to make the amendment. Since the trial, this point has been considered by the Court—whether it is any objection to the power of amendment proper in all other respects, that when made it would have the effect of removing a ground for arresting the judgment. The party may, if he likes, reserve the ground of objection in arrest of judgment, by forbearing to move for a nonsuit on the ground of variance. It appears to me that the amendment asked for here did not affect the merits of the case properly so considered.

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

MAULE, J.—I also think that this was a proper case for amendment. The declaration, as it originally stood, stated a promise of marriage; and the question whether that promise was made constituted the merits of the case. The consideration stated originally seems to me quite sufficient, that is, the consideration that the plaintiff would go from Toronto to Lisahoppin, for the purpose of marrying the defendant. It was suggested that there was a variance between that statement and the consideration proved, which was that the plaintiff would go to Lisahoppin and would marry the defendant. That is a difference which nobody but a special pleader could appreciate. There is probably not one witness in a hundred who could understand the distinction. I therefore think that the amendment was properly made.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the amendment was properly made. The only objection to it which I could understand was, that it might deprive the defendant of the means of moving in arrest of judgment; and that objection

May 29. } CORDER v. THE UNIVERSAL GAS LIGHT COMPANY.

Joint-Stock Companies Act—Execution against Shareholder—Notice—7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 68.

The plaintiff obtained judgment against a joint-stock company, and being unable to obtain satisfaction of his judgment against the property of the company, gave notice to a shareholder that application would be made to the Court or a Judge for leave to issue execution against him on the judgment. A summons for that purpose was taken out and dismissed, before a Judge at chambers; and on application by the plaintiff to this Court, —Held, that the notice was exhausted by the application to a Judge at chambers, and that no second application could be made on the same notice.

Judgment in an action commenced in this court had been signed against the Universal Gas Company, for the sum of 110*l.* and costs. There were no assets of the company to satisfy the amount, and the notice set out below having been served upon Dominique Causse one of the parties named therein, an application to issue execution against him was made before Parke, B., at chambers, who decided, that under the 68th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, he had no power to adjudicate upon the matter.

“Whereas a judgment was obtained on the 3rd day of February inst., in Her Majesty’s Court of Common Pleas, for the sum of 110*l.* damages and 10*s.* 2*d.* costs, in a certain action brought by the above-named plaintiff against the above-named defendants, being a company completely registered under an act made and passed in the 7th and 8th year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled ‘An act for the registration, incorporation and regulation of Joint-Stock Companies;’ and whereas the said plaintiff hath used due diligence to obtain satisfaction of the said judgment against the property and effects of the said company, but there is not any property nor are there any effects of the said company out of which the said judgment, or any part thereof, can be satisfied. And whereas you, Edmund Boulter, James Shayler, Joseph Field, Dominique Causse, Joseph Replow, Edward Suter, Henry Alt, and Anthony Kent, some or one of you, were respectively shareholders or a shareholder in the said company, at the time when the contract or engagement with the above-named plaintiff, for which the said judgment was obtained, was entered into, or became shareholders or a shareholder during the time the said contract or engagement remained unexecuted or unsatisfied, or were respectively shareholders or a shareholder at the time the said judgment was obtained. Now, we do hereby give you notice, that upon the expiration of ten days from the date of the service of this notice upon you, some or one of you, or as soon after the expiration thereof as conveniently may be, a motion will be made in Her Majesty’s Court of Common Pleas, or an application to one of the Judges thereof, for a rule or summons, calling upon you, some or one of you, to shew cause why execution should not issue against you, some or one of you, upon the same judgment, until the same shall be satisfied. Dated this 8th day of February 1848.

To (the parties above named).

Phipson had obtained a rule calling upon Dominique Causse to shew cause why execution should not issue against him.

Talfourd, Serj. shewed cause. — This notice is objectionable in every respect. A notice such as this should be addressed to the party, and should state the character in which he is sought to be charged; for instance, whether as a present or former shareholder. It should define the nature of the application, and the time, and the place when and where it is to be made: here the notice throughout is in the alternative, and therefore the person, the character, the time and the place are uncertain. Secondly, it appears on the affidavits now produced, that after the service of this notice, a summons was taken out before a Judge at chambers, against Causse and another shareholder, who appeared thereon, and the summons was dismissed. It is submitted that that summons exhausted the notice, and then no notice has been given of this application, as required by the 68th section of the Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act.

[MAULE, J.—No notice is required of an application for a summons at chambers.]

That may be so in ordinary cases, but not under this particular statute; and as this notice points out the application to chambers as the proposed object, the notice has been acted on and satisfied. Lastly, the form of the application is wrong, it should have been to set aside or vary the order of the Judge at chambers, under the 68th section of the act, whereas it is here made as an original application. By the 68th section, costs may be given to either party, as the Court shall think fit; and it is submitted, that under these circumstances, the rule should be discharged, with costs.

Phipson, in support of the rule.—By the 66th section of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, three classes of shareholders may be proceeded against; and by the 68th section, notice is required to be given before execution can be applied for against any of them, for a debt due from the company. A sufficient notice has here been given to Dominique Causse. The 3rd section of the act defines what a shareholder is; and as the party served with a notice must know to which class of shareholders he belongs, it is not necessary to specify the class in the notice. A plaintiff cannot tell exactly who are shareholders, nor to which class of shareholders any individual shareholder belongs, and as the notice would fail if a shareholder were described as of a class to which he did not belong, a judgment creditor is warranted in adopting as general a form of notice as possible. The intention of the act is, that the party sought to be charged should not be surprised; and if he gets a notice the whole object of the act is accomplished.

[CRESSWELL, J.—If two magistrates act jointly, and a notice of action were given thus: "I shall bring an action against you, or one of you," would that suffice?]

It is submitted that it would, if the notice went on to specify the cause of action, which the act requiring notice to be given to magistrates specially requires.

[WILDE, C.J.—If you give notice to twenty persons, and apply only against one, how are the others to get their costs?]

None are incurred till the summons is taken out. The party served with a notice need do nothing till the rule nisi is granted. Lastly, the notice was not exhausted by the application before Parke, B., when the summons was dismissed. The 68th section of the act directs, that execution shall issue by leave of a Judge of the court in which the action was originally brought; it is therefore clear the learned Judge had no authority to entertain the question: this is, therefore, the first application in which the interest of Dominique Causse could be jeopardized; the former was an application coram non iudice, and therefore in reality no application at all. The notice is not to be construed as strictly as a contract; as for instance, to go to Rome or Marseilles, in which a party could not be compelled to go to both places; but the obvious meaning of the notice is, "I shall apply to a Judge or to the Court," i. e. to either or both, so as to be enabled to issue execution against you.

WILDE, C.J.—The last point is decisive against this rule. The legislature has thought fit to enact, that before application is made to issue execution on final process against a person who was not primarily liable thereto, such person should have ten days' notice, and has given the applicant power to go to the Court or before a Judge. This notice informs a party that an application for leave to issue execution will be made to the Court or a Judge; and accordingly, a summons is issued, the parties attend before a Judge at chambers, and he dismisses the summons. Now this comes before us as an original application, but there is no notice to support it, for the only notice given has been acted upon, and its efficiency was exhausted after an application was made to a Judge, and the summons was dismissed. If a new step were to be taken, I think a fresh notice was necessary.

COLTMAN, J.—I give no opinion as to whether a fresh notice may or may not be given so as to bring a person before the Court a second time, under circumstances similar to those now before us. I think that this notice was spent by the application at chambers, and that the rule should be discharged.

MAULE, J. and CRESSWELL, J. concurred.
Rule discharged, with costs.

In a declaration against a public officer of an insurance and loan company, the second count stated that it was agreed between the company and the plaintiff that from the 1st of January then next the plaintiff, as the attorney of the said company, should receive a salary of 100l. per annum, in lieu of rendering an annual bill of costs for general business, &c.; and in consideration that the plaintiff had promised to fulfil the agreement on his part, the company promised to fulfil the same on their part, and to retain and employ the plaintiff as such attorney. Breach, that the company refused to employ the plaintiff as such attorney, and wrongfully dismissed him, and thence refused to employ him or to pay him the salary:— Held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, that such count was good upon motion in arrest of judgment, and that the agreement therein set forth was one which created the relation of attorney and client, and amounted to a promise, on the part of the defendants, to continue that relation at least for one year.

Error from the Court of Common Pleas.

This was an action brought by a solicitor against the secretary for the time being of the Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Trust and Annuity Company, for refusing to employ him as their permanent attorney and solicitor. The second count of the declaration was as follows:—

And whereas also afterwards, to wit, on the 30th day of November 1844, it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and the said company, that from the 1st day of January then next the plaintiff, as the attorney of the said company, should receive and accept a salary of 100l. per annum, in lieu of rendering an annual bill of costs for the general business transacted by the plaintiff for the said company as such attorney, and should and would, for such salary of 100l. per annum, advise and act for the said company on all occasions, in all matters connected with the said company (the prosecuting or defending of suits, the preparation of bonds or other securities for advances by the said company, and monies disbursed by the plaintiff, being excepted; and the plaintiff being allowed in respect of such matters to make the usual and regular charges of an attorney), and that the plaintiff should attend the secretary of the said company as well as the board of directors thereof, and the meetings of the proprietors thereof, when required. And the said agreement being so made, afterwards, to wit, on the said 30th day of November, in consideration that the plaintiff had, at the request of the company, promised the company to perform and fulfil the same in all things on his part, the said company promised the plaintiff to perform and fulfil the same in all things on their part, and to retain and employ him as such attorney of the company on the terms aforesaid. And although the company did for a certain small space of time thereafter, to wit, for the space of four months, in pursuance and fulfilment of the said agreement and of their promise in that behalf, retain and employ the plaintiff as such attorney, on the terms aforesaid, and did pay him a small part of the said salary, to wit, 50l., and although the plaintiff was at all times from the making of the said agreement hitherto ready and willing to advise and act for the said company, and accept the said salary on the terms aforesaid, and in all other respects to fulfil the said agreement on his part, of which the said company always had notice, yet the company, disregarding the said agreement and their promise, did not nor would continue to employ the said plaintiff as such attorney of the company on the terms aforesaid, but on the contrary thereof, afterwards and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 25th day of May 1845, wrongfully and without any reasonable cause dismissed and discharged the plaintiff from such employment and retainer, and then and from thence hitherto have wholly refused to retain or employ him as such attorney of the company, or to pay him the salary aforesaid, by reason of which last-mentioned premises the plaintiff has wholly lost and been deprived entirely of the said salary of 100l., and also of divers great gains and profits which he might and otherwise would have derived from such employment in and about the prosecuting and defending of divers suits respectively brought by and against the said company, and in and about the preparing of divers bonds, contracts and securities for the said company and otherwise, to wit, to the amount of 5,000*l.*, and has been and is in other respects greatly injured and damaged.

Pleas as to the second count—First, non assumpsit; secondly, a justification of the dismissal.

At the trial, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages upon the second count at 200*l.*

A rule nisi was afterwards obtained arresting the judgment upon the second count, which rule was made absolute in Trinity term, 1847 (1). Upon this judgment of the Court of Common Pleas the present writ of error had been brought.

Hoggins, for the plaintiff (Nov. 30, 1847), argued that the agreement set forth in the second count proved a good consideration for the promise therein alleged on the part of the defendant, and cited the following authorities:—

The judgment of the Court (2) was now (May 15) delivered by—

PARKE, B.—In this case the plaintiff obtained a verdict on all the pleas to the second count, and had a verdict against him on the first and third counts. The Court of Common Pleas, on a motion in arrest of judgment, held the second count to be bad, and arrested the judgment. The question on this writ of error is, whether that decision was right. We have felt considerable doubt on this question, but after much consideration, we think that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas is wrong, and ought to be reversed. The second count was as follows:—[His Lordship here read the second count and then proceeded] According to the current of legal authorities, beginning with Hopkins v. Logan and ending with Roscorla v. Thomas, when the consideration is past and executed, it will support only such a promise as the law will imply from the executed consideration. The count in question is upon mutual promises to perform the agreement therein stated, and the promise of the plaintiff, which is the consideration for that of the defendant, is alleged to be past when the defendant's promise was made, and is therefore classed with an executed consideration. But, whether the promise had been stated as past, contemporary or future, we apprehend that the question with respect to the defendant's promise would be the same, namely, what is the promise which is expressed in or to be implied from the agreement? The consideration of the agreement determines the nature of the promise. What then is the promise of the defendant to be inferred from the agreement according to the true construction of it? It is, undoubtedly, to perform everything therein contained on his part to be performed. If to "retain and employ" the plaintiff as attorney and solicitor is a thing "to be performed" by the defendant, according to the true construction of the agreement, it is no objection, at least on general demurrer, that the promise to "retain and employ" is added to the promise to perform everything; it is only a redundant expression; no more. Now, in considering this agreement, it is to be borne in mind that the word "agreed" is the word of both, as was held in the case of Portage v. Cole (3), where it was decided that an agreement between two parties, in an instrument under the seals of both, that one should give the other a sum of money for certain of his lands, amounted to a covenant by the vendor to convey, as well as by the vendee to pay. In the present case, where it is said "it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that from the 1st of January then next the plaintiff, as the attorney and solicitor of the company, should receive and accept a salary of 100*l.* per annum, in lieu of rendering an annual bill of costs," as there is on the part of the plaintiff a promise to accept, so there is, undoubtedly, a corresponding promise by the defendant to pay a salary for a year, not at the rate of an annual salary, but a sum of 100*l.* for one year. The agreement goes on to state that for this annual salary the plaintiff should advise and act for the said company in all matters connected with it, with certain exceptions to be otherwise paid for, and would attend the secretary and directors when required. This provision binds the plaintiff to give his services when required; it does not bind the directors to require them on any particular occasion, or to the exclusion of every other person. What, then, is the effect of an agreement to give a certain salary, for one year at least, to a person who engages for it to give his services, if required? We think that this creates the relation of attorney and client, and amounts to a promise to continue that relation at least for a year. "To retain," according to Johnson's Dictionary and Webster's Dictionary, is "to keep in pay," or "to hire." It cannot be doubted that this is an agreement to "keep in pay" and "to hire." We think, therefore, that it implies a promise to retain. Does it also imply a promise to "employ"? This is a matter which appears to us much more doubtful than the other. It depends upon the meaning of the term "employ." If that term means that the company shall be bound to furnish him with business as an attorney and solicitor at all events, or to require his advice or use his services as attorney or solicitor whenever they have occasion to require the services of an attorney or solicitor, we think it is clear there is no such promise on their parts. To hold there was a promise to the former effect would be to hold that they must be bound to incur expense as well as to create occasion for legal advice,—a difficulty similar to that which was pointed out by Lord Denman in the case of Aspdin v. Austin, hereafter referred to, as an objection to the inference in that case of a covenant to employ in a particular trade. But if the word "employ" means only to engage in his service (for the meaning of that term see Webster's Dictionary), then there appears to us to be a promise to that effect. Many cases of employment may be suggested in different capacities where the use of actual service is optional or conditional, and yet the employment may be said to take place contingently. Medical advisers may be employed at a salary to be ready in case of illness; members of theatrical establishments in case their labours should be needed; household servants in performance of their duty when their masters wish; in these and other similar cases the requirement of actual service is distinct from the employment by the party employing. These are instances of the use of the term "employ" in the sense of engaging for a service. We are to determine, then, in what sense the term "employment" is used in this case. Does it mean to furnish the plaintiff with actual business to transact, or that he shall transact it if they have any, or merely to continue the relation of attorney and client? If the breach assigned had been that the defendants did not give the plaintiff business to transact, although they had business, it would have been necessary to understand the word "employ" in the former sense, in order to make the declaration consistent. The breach actually assigned does not require it, but it was quite consistent with, and indeed more proper to the latter interpretation of the word "employ." It alleges that they "dismissed him from his employment and retainer, and from thence hitherto have refused to retain and employ him," the words "employment" and "employ" not being there used in the sense of the actual performance of service. But what weighs chiefly with us, in the consideration of the agreement, is that in one mode of understanding the word "employ," the promise is properly inferred from the agreement, and the declaration is sufficient; in the other it is not; and as this is not a question arising on demurrer, we think we ought to read the ambiguous word in a sense which will render the declaration good. We are, therefore, of opinion, that the legal effect of the defendant's agreement is properly set out.

(2) Consisting of Parke, B., Alderson, B., Parsonson, J., Rolfe, B., Wightman, J., Erle, J., and Platt, B.

The consequence of this decision is not unimportant in a practical point of view. If it had been held that such a contract as this is for service and pay respectively, and that although the employer had determined the relation by an illegal dismissal, yet the employed might entitle himself to wages for the whole time by being ready to serve, that doctrine, if sanctioned, would be productive of pernicious consequences in case of the business being discontinued, or a dismissal for misconduct without legal proof. According to the plaintiff's construction, the agreement creates the relation of employer and employed, and the illegal determination of the relation entitles him to indemnity, the measure of damages being the actual loss, which may be much less than the wages, when another employment may be easily obtained.

According to the defendant's construction it is a contract for service and pay, and the whole salary for all the time comprised in the contract would be due if the plaintiff served or was ready to serve. Our decision in this case does not conflict with that of the Queen's Bench, in the two cases of Aspdin v. Austin and Dunn v. Sayles. Both those cases turn upon the construction of a covenant between the parties. In the former, the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff to perform all the stipulations in a former agreement between the defendant and a third person and the plaintiff; and the question was, whether that former agreement, which was on the part of the plaintiff to make cement for the defendant and one Seeley, and to teach them how to make it, and on the defendant and Seeley's part to pay a weekly salary for three years, and then take the plaintiff into partnership, implied a promise by them to continue to employ him as the manufacturer of cement for the intermediate period. The Court could not draw any such inference, and Lord Denman, in giving judgment, assigned a very strong reason, that "the breach assigned by the plaintiff assumed that the defendant, at however great loss to himself, was bound to continue his business for three years, but the defendant had not covenanted to do so; he had covenanted only to pay weekly sums for three years to the plaintiff, on the condition of his performing the conditions precedent, and that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover those sums whether he performed them or not, so long as he was ready and willing and offered to perform them, and was prevented by the defendant from so doing."

The other case also turns upon the construction of the defendant's contract. The indenture there did not confine the term "agreed" further than made the words of such indenture the words of both parties. It was simply a covenant by the plaintiff. The plaintiff covenanted there that his son should serve as an apprentice to a surgeon-dentist. The defendant, in consideration of his services, covenanted to pay a weekly sum for five years; and the Court held, that there was no covenant that the defendant should continue him in his employ as an assistant. Lord Denman held, that the reason that applied to the former case equally applied to that: it would be a strange thing to say that the defendant covenanted to carry on the business of surgeon-dentist at whatever loss and inconvenience, for five years. In the present case, we have to consider the mutual agreement of two parties, one, a company which was sure to continue for the term of a year, and which would, without doubt, have many occasions for the advice and service of an attorney and solicitor; and applying ourselves to the construction of this particular contract, we think there is an implied undertaking to retain and employ the plaintiff in the sense in which we understand that word. We think, therefore, the judgment should be reversed, and judgment be given for the plaintiff for 200*l.*, the amount found due on the second count. There is no occasion for a venire de novo. The judgment will be reversed and given for the plaintiff for the amount found due.

When a statute, for the purpose of protecting the buyers, prescribes regulations to be followed in the sale and delivery of an article the vendor cannot recover the price of such article sold and delivered by him without observing the regulations.

By the 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci. s. 3, with any quantity of coals exceeding 560 lb., delivered by any cart, within the city of London, &c., the seller shall deliver or cause to be delivered to the purchaser or his servant, immediately on the arrival of the cart, &c. in which such coal shall be sent, and before unloading, a ticket, according to a certain form, under a penalty, unless the coals are purchased at the coal market.

To debt for goods sold and delivered, the defendant pleaded in substance that the goods were quantities of coals sold and delivered by him to the plaintiffs, respectively exceeding 560 lb. and respectively delivered within the city of London, in divers, to wit, two carts, without delivering, before any such quantities of coals were unloaded, a ticket signed by the plaintiffs according to the form of the statute; and that the defendant did not purchase the same at the coal market:—Held, that the statute being passed for the protection of the purchasers of coal, the plea was an answer to the action.

Also, on special demurrer, that the statute applies if the quantity at one delivery exceeds 560 lb. though delivered in carts each containing less than 560 lb.; that if the vendor be prevented, by any act of the purchaser, from delivering the ticket, that is matter to be replied; that the vendor's name must be written in the ticket as a signature, though it would be sufficient if written by an agent; and that the negation in the plea of the delivery of a ticket was sufficiently applied to each delivery.

In this action the declaration was in debt for goods sold and delivered, and on an account stated.

goods in the said first count mentioned to have been sold and delivered were divers quantities of coals, by the defendant purchased of the plaintiffs, and by the plaintiffs sold and delivered to the defendant; and that the said quantities of coals were respectively delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant, after sixty days after the passing of a certain act of parliament, made and passed in a certain session of parliament holden in the 1st and 2nd years of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled 'An act to continue for seven years an act for regulating the vend and delivery of coals in London and Westminster, and in certain parts of the adjacent counties.' That each of the said quantities of coals so delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant as aforesaid, at the respective times of the sales and of the deliveries thereof to the defendant as aforesaid, respectively exceeded 560 lb.; and that each of the same quantities of coals were respectively so delivered as aforesaid by the plaintiffs to the defendant, within the city of London, by and in divers, to wit, two carts and two waggons; that the plaintiffs were the sellers of each and every of the said quantities of the said coals so sold and delivered to the defendant as aforesaid; and that the plaintiffs so being the sellers of the said quantities of the said coals, did not deliver or cause to be delivered to the defendant, he, the defendant, being the purchaser of each and every of the said quantities of coals, or to his, the defendant's agent or agents, or servant or servants, immediately on the arrival of the said carts and waggons in which each of such quantities of coals were respectively sent, and before any of such quantities of coals were unloaded, a paper or ticket with each of the said quantities of coals, nor with any or either of them, according to the form in Schedule (A.) to the said act annexed, respectively signed by the plaintiffs, the sellers of the said quantities of coals, with their names in words at full length, according to the form and effect of the said statute, but wholly neglected so to do, contrary to the said statute; that the defendant, at the times of the said sales and of the said deliveries of the said coals to him as aforesaid, was not a seller or dealer in coals, nor did he, the defendant, purchase the same or any part thereof at the coal market. Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning as causes that the plea is pleaded to the whole of the first count of the declaration, which is admitted by the said plea to be founded upon several distinct sales, and several distinct deliveries of coals at several distinct times, and yet the defendant in and by the said plea pretends that the whole of the said sales and deliveries are illegal and void, because the plaintiffs did not immediately on the arrival of the carts and waggons, and before any of the said quantities of coals were unloaded, deliver to the defendant a paper or ticket, according to the form in the schedule to the said act annexed. And the defendant thereby seeks to avoid all the sales and deliveries of the said coals, and all the contracts upon which the plaintiffs have declared in their first count, because they did not comply with the enactment of the statute upon the first delivery of the said coals, and it is consistent with the said plea that the plaintiffs, on the second and every subsequent occasion did deliver a paper and ticket as required by the said statute, and the plea being bad in part is bad altogether. And also for that the same plea is uncertain and repugnant in this, (to wit) it is therein alleged that the plaintiffs did not immediately on the arrival of the said carts and waggons, and before the unloading of any of the said quantities of coals, deliver a paper or ticket, and the non-delivery of the paper and ticket which the defendant there alleges is a non-delivery after all the carts and waggons had arrived, and before any of the coals were unloaded, and as it appears that the said coals were delivered at different times, some of the coals must have been unloaded before all the carts and waggons had arrived; and also for that the said last plea is further uncertain in this (to wit) that it does not appear thereby whether the defendant means that no paper or ticket was delivered, or that an informal paper and ticket was delivered with the said quantities of coals, and the said plea by argument and inference admits that a paper and ticket was delivered with the said quantities of coals, but that such paper or ticket was not signed by the plaintiffs, the sellers thereof, with their names in words at full length; and also for that the said act of parliament in the said plea mentioned does not require that any such paper or ticket should be delivered with coals as the said paper and ticket in the said plea mentioned; and also for that it does not appear that the defendant ever returned, or offered to return to the plaintiffs, or is ready to return to them the said coals. Joinder in demurrer.

Unthank, in support of the demurrer (1).—This plea is founded on the 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci. (local and personal). That act continues the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. lxxvi. except in so far as altered by the act. The 43rd section of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. lxxvi. enacts, that coals sold in London or Westminster shall be sold by weight and not by measure. The 47th section directs, that a ticket of a form there given shall be delivered with any quantity of coals exceeding 560lb., and imposes a penalty on the seller and on the carman for neglect. The 52nd section directs, that the carman shall carry a weighing machine in his cart. The 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci. repeals so much of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. lxxvi. as directs that a seller's ticket shall be delivered, and substitutes an enactment in section 3. (2).

(1) April 23, 1847, before Wilde, C.J., Colman, J., Cresswell, J. and Williams, J..

(2) Sect. 3. "And be it enacted, that with any quantity of coals exceeding 560lb. delivered from and after sixty days after the passing of this act, by any cart, waggon, or other carriage within the cities of London and Westminster, or within the distance of twenty-five miles from the Post-office aforesaid, the seller or sellers thereof shall deliver or cause to be delivered to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, or to his or their agent or agents, servant or servants, immediately on the arrival of the cart, waggon, or other carriage in which such coals shall be sent, and before any of such coals shall be unloaded, a paper or ticket, according to the form in the schedule to this act annexed; and in case any such seller or sellers do not deliver or cause to be delivered such paper or ticket as aforesaid to the purchaser or purchasers of such coals, or to his, her, or their agent or agents, servant or servants, before any part of such coals are unloaded, every such seller shall for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20*l*.; and in case the carman, driver of, or other person attending any such waggon, cart, or other carriage laden with any such coals to whom any such paper or ticket shall have been given by or by the orders of the seller in order to be delivered to the purchaser, shall (having so first received the same from the seller or any person by the direction of the seller) refuse or neglect to deliver such paper or ticket to the purchaser or purchasers of such coals, or to his, her, or their agent or agents, or servant or servants, before any part of such coals shall be unloaded, such carman, driver, or other person so offending shall for

The plea is founded on this enactment, and if it is to be supported it must be held that though the goods are delivered they are not to be paid for unless there has been a ticket in that precise form delivered. But this is not so. The cases depend upon the particular enactments on which they are decided; and it will be found that where a contract has been held void because it was not in compliance with a statute, the statute either expressly made the contract void, and declared that the party should not sue upon it, or made the transaction illegal; so that, to use the language of Lord Brougham, in delivering the judgment of the House of Lords, in Swan v. Blair (3), it is a consequence drawn by argument from the statutory enactment that the contract is made void. But no case establishes that a contract is void because a penalty is incurred in something collateral to, and not contemporaneous with the contract. Here it does not appear that the seller has not given a ticket to his carman, or that at the time of the contract to sell it was contemplated that no ticket should be delivered; and a contract is not vitiated by an illegal act, unless the contract be such that it cannot be performed without doing the illegal act—Armstrong v. Lewis (4).

[WILDE, C.J.—That case is not in point. I there contended, as counsel, that the written contract of partnership was merely colourable and a cloak for an usurious contract, and the Court in error said that it did not appear on the record that there was such a collateral usurious agreement; and not, as you now cite the case, that the written contract could be enforced by the one partner against the other, though there was such a collateral agreement.]

Wetherell v. Jones (5) is a direct authority for the proposition; so is Redmond v. Smith (6). The illegal act here is collateral to the contract.

[CRESSWELL, J. and WILLIAMS, J.—The contract declared on is the contract implied by law from the sale and delivery, and the plea shews that the delivery is itself in breach of an enactment made for the protection of the purchaser. How, then, can it support a promise?]

Wetherell v. Jones was a case of goods sold and delivered, and yet the plaintiff recovered, though there was a penalty incurred by delivering the goods without a permit. And there is no distinction between fiscal regulations and others. The question is whether the legislature prohibits the contract or not—Smith v. Mawhood (7). All the cases are distinguishable: in Law v. Hodson (8) there was an implied contract to deliver bricks of a legal size: in Foster v. Taylor (9) the vendor was guilty of fraud, and must have known of the illegality.

And the defendant thereby seeks to avoid all the sales and deliveries of the said coals, and all the contracts upon which the plaintiffs have declared in their first count, because they did not comply with the enactment of the statute upon the first delivery of the said coals, and it is consistent with the said plea that the plaintiffs, on the second and every subsequent occasion did deliver a paper and ticket as required by the said statute, and the plea being bad in part is bad altogether. And also for that the same plea is uncertain and repugnant in this, (to wit) it is therein alleged that the plaintiffs did not immediately on the arrival of the said carts and waggons, and before the unloading of any of the said quantities of coals, deliver a paper or ticket, and the non-delivery of the paper and ticket which the defendant there alleges is a non-delivery after all the carts and waggons had arrived, and before any of the coals were unloaded, and as it appears that the said coals were delivered at different times, some of the coals must have been unloaded before all the carts and waggons had arrived; and also for that the said last plea is further uncertain in this (to wit) that it does not appear thereby whether the defendant means that no paper or ticket was delivered, or that an informal paper and ticket was delivered with the said quantities of coals, and the said plea by argument and inference admits that a paper and ticket was delivered with the said quantities of coals, but that such paper or ticket was not signed by the plaintiffs, the sellers thereof, with their names in words at full length; and also for that the said act of parliament in the said plea mentioned does not require that any such paper or ticket should be delivered with coals as the said paper and ticket in the said plea mentioned; and also for that it does not appear that the defendant ever returned, or offered to return to the plaintiffs, or is ready to return to them the said coals. Joinder in demurrer.

Unthank, in support of the demurrer(1).—This plea is founded on the 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci. (local and personal). That act continues the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. lxxvi. except in so far as altered by the act. The 43rd section of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. lxxvi. enacts, that coals sold in London or Westminster shall be sold by weight and not by measure. The 47th section directs, that a ticket of a form there given shall be delivered with any quantity of coals exceeding 560lb., and imposes a penalty on the seller and on the carman for neglect. The 52nd section directs, that the carman shall carry a weighing machine in his cart. The 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci. repeals so much of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. lxxvi. as directs that a seller's ticket shall be delivered, and substitutes an enactment in section 3. (2).

(1) April 23, 1847, before Wilde, C.J., Colman, J., Cresswell, J. and Williams, J.,

(2) Sect. 3. "And be it enacted, that with any quantity of coals exceeding 560lb. delivered from and after sixty days after the passing of this act, by any cart, waggon, or other carriage within the cities of London and Westminster, or within the distance of twenty-five miles from the Post-office aforesaid, the seller or sellers thereof shall deliver or cause to be delivered to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, or to his or their agent or agents, servant or servants, immediately on the arrival of the cart, waggon, or other carriage in which such coals shall be sent, and before any of such coals shall be unloaded, a paper or ticket, according to the form in the schedule to this act annexed; and in case any such seller or sellers do not deliver or cause to be delivered such paper or ticket as aforesaid to the purchaser or purchasers of such coals, or to his, her, or their agent or agents, servant or servants, before any part of such coals are unloaded, every such seller shall for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20*l*.; and in case the carman, driver of, or other person attending any such waggon, cart, or other carriage laden with any such coals to whom any such paper or ticket shall have been given by or by the orders of the seller in order to be delivered to the purchaser, shall (having so first received the same from the seller or any person by the direction of the seller) refuse or neglect to deliver such paper or ticket to the purchaser or purchasers of such coals, or to his, her, or their agent or agents, or servant or servants, before any part of such coals shall be unloaded, such carman, driver, or other person so offending shall for contemporaneous with the contract. Here it does not appear that the seller has not given a ticket to his carman, or that at the time of the contract to sell it was contemplated that no ticket should be delivered; and a contract is not vitiated by an illegal act, unless the contract be such that it cannot be performed without doing the illegal act—Armstrong v. Lewis (4).

The plea is founded on this enactment, and if it is to be supported it must be held that though the goods are delivered they are not to be paid for unless there has been a ticket in that precise form delivered. But this is not so. The cases depend upon the particular enactments on which they are decided; and it will be found that where a contract has been held void because it was not in compliance with a statute, the statute either expressly made the contract void, and declared that the party should not sue upon it, or made the transaction illegal; so that, to use the language of Lord Brougham, in delivering the judgment of the House of Lords, in Swan v. Blair (3), it is a consequence drawn by argument from the statutory enactment that the contract is made void. But no case establishes that a contract is void because a penalty is incurred in something collateral to, and not

[WILDE, C.J.—That case is not in point. I there contended, as counsel, that the written contract of partnership was merely colourable and a cloak for an usurious contract, and the Court in error said that it did not appear on the record that there was such a collateral usurious agreement; and not, as you now cite the case, that the written contract could be enforced by the one partner against the other, though there was such a collateral agreement.]

Wetherell v. Jones (5) is a direct authority for the proposition; so is Redmond v. Smith (6). The illegal act here is collateral to the contract.

Wetherell v. Jones was a case of goods sold and delivered, and yet the plaintiff recovered, though there was a penalty incurred by delivering the goods without a permit. And there is no distinction between fiscal regulations and others. The question is whether the legislature prohibits the contract or not—Smith v. Mawhood (7). All the cases are distinguishable: in Law v. Hodson (8) there was an implied contract to deliver bricks of a legal size: in Foster v. Taylor (9) the vendor was guilty of fraud, and must have known of the illegality.

every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 20*l*. Provided always, that coals delivered to any seller or dealer in coals, or to any person or persons purchasing the same at the coal-market may be delivered without any such paper or ticket."

"Mr. A. B. [here insert the name of the buyer] take notice that you are to receive herewith [here insert the number] tons [here insert the name of the coal if any particular sort is ordered or contracted for, and if ordered or contracted for as Walsend, specify the name of the colliery] coals in [here insert the number] sacks containing [here insert the weight] pounds of coal in each sack.

(Signed) C. D. [here insert the name or names of the sellers in words at full length.]

E. F. [here insert the name of the carman in words at full length.]

"It is directed that with any quantity of coals exceeding 560*lb*. a paper or ticket describing the quantity, and if any particular sort is ordered or contracted for the sort of the coals sent by the seller shall be delivered to the purchaser, or his agent or servant, before any part of such coals shall be unloaded; that a weighing machine or proper scales and weights shall be carried with every waggon, cart, or other carriage, and the carman is required to weigh gratuitously any sack or sacks of coal which shall be chosen by the purchaser, or his agent or servant; and if any carman refuses to weigh such sack or sacks of coals as aforesaid, or drives away the waggon, cart, or other carriage before the coals are weighed, or otherwise obstructs the weighing thereof, he is liable to a penalty not exceeding 20*l*.; also that a proper machine or proper scales and weights for weighing coals shall be kept at every watch-house or police station, and at any other place appointed for that purpose by two or more of her Majesty's Justices of the Peace."

(3) 3 Cl. & Fin. 610.

[WILDE, C.J.—The goods there were delivered without a brand on the casks, here without a ticket. If the present enactment had been that the form in Schedule A. should be branded on the sacks the cases would be identical.]

[CRESSWELL, J.—And in that case the defendant, at the time he received the casks, had notice of the want of a brand precisely as the defendant here had notice of the want of a ticket, and was, to exactly the same extent, a party to the illegal act.]

Little v. Poole (10) was a case decided on the old Coal Act, which gave the purchaser more protection than the present, as it required the ticket to be signed by the meter; and besides, in that case there was a false ticket; yet that case is impliedly overruled by Wetherell v. Jones.

[CRESSWELL, J.—It was sufficient to support the decision in Little v. Poole that there should not be a true ticket. Besides, I do not see how it is worse to deliver an imperfect ticket than to deliver none at all.]

[WILDE, C.J.—And it seems to me that if the delivery on which you found your contract was illegal, because it was in breach of an enactment, the object of which was to protect the purchaser, it is not material whether the degree of protection was greater or less.]

[WILLIAMS, J.—And Little v. Poole was certainly not overruled by name in Wetherell v. Jones, and is referred to as an authority in Cope v. Rowlands (11).]

At all events, the plea is bad for the causes specially assigned: first, the words of the statute are, "with any quantity exceeding 560lb. delivered in a cart;" the averment in the plea is "a quantity exceeding 560lb. delivered in divers, to wit, two carts;" so that the delivery might, consistently with that averment, be of 281lb. in one cart and 281lb. in the other, not of 560lb. in any cart.

[Per Curiam.—The material averment is, that the quantity delivered exceeded 560 lb. If it be one delivery of a quantity exceeding 560 lb. the statute applies, whatever be the number of carts.]

Secondly, the plea does not aver the unloading to be by the plaintiffs, so that it may have been by the defendant. The plea ought to negative this. It is not sufficient in pleading to follow the words of the statute—Fletcher v. Calthorp (12).

[Per Curiam.—The vendor is to deliver the ticket before the coals are unloaded. If the purchaser, by any act, prevented him from doing so, that is a matter to be replied.]

Thirdly, the plea avers that there was no ticket delivered "signed by the plaintiffs, with their names in words at full length." This is not required by the statute; the name must be written in the ticket, but not as a signature; and it will do if written by any one.

[Per Curiam.—The name must be written in the ticket as a signature; and whatever would prove a signature within the meaning of the act would prove it within this averment. Qui facit per alium facit per se: if an agent signed for the plaintiffs, they signed.]

Fourthly, the averment negating the defendant being a dealer should have been, that he was not at any of the times of such sales a dealer in coals; but by this averment he calls on the plaintiffs to prove that he was at all the times a dealer in coals, which is too large—Gorom v. Sweeting (13); and the averment cannot be taken distributively, as it might be if it were a positive averment, for it is in the negative. Lastly, the plea avers that the plaintiffs did not deliver a ticket before any of such quantities were delivered. What the plea should have averred is, that they did not deliver a ticket before each or either quantity was unloaded. For aught that is averred here, there may have been a perfectly good and legal delivery of the second quantity; and if so, the plea, which is to the whole count, being bad in part is bad in the whole.

Dowling, Serj.—The first three grounds of special demurrer have been answered by the Court. As to the fourth, the averment is in its nature distributive; and there is no such rule in pleading as that a negative averment cannot be distributive.

Wood v. Peyton (15) are instances of a negative averment being distributive.]

As to the last objection in form, the word "any" when coupled with the early part of the plea has evidently the meaning of "each respectively," and must be so construed.

[The Court then said that unless on consideration they changed their present opinion, they would not hear him on the matter of substance.]

[Dowling, Serj., however, mentioned Tyson v. Thomas (16).]

Unthank, in reply, relied on the last objection in form.

The judgment of the Court was (on the 8th of May 1847) delivered, by—

WILDE, C.J.—In this case, the plaintiffs have declared in indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered; to which declaration the defendant pleaded in substance that the goods mentioned in the declaration were certain quantities of coals sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant, on divers days and times, and that the said quantities of coals were respectively so delivered in quantities exceeding in weight 560lb. each, and that each of the same quantities was respectively so delivered within the city of London, in divers, to wit, two carts and two waggons, and that the plaintiffs being such sellers did not deliver or cause to be delivered to the defendant, or any one on his behalf, immediately on the arrival of the said carts and waggons, and before any of such quantities of coals were unloaded, a ticket according to the form of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci, signed by the plaintiffs, as required by the said statute, and that the defendant at the time of such delivery was not a seller or dealer in coals, nor did the defendant purchase the same at the coal market. To this plea the plaintiffs specially demurred, and assigned several causes of demurrer, which will be presently more particularly adverted to.

The main and general question which arises upon this demurrer is, whether the plaintiffs are precluded from recovering the price of the coals delivered by them to the defendant, by reason of their having omitted previous to such delivery of coals to deliver to the defendant, or some one on his behalf, a ticket referred to in the statute, stating the quantity and description of the coals about to be delivered; and this question depends upon the construction and effect of such statute.

This declaration is not framed upon a special contract, but upon the promise implied by law from the sale and delivery of the coals; and the question therefore is, (regard being had to the statute referred to and to the omission to deliver a ticket in the form mentioned therein,) will the law imply a promise to pay for the coals so delivered?

The statutes which have given rise to the question of the right to recover the price of goods by sellers or vendors who have not complied with the terms of such statute, are of two classes: the one class of statutes having for their object the raising and protection of the revenue; the other class of statutes being directed either to the protection of buyers and consumers, or to some object of public policy. The present case arises upon a statute included in the latter class. The statute which governs the present case is the 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci, which continued the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. lxxvi. There had been some previous statutes relating to the same subject for limited periods, one of which statutes was the 47 Geo. 3. c. lxxviii. These statutes had varied somewhat from each other in regard to the means by which the same general object was sought to be attained, but the legal effect of an omission to comply with the regulations prescribed in them respectively must be the same. It is obvious from the contents of the statute, that its provisions are directed to the purpose before mentioned, namely, to secure the purchasers of coals from fraud, in respect of quantity and quality of the coals, and that the delivery of the tickets is required as a part of the means for the attainment of that object; and that such was the object of the statute was determined in the case of Little v. Poole. The class of statutes simply for the security of the revenue do not apply to the present case; and the various determinations which are contained in the books upon the construction of these statutes and the effect of non-compliance with these enactments by the seller of goods, rest upon principles not applicable to the present case; and, therefore, it will not be necessary particularly to advert to them.

(15) 13 Mee. & Wels. 30; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N. S.) Exch. 28.

The decisions of cases which have arisen upon the class of statutes which embrace the present case all recognize the same general principle and are consistent in the application of it. The case of Little v. Poole, before mentioned, was an action for the price of a quantity of coals which had been sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant; and it was contended that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, because a ticket had not been delivered with the coals, as required by the then existing statute, 47 Geo. 3. c. lxviii. s. 113. Two tickets were required under that statute to be delivered; and the objection was, that one of those tickets, called the vendor's ticket, had not been signed by the meter, nor had his name been inserted therein. Upon the argument, a rule nisi having been obtained in that case to enter a nonsuit, the various cases were cited and considered—Law v. Hodson, Bensley v. Bignold (17), Langton v. Hughes (18), and Cannan v. Bryce (19). Lord Tenterden, in giving judgment, said, the regulations introduced by this act of parliament appear to be intended to prevent fraud in the vend and delivery of coals, and that for that purpose it was required that the ticket should be signed by the coal-meter; and that as the ticket was not signed as required for that purpose, the plaintiff, the seller of the coals, was not entitled to recover. Bayley, J. said, the case fell within the principle of Law v. Hodson, in which case the Court held that the policy of the act being to protect the buyer against the seller, it would be best effected by holding that the vendor could not recover the value of the bricks which had been delivered, such bricks having been less than the statutable size, and that the object of the legislature in the statute then in question, the 47 Geo. 3. c. lxviii, would also be best effected by holding that a seller of coals could not recover the value of them where he had omitted to deliver a ticket pursuant to the statute. Littledale, J. and Parke, J. recognized the same principles, and a nonsuit was accordingly entered. That case appears to the Court to have been correctly decided, and to be directly in point to the present, and must govern the decision of it. The statute 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. lxxvi. continued by 1 & 2 Vict. c. ci. has precisely the same object in view as the 47 Geo. 3. c. lxviii, and seeks to effect it by similar means, namely, by requiring the seller to deliver to the buyer a ticket in a prescribed form. The judgment in Little v. Poole is consistent with the cases of Forster v. Taylor, Marchant v. Evans (20), The King v. Gravesend (21), and, we believe, every other case in the books depending upon this class of statutes. We are, therefore, of opinion that the plea in this case, if well pleaded, furnishes a legal answer to the declaration, and that the judgment of the Court must be for the defendant. It remains to be considered whether the defendant has well pleaded this matter of defence. Various objections of form were taken by the special demurrer; but all but one were disposed of during the argument. It seems to us that the negation in the plea of the delivery of a ticket before the unloading of the coals is applied with sufficient distinctness to each delivery, and, consequently, that no one of the objections to the plea set forth in the special demurrer is well founded, and that the plea is sufficient. The judgment, therefore, must be for the defendant.

whereof I give and devise to Caroline, the daughter of C. D, for her natural life, independent of any husband she may hereafter marry, and for which her receipts alone shall from time to time, notwithstanding her coverture, be a sufficient discharge, subject, nevertheless, to an annuity of 50*l.* per annum, payable to her mother, during her life, independent of her present or any other husband, payable quarterly, and for which her receipt alone, notwithstanding her coverture, shall from time to time be a sufficient discharge. Then as to the other two thirds of the said rents, issues, and profits, I hereby direct the said annual rents and profits to be paid to all the children of W. W, or that he be permitted to receive the annual rents, issues, and profits of my said freehold and copyhold estates for the use and maintenance, education and putting forth in the world of all his said children until their arrival at the age of twenty-one years. I appoint the said W. W. executor of this my will, so far as the same is necessary to the performance of the trusts relating to my real estate."

The testator died, leaving the persons named in this will and four children of W. W. surviving. He also left other instruments, prior in date to this will, duly executed and uncanceled, by which he devised the whole legal and beneficial interest in his estate:—Held, first, that the instrument of 1839 alone was valid as a disposition of the legal estate of the testator. Secondly, that it operated as a devise to W. W. of the legal estate in one undivided third of the real estate, and a devise to him of a chattel interest during the minority of his children in the other two thirds, determinable as to the respective shares of his children in the said two thirds on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years, and, subject thereto, a devise of the said two thirds to his children as joint-tenants in fee. As to the beneficial interest in one third after the decease of Caroline—quære.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of this Court, by order of the Master of the Rolls. The case stated, that on the 5th of October 1837, William Budd, formerly of Burghclere, in the county of Southampton, and late of Newbury, in the county of Berks, gentleman, and for many years clerk of the peace for the county of Berks, since deceased, duly made and published his last will in his own handwriting, dated the 5th of October 1837, and executed and attested in such manner as was then by law required for rendering valid devises of freehold estates of inheritance, and thereby gave, devised, and bequeathed all his estate and effects, both real and personal or mixed, unto and to be divided equally between the three boys of William West and Caroline Plenty, then Caroline Simmons, at their respective ages of twenty-one years, the same to be vested interests.

On the 13th of April 1838 the said testator made and executed in manner then required by law two other testamentary instruments, both in his own hand-writing, and both written on one and the same sheet of paper. These instruments (with the signatures and attestations thereto) are as follows:—

"This is the last will of me, William Budd, late of Burghclere, in Hants, but now of Newbury, in Berks, gentleman. I give and bequeath all my estate and effects as hereinafter mentioned, namely, all my household goods at Newbury to Caroline, the daughter of William and Frances Simmons, for ever. I also give all my real estate, as well freehold, copyhold, or leasehold, to the said Caroline Simmons for her life, and after her decease to William West, of Speen, ironfounder, for the term of his life, and after both their deceases to William and George West, the sons of the first-named William West, or all my interest therein during the term of their natural lives, and to the survivor of them for their life; and then as to all my copyhold estate at Burghclere to the Rev. Henry Budd, of White Roothing, in Essex, and his heirs for ever, subject to the payment of 500*l.* to Caroline Simmons, and 500*l.* to the said William West first named, as soon as the said Henry Budd shall come into possession thereof, or within one year after."

The words in the twelfth and thirteenth lines, "And their heirs, executors, and administrators for ever," being first drawn through with the pen as erased.

"Dated this 13th day of April 1838.

"W. Budd (l.s.)."

"Signed, sealed, published, and declared by the testator, William Budd, as and for his last will, in the presence of us, who at his request, in his and each other's presence, have hereunto set our hands, this 13th day of April 1838.

"Bromley Challenor,

"Of this my will I appoint the said Caroline Simmons and William West the father executrix and executor. As witness my hand and seal the day and year above written.

"W. Budd." (L.S.)

"Bromley Challenor,
"Henry Geirs,
"Henry Geirs, junior."

In the month of November 1839, the said testator made and executed in manner then required by law, one other testamentary instrument in his own hand-writing. This instrument, with the signature and attestation thereto, was as follows:—

"This is the last will and testament of me, the undersigned William Budd, of Newbury, in the county of Berks, gentleman, relating to all my freehold and copyhold lands, tenements, hereditaments, and all my real estate whatsoever, which I hereby give, devise, and bequeath to the intent that the rents, issues, and profits thereof may be divided into three equal parts, shares, and proportions, one third whereof I give and devise to Caroline, the daughter of William and Frances Simmons, for her natural life, independent of any husband she may hereafter marry, and for which her receipts alone shall from time to time, notwithstanding her coverture, be a sufficient discharge, subject nevertheless to an annuity of 50*l.* per annum, payable to her mother, Frances Simmons, during her life, independent of her present or any other husband, payable quarterly, and for which her receipt alone, notwithstanding her coverture, shall from time to time be a sufficient discharge. Then as to the other two thirds of the said rents, issues, and profits, I hereby direct the said annual rents and profits to be paid to all the children of William West, of Speenhamland, ironfounder and engineer, or that he be permitted to receive the annual rents, issues, and profits of my said freehold and copyhold estates for the use and maintenance, education, and putting forth in the world of all his said children until their arrival at the age of twenty-one years. I appoint the said William West executor of this my will, so far as the same is necessary to the performance of the trusts relating to my real estate.

"W. Budd (L.S.)."

"Signed, sealed, and published by the said testator, in the presence of Benjamin Weston, B. Challenor, R. Gray."

The testator died in the month of August 1840. At the time of making his will of the 5th of October 1837, and thenceforth up to and at the time of his death, the testator was seised and possessed of freehold estates in the county of Berks and elsewhere, and was entitled in fee according to the custom of the manor whereof the same were holden to a copyhold farm and lands at Burghclere, in the occupation of William Vincent, as his tenant, and to two copyhold cottages, also at Burghclere, in the occupation of William Simmons, as his tenant.

William West, in the said will of the 5th of October 1837 named, and William West, described in the said testamentary instruments of the 13th of April 1838, as of Speen, ironfounder, and as William West, the father, and William West, described in the said testamentary instrument of November 1839, as of Speenhamland, ironfounder and engineer, is one and the same person, and he had four children and no more born in the testator's lifetime, namely, three boys, William West, born the 5th of May 1833, George West, born the 10th of October 1834, and Frederick West, born the 11th of May 1836, and one girl, Ann West, born the 18th of June 1838.

Caroline Simmons, named in all the said testamentary writings, is the daughter of William Simmons and Frances his wife, and was born in April 1822, and was married, in 1841, to Edward Pellew Plenty, now her husband.

A cause is now depending in the High Court of Chancery between the said Caroline Plenty, by her next friend, plaintiff, and the said William West, the father, Henry Budd, William West the son, George West, Frederick West, Ann West, Edward Pellew Plenty, William Simmons and Frances his wife, and others, defendants, and by the decree made on the hearing of this cause, before his Lordship the Master of the Rolls, on the 29th of April 1846, it was ordered that this case should be made for the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, on the following questions:—First, Whether all or any, and which of the said testamentary instruments constituted the said testator's last will, at the time of his death, as to his freehold and copyhold estates, or any, and what parts thereof; and, second, what, if any, estate and interests the following persons respectively took in the testator's freehold and copyhold estates, or any, and what parts thereof, under the said testamentary instruments, or such of them as, at the said testator's death, constituted his last will as to his freehold and copyhold estates or any part thereof, that is to say—first, the said Edward Pellew Plenty and Caroline his wife, in her right, and each, or either, and which of them; second, the said William West the father; third, the said William West the son, and George West; fourth, the said Frederick West; fifth, the said Ann West; sixth, the said Henry Budd; and seventh, the said William Simmons and Frances his wife, in her right, or either, and which of them.

First, for the defendants William West the son, and George West:—The defendants William West the son, and George West, will contend, that the three testamentary instruments taken together, constituted the last will of the testator, at the time of his death, as to all his freehold and copyhold estates. Secondly, that William West the son and George West took, under the said three testamentary instruments taken together, immediate estates for life in joint tenancy with the two other children of William West, living at the death of the testator in two thirds of all the testator's freehold and copyhold estates, and they took remainders for life to them and the survivor of them after the deaths of Caroline Plenty and William West the father, in the remaining one third in such freehold and copyhold estates, and remainders in fee as tenants in common with Caroline Plenty and Frederick West, after such deaths as aforesaid, in all the testator's freehold estates; or, thirdly, that William West the son and George West took, under the three testamentary instruments, two several fourth shares of the rents and profits of two thirds of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates till their respective ages of twenty-one, with remainder for life to them and the survivor of them after the deaths of Caroline Plenty and William West the father, in the whole of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates, with remainder in fee, as tenants in common with Caroline Plenty and Frederick West, in the whole of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates, with remainders in fee, as tenants in common with Caroline Plenty and Frederick West, in the whole of the testator's freehold estates.

Points to be insisted on by the plaintiff Caroline Plenty, and her husband (the defendant) Edward Pellew Plenty:—First, that the will of the 5th of October 1837, and the several testamentary instruments of the 13th of April 1838 and November 1839, together constituted the said testator's last will at the time of his death as to his freehold estates. Secondly, that the several testamentary instruments of the 13th of April 1838 and November 1839 (containing a complete disposition of the entire interest in the testator's copyholds) wholly revoked the disposition thereof contained in the will of the 5th of October 1837, and together constituted his last will at the time of his death as to his copyhold estate. Thirdly, that the plaintiff Caroline Plenty took for her separate use an estate for her life in one third of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates, subject to the annuity to Frances Simmons of 50*l.* a year during her life. Fourthly, that the disposition contained in the testamentary instrument of November 1839, as to the remaining two thirds of the income of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates is void for uncertainty or (if not void) is restricted in duration to the minority of the defendants, William West the son, George West, Frederick West, and Ann West, so that each of these four children took one fourth of these two thirds during his or her minority, or, at all events, that these two thirds belonged to these four children, as joint tenants, during the minority of any of them, or to their father during the same period. Fifthly, that subject to the life estate of Caroline Plenty, for her separate use in one third of the freehold and copyhold estates, and subject to the estates, if any, of the defendants, William West the son, George West, Frederick West, and Ann

West, or the estate, if any, of their father in the remaining two thirds, the defendant Edward Pellew Plenty and his wife the plaintiff in her right took an estate for her life in the freehold and copyhold estates, with remainder to the defendant William West the father, for his life, with remainder to his sons William West and George West and the survivor of them during their lives, with remainder as to the testator's copyhold estate to the defendant Henry Budd in fee, charged with the payment of 500*l.* to the defendant Plenty and his wife the plaintiff in her right, and 500*l.* to William West the father, within one year after the last remainder in fee should come into possession. Sixthly, that subject to the life estate of the plaintiff for her separate use in one third of the estates, if any, of the defendants William West the son, George West, Frederick West, and Ann West, or the estate, if any, of their father in the remaining two thirds, and the life estates of the defendant Plenty and his wife the plaintiff in her right, and the life estates of William West the father, and of his sons William West and George West, in the testator's freehold estates, the defendant Plenty and his wife the plaintiff took an estate in fee in one fourth of the testator's freehold estates.

Points to be insisted on by the defendants William Simmons and Frances his wife:—First, that the testamentary instrument of November 1839, either alone or together with both or one of the other testamentary instruments, constituted the testator's last will at the time of his death as to his freehold and copyhold estates. Secondly, that the defendant Frances Simmons took for her separate use a yearly rent-charge or sum of 50*l.* payable during her life out of one third of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates.

Points for the Rev. Henry Budd:—Henry Budd, one of the defendants in the said suit in Chancery, will contend that the testamentary papers, dated the 13th of April 1838, constituted the last will and testament of William Budd deceased; and that they effectually revoked any testamentary document of an earlier date, and were not in any manner affected by the testamentary paper, alleged to have been executed by William Budd, deceased, in the month of November 1839. And the said Henry Budd will also contend, that under the testamentary papers, dated the 13th of April 1838, he is entitled for an estate of inheritance in fee simple, according to the custom of the manor or manors whereof the same are holden to all the copyhold estate at Burghelere, of which the said William Budd died seised, or of which he had power to dispose by will.

Points for the Rev. Richard Budd, heir-at-law:—Richard Budd, one of the defendants in the said suit in Chancery, the heir of William Budd, deceased, will contend that the said William Budd died intestate as to his freehold and copyhold estates, or in any event that his freehold estates are undisposed of except during the lives of Caroline Plenty, late Caroline Simmons, the plaintiff in the said suit in Chancery, William West the father, and William West the son, and George West the son of the said William West the father (three of the defendants in the said suit), and the life of the survivor of them; and the said Richard Budd will contend that the alleged testamentary paper, dated the 5th of October 1837, was entirely revoked by the testamentary papers dated the 13th of April 1838; and he will also contend that the testamentary paper alleged to have been executed in the month of November 1839 has no operation or effect as a testamentary disposition by the said William Budd, deceased; or if this Court shall be of opinion that the same has any effect or operation, then that the same only took effect to the extent of giving to the said Caroline Plenty for her life, one third of the rents and profits of the freehold estates of the said William Budd, subject to an annuity of 50*l.* to Francis Simmons for her life, and giving the remaining two thirds of such rents and profits to or for the benefit of the children of William West, of Speenhamland, ironfounder or engineer, until their arrival at the age of twenty-one years.

Points for the defendant William West the father:—The defendant William West the father, on the argument of the case, will contend that the testamentary instruments of 1838 and 1839 constituted the testator's last will at the time of his death as to all his freehold and copyhold estates, and that the said defendant William West the father was and is under the said testamentary instrument of 1839, entitled to receive the annual rents, issues, and profits of two thirds of all the said freehold and copyhold estates, until his the said William West the father's four children, namely, the defendants William West the son, George West, Frederick West, and Ann West, shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, for the use and maintenance, education, and putting forth in the world of all his said children until their arrival at such age. And that he, the said defendant William West the father, whether he did or not take or become entitled to such interest as aforesaid, took under the said testamentary instrument of 1838 a life estate in remainder after and subject to the life estate of the plaintiff Caroline Plenty therein, in all the said freehold and copyhold estates. And that he, the said William West the father, also, under such lastly-mentioned testamentary instrument took or became entitled to a legacy or sum of 500*l.* charged on the copyhold estate of the said testator, situate at Burghclere, which legacy or sum will become payable at the expiration of one year after the death of the said plaintiff Caroline Plenty, and the said defendants, William West the father, William West the son, and George West.

Points for the defendant Ann West:—First, the defendant Ann West will contend, that the testamentary instrument of 1839 constituted the testator's last will at the time of his death, as to two thirds of all his freehold and copyhold estate. And by the said will the said Ann West and the other three children of William West, living at the testator's death, took estates in fee as joint tenants of such two thirds of all his freehold and copyhold estate. If that is not the true construction of the said will, then, secondly, that the said Ann West and the said other three children of William West took under the said will estates as joint tenants for life in the said two-thirds of all the testator's said freehold and copyhold estate: or, thirdly, that the said Ann West took at any rate under the said will of 1839, an estate in one fourth of the rents and profits of the said two thirds of all the testator's freehold and copyhold estate until her age of twenty-one years.

Points for the defendant Frederick West:—First, the defendant Frederick West will contend, that the three testamentary instruments constituted (taken together) the last will of the testator, at the time of his death, as to all his freehold and copyhold estate. That the defendant Frederick West took by the testamentary instrument of 1839 an estate in fee in two thirds of all the testator's freehold and copyhold estate in joint tenancy with the other three children of William West, living at the testator's death, and subject to a life estate in Caroline Plenty, in the remaining one third of the testator's freehold estate, (under the wills of 1838 and 1839,) and to life estates in William West the father, and William West and George West the sons, in such one third, (by the will of 1838,) the defendant Frederick West took by the will of 1837 a vested remainder in fee after the deaths of the said Caroline Simmons, William West the father, and William West and George West the sons, in one fourth of such remaining one third of the testator's freehold estate; or, secondly, that the defendant Frederick West took under the testamentary instrument of 1839 a life estate in the said two thirds of all the testator's freehold and copyhold estates, in joint tenancy with the other three children of William West living at the testator's death, with a vested remainder in fee to him, the said Frederick West, (by the testamentary instrument of 1837,) after the deaths of Caroline Plenty, William West the father, and William West and George West the sons, in one fourth of the said two thirds of the testator's freehold estates; and a vested remainder in fee by the same instrument of 1837, after the deaths of the said four several persons, in one fourth of the remaining one third of the testator's freehold estate; or, thirdly, that he took by the testamentary instrument of 1839 one fourth of the rents and profits of two thirds of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates till his age of twenty-one years, with remainder to him in fee by the will of 1837, after the deaths of Caroline Plenty, William West the father, and William West and George West the sons, in one fourth of all the testator's freehold estate.

On the 30th of April 1847, the case came on to be argued.*

* Before Wilde, C.J., Coltman, J., Cresswell, J., and Williams, J.

Channell, Serj., for E. P. Plenty and Caroline his wife.—The three testamentary papers together formed one will. A will is ambulatory till the testator's death. It is admitted that a subsequent testamentary paper revokes a former one, if it appears to be intended as a revocation, either by making a disposition of the property quite inconsistent with that made by the first will, or by express words; but if the second instrument only makes a disposition partially inconsistent with the former disposition, it alters the disposition pro tanto, but does not revoke it altogether, unless there be words of revocation. There can be but one last will of the testator, but it may be written on many papers, and published at many times. Here the first instrument disposes of all the testator's property. The other instruments do not dispose of the whole property; and if either or both of them is taken to be the will, exclusively of the first, he is partially intestate, which he certainly did not intend to be. The instrument of 1838 does not dispose of the fee of the testator's freehold lands, and it disposes only of part of the personalty, viz. the household goods. As far, therefore, as the fee of the land and the residue of the personalty are concerned, either they were, in 1838, to go according to the first will, or the testator was then intestate as to them. Then comes the instrument of 1839, which changes the proportions in which the estate is to be divided, and gives life estates, but is silent as to the fee. [He referred to the note to Duppa v. Mayo (1), 1 Jarman on Devises, and the cases there cited, pp. 158, 162, Cruise's Digest, vol. 6, p. 74, Coward v. Marshal (2), Hitchins v. Basset (3), Harwood v. Goodright (4), as shewing that a subsequent will does not revoke a former one, unless there appears an intention to revoke express or implied.] There is no express revocation here. The words, "this is my last will," do not amount to a revocation—Lord Walpole v. Cholmondeley (5), Thomas v. Evans (6). The present case has been in the Prerogative Court, where the Judge admitted the paper of 1838, and that only, to probate. The case is reported 1 Robertson, 264, and his reasons appear to have been, that the last instrument did not relate at all to personalty, and that the rules of the ecclesiastical court construed the words, "last will," used in the second instrument, as a revocation of all antecedent wills. This, however, cannot affect the rules of law as to the construction of the devise of real estate. It may be that the instrument operated as a revocation as to the personalty, as I admit it does as to the copyhold, but it does not touch the freehold.

[WILDE, C.J. inquired if it appeared by the report that Sir H. J. Fust's attention had been called to Lord Walpole v. the Earl of Cholmondeley, and what reasons had been given to distinguish the cases.]

Channell, Serj.—It does not appear by the report.

[WILLIAMS, J.—Have you looked at the report of the case in the Notes of Cases in the Ecclesiastical Courts? You will generally find a very good report of the arguments in those reports. The decision of this Court in Doe d. Murch v. Marchant (7) seems in favour of your argument.]

Then, assuming the three instruments to form one will, Caroline Plenty takes under the last instrument an estate for life in one third of the real estate; under the first she takes an estate in fee in one fourth, subject to her life estate as to one third of it. The devise in the last instrument of the two thirds is void for uncertainty. Who is the devisee? Is it an estate for life, or during minority, or what?

[CRESSWELL, J.—The most favourable construction for your client is to construe the last instrument as a devise to West the father, as a trustee for her as to one third; and as to the other two thirds for the children. There is another construction as to the two thirds, that the children were to have the fee under the new statute with an uncertain alternative devise during the minority, and then the question is, whether that uncertainty avoids the devise in fee.]

Parsons, for William West, the father.—The last paper gives the father at least a chattel interest in two thirds during the minority of his children. No doubt the testator intended a gift. The only question is, to whom? The words that "he be permitted to receive the rents," give him a legal estate; and if they are inconsistent with prior dispositions the last must prevail—Co. Litt. 112, b, Doe d. Leicester v. Biggs (8), Morrall v. Sutton (9); and, under the second instrument, he has a life estate in reversion.

Manning, Serj., for Henry Budd.—Henry Budd took an interest under the second instrument beyond all question. He was by that substituted for the heir-at-law, and is no more to be deprived of his interest by a subsequent instrument than the heir would be; but the third instrument is too vaguely worded and uncertain to disinherit the heir-at-law.

Fitapatrick, for William and George West, the infants.—They take a joint-tenancy in fee in two thirds, under the last instrument; and, under the second, a life interest in the other third, the reversion of which only is given to Caroline Plenty by the third. The father takes no estate at all, he is merely to act as receiver for the infants.

[WILDE, C.J.—Unless the father takes some legal estate, he cannot enforce the permission to receive the rents.]

Unthank, for the heir-at-law.—The second instrument revoked the first, and the third instrument revoked the second, so that the last alone is the will—Kidd v. North (10). The testator in the last instrument says it is "his last will as to all his real estate whatsoever." Then, as to the two thirds, the devise is void for uncertainty, and the heir-at-law takes it. The cases on devises void for uncertainty as being in the alternative are collected in 1 Jarman on Devises, p. 324.

Drewry, for Frederick West.—The devise of the rents and profits is a devise of the land; and the children took a joint fee in two thirds of the real estate under the last instrument—Baines v. Dixon (11), Doe d. Goldin v. Lakeman (12). This estate may be made subject to a chattel interest in the father during the minority of each child, or he may have a mere authority. If the latter construction is required to support the devise, "or" may be read as "but." In either case the fee in the two thirds is in the children. And the sons are also entitled to be tenants in common in the reversion of the other third. They are tenants in common under the first instrument, and the last instrument leaves the reversion in fee in that third untouched.

On the 5th of May—

Ogle was heard, for Anne West.—Anne West claims under the last instrument an estate in fee in two thirds of the real estate, along with her brothers. The words used in the last instrument are large enough to embrace the whole of the testator's interest in the land. He says it is his will "relating to all my freehold and copyhold lands, &c., and all my real estate whatsoever." He not only means to pass all his lands, but all his interest therein. It therefore revoked all prior dispositions of his real estate. Then, it is said, that the devise is void for uncertainty, because the testator, after devising his estate to the children of W. West, adds "or that he be permitted to receive the profits for their use" till their age of twenty-one years, which, it is contended, makes an alternative devise of the freehold. But, it is to be observed, that the children were some of them infants, and the intention of the testator would be fully effectuated by reading "or" "and," so as to construe this as making him a receiver for them. The cases where "or" is read "and" to carry out the intention will be found in a note to 1 Powell on Devises, pp. 379, 382, (edition of 1827)—Price v. Hunt (13), Brownswold v. Edwards (14), Richardson v. Sprang (15). Or the construction of the will may be, that William West the father takes the legal estate in the whole during the life of Caroline Plenty, in trust as to one third for her separate use, and as to the other two thirds in trust for the children so long as they are infants, with remainder in fee to each child of its portion as it attains twenty-one; or, if the life of Caroline Plenty dropped during the minority of the infants, there would be a chattel interest in the father during the minority. He has duties to perform under the will, in receiving and paying the rents and profits, and where that is the case a legal estate is vested in the devisee—Jeffreson v. Morton (16), Silvester v. Wilson (17), Kenrick v. Beauchlerk (18), White v. Parker (19), Doe d. Rees v. Williams (20). Channell, Serj. was heard in reply.

The following certificate was afterwards sent :—

"This case has been argued before us, and we are of opinion—First, that the instrument executed in the month of November 1839 is the only one of the instruments mentioned in the case which has any validity as far as the legal rights of the claimants are concerned. Secondly, we are of opinion, first, that Edward Pellew Plenty and Caroline his wife took no legal estate or interest in the real property devised; secondly, that William West, the father, took at law as trustee, an estate in fee in one undivided third part of the real estate, and that he took an interest in the remaining two third parts of the real estate during the minority of his children, determinable, as to the respective shares of his children in the said two thirds, on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years. Thirdly, fourthly, and fifthly, that William West, the son, George West, Frederick West, and Ann West, took in remainder in fee as joint tenants, expectant on the determination of the estate of their father, in their respective shares of the aforesaid undivided two third parts of the real estate. Sixthly and seventhly, that Henry Budd, William Simmons, and Frances his wife, took no legal estate or interest in the real property devised.

July 1. } RICHARDSON v. LESLIE.

Arbitration—Award, Enlargement of Time for making—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 39.

The Court has power, under the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 39, to enlarge the time for an arbitrator to make his award, where the arbitrator had power to enlarge the time, but had omitted to exercise it.

Petersdorff had obtained a rule, calling on the defendant Richardson to shew cause why the time for making the award in these causes should not be further enlarged, until the first day of Michaelmas term. It appeared from the affidavits that these causes had, by a Judge's order, been referred to an arbitrator, whose award was to be made on the 1st of August 1847, with power to him from time to time to enlarge the time for making his award; that the arbitrator had several times enlarged the time for making his award, but had at last inadvertently omitted to make a further enlargement. It also appeared that both parties had subsequently attended a meeting before the arbitrator, at which witnesses had been examined.

Byles, Serj. and Phinn shewed cause.—The Court has only power, under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 39, to enlarge the time, where no power is given to the arbitrator to do so. If there be such a power, it is for the arbitrator to exercise it—per Patteson, J. in Doe d. Jones v. Powell (1). It is true that in Parbery v. Newnham (2), the Court of Exchequer did exercise such a power; but it is submitted, that decision was erroneous. The words of the statute are, that "the Court or any Judge may, from time to time enlarge the term for any such arbitrator making his award." This is an application not to enlarge the time—(time having actually expired cannot be enlarged,) but to revive powers which have ceased to exist. If it had been intended to give the Court authority in such a case, the words would have been not "from time to time," but "at any time." In

(2) 7 Mee. & Wels. 378; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 169.

Lambert v. Hutchinson (3) this Court refused a similar application, Tindal, C.J. intimating a strong opinion that the Court had no power to interfere in such a case. Supposing that at the meeting which took place since the time for making the award expired, one of the witnesses committed perjury, could the Court, by granting this application, give the arbitrator jurisdiction, and would the witness be punishable in that case?

Petersdorff, contra.—The object of the section was to prevent the failure of justice either through the wilful act of the parties or the wilful or inadvertent conduct of the arbitrator. Parbery v. Newnham is expressly in point. The attendance of the parties before the arbitrator, after the time had expired, operated as an enlargement; and this shews that although the arbitrator may have no power, the time may be enlarged by the mere act of the parties. The statute was meant to give the like powers without the act of the parties. The words that "the Court may from time to time enlarge the term," will be satisfied by interpreting them to mean that where the Court has once interfered to extend the time, it can only be further enlarged by the same authority of the Court, and the arbitrator shall not further extend it.

The judgment of the Court was delivered (July 8) by—

COLTMAN, J. [after stating the facts].—Three questions have at different times been raised as to the construction of that part of the 39th section of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. which gives power to the Court to enlarge the time for making an award, viz. First, whether the power to enlarge is confined to cases where there has been an attempt to revoke the authority of the arbitrator: secondly, whether it is confined to cases in which the arbitrator has no power to enlarge; thirdly, whether the Court can enlarge after the expiration of the original or enlarged time, as the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Parbery v. Newnham, held they might.

With respect to the first two questions, the power conferred by the act is, to enlarge the time for any such arbitrator to make his award. The only description of arbitrator which precedes this word of reference "such" is that at the beginning of the section; that is, "any arbitrator appointed by rule of court, Judge's order, or order of Nisi Prius." This description of arbitrator, construed according to the strict and natural sense of the word, comprehends all arbitrators appointed by rule of court, &c.; and, with reference to the first and second questions above mentioned, it is to be observed that there are no words to restrict the power of the Court in the way suggested. In order so to restrict it, some such words as "in case of such revocation," or "when the arbitrator has no power to enlarge," would be necessary. To construe the clause in an unrestricted sense seems to be most consistent with the natural construction of the words of the enactment, and, as an omission to make an award within the time limited may, and often does occur, and when it occurs often produces inconveniences in other cases besides those in which the arbitrator has no power to enlarge, or those in which an attempt to revoke has been made, there is no reason for adopting a construction of the words restrictive of their natural and proper meaning.

(3) 2 Man. & Gr. 858; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 213.

With regard to the power to enlarge after the expiration of an original or enlarged time, the power given to the Court is "from time to time" to enlarge the term, &c. If these words occurred, as they often do, in a submission to arbitration, in which power is usually given to the said arbitrator from time to time to enlarge the time for making the award, there seems no doubt that they would not authorize an enlargement made after the time had expired. But it is to be observed, that, in the case of a power given by the submission, it is given to the arbitrator in his character of arbitrator, which character is not absolute and perpetual, but conditional and limited—"if he shall make his award on or before," &c.: whereas, the power given by the act of 3 & 4 Will. 4. is conferred on the Court, which has perpetual existence, and is given absolutely, and not conditionally.

It appears therefore to us, that the power may be so construed as to comprehend the case of an enlargement after the expiration of the time limited; and, as the mischief to be remedied would (as was pointed out in the case of Parbery v. Newnham) be very inadequately remedied on a narrower construction, we concur with the Court of Exchequer in thinking that the larger construction ought to be adopted.

The result is, that, in this case, there should be a rule absolute for enlarging the time, as prayed.

Rule accordingly.

June 14. } DARRINGTON v. PRICE.

Venue, Changing—Judge at Chambers—Jurisdiction.

A Judge at chambers has jurisdiction to set aside a rule to change the venue, obtained on the common affidavit.

The time for pleading expired on the 22nd of February; defendant on the 23rd took out a summons for further time to plead; on the 24th an order was made for further time on the usual terms. The defendant did not draw up the order, but in the afternoon of the 24th (the plaintiff not having signed judgment) delivered a plea, with a rule to change the venue, obtained on the common affidavit. A Judge at chambers having set aside the rule to change the venue, the Court (Cresswell, J. dubitante) rescinded the Judge's order.

The declaration in this case was filed on the 14th of February 1848. The venue was laid in Essex. The time for pleading expired on the 22nd of February. On the 23rd of February the defendant took out a summons for further time to plead, and at the hearing of the summons on the 24th applied for further time, without prejudice to his right to change the venue. This was refused, and the order was granted for further time "on the usual terms." The defendant did not draw up the order, but in the course of the same day (the 24th) obtained a rule to change the venue from Essex to London, upon the common affidavit, and served the rule, together with the plea of the general issue. On the 25th of February the plaintiff delivered the issue, with notice of trial for the Essex assizes. On the 26th the defendant took out a summons to set aside the issue and notice of trial; but Coltman, J., on the 28th of February, made an order at chambers to rescind the rule to change the venue, and decided that the issue and notice of trial were sufficient. The cause was tried accordingly as an undefended action at the Essex assizes.

Hawkins, in Easter term, obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the order of Coltman, J. should not be rescinded, and why all proceedings subsequent to the plea should not be set aside.

Prentice now shewed cause.—First, the learned Judge at chambers had jurisdiction to make the order: he has the same power as when sitting in court—The Queen v. Alman (1), Joseph v. Perry (2). Next, supposing the Judge had jurisdiction to make the order, he rightly exercised it; for, first, the rule to change the venue was irregular. Such a rule cannot be obtained after an order has been obtained for further time to plead, unless the order for time to plead is expressly given without prejudice to the right to change the venue—Shipley v. Cooper (3), Waring v. Holt (4). The order for time to plead was neither asked for nor granted with any such reservation here. And, secondly, the defendant's proceedings were against good faith. The time for pleading had expired before the summons for further time was taken out, and that summons and the order made thereon prevented the plaintiff from signing judgment. The Court has an unlimited power over its own process, and may stay proceedings brought against good faith—Cocker v. Tempest (5). A rule to change the venue will be discharged if it be merely obtained for the purpose of postponing the trial—Amner v. Cattell (6). There is no affidavit of merits on behalf of the defendant.

[CRESSWELL, J.—Suppose the summons for time to plead had been dismissed, could the plaintiff have signed judgment immediately, or would the defendant still have had the whole of the 24th to plead in?]

The time for pleading being already out, if the summons had been dismissed, the plaintiff might have signed judgment immediately. The taking the order at all, though the defendant did not draw it up, was in the nature of a fraud.

Hawkins, contrà.—First, a Judge at chambers has no power to rescind or modify a rule of the full Court, unless with the consent of the parties—2 Chitty's Archbold, p. 1433, citing Joseph v. Perry.

[MAULE, J.—That only refers to cases where the rules have been made after discussion in court; not to rules of course.]

Then, as to the propriety of the order made. The defendant was perfectly regular throughout. The summons for further time to plead was no stay of proceedings, and during the whole of the 23rd the plaintiff might have signed judgment, if he pleased—Sedgwick v. Allerton (7). But he did not do so. The taking out a summons for further time to plead is not a waiver of the right to change the venue—Wilson v. Harris (8).

[WILDE, C.J.—There the defendant pleaded within the time he originally had to plead in.]

[CRESSWELL, J.—Here the defendant both asks for and obtains the order for further time upon the usual terms, which terms would prevent his changing the venue.]

But the defendant was not bound to take the order. He had a reasonable time to determine whether he would draw it up or not. In Hughes v. Walden (9), it was held that where a defendant obtains a rule which stays the plaintiff's proceedings, he has a reasonable time after the rule is discharged for the purpose of taking his next proceeding; and that the whole of the day on which the rule is disposed of is such a reasonable time. And in Mengens v. Perry (10), where a summons for particulars was dismissed after the time for pleading had expired, it was held that the defendant was entitled to the remainder of the day for pleading.

WILDE, C.J.—I think this rule should be made absolute. As to the power of a Judge at chambers to make an order to set aside a rule of court, the jurisdiction at chambers is a growing jurisdiction, and the public is benefited by the increase of business there, which is disposed of speedily and at little expense. I do not, indeed, remember that it has ever been distinctly held that a Judge at chambers has authority to set aside rules of court. But we must look at the nature of those rules. Some are matters of course, others of discretion. This rule to change the venue is not one of discretion, but of course. The Court merely sees that the affidavit is regular, and the venue is thereupon changed. It is merely a step in the cause. There is, therefore, no danger in allowing a single Judge at chambers to act in such a case, and to set aside such a rule, if he sees good ground for so doing. This is a different thing from his setting aside a rule which the Court has made in the exercise of its judicial discretion. In Adams on Ejectment, p. 260, 3rd edit., it is said: "If a party should be admitted to defend as landlord whose title is inconsistent with the possession of the tenant, the lessor of the plaintiff may apply to the Court, or to a Judge at chambers, and have the rule discharged with costs."—Doe d. Harwood v. Lippencott, cor. Wood, B., Trin. Vac. 1817. This proposition is founded on the decision of a Judge of great authority, one not likely unduly to encroach on the jurisdiction of the court. It seems to me, therefore, that a Judge at chambers may properly deal with a rule to change the venue obtained on the common affidavit, just as he may deal with many other steps in the cause which are mere matters of practice. But as to the merits of this case, I see nothing which deprived the defendant of his right to change the venue. This is a right which should not be taken away on light grounds. What grounds are there here for so doing? The defendant takes out a summons for time to plead, the effect of which was to deprive the plaintiff of the right to sign judgment during the remainder of the day. But what collateral right did the defendant waive by taking out such a summons? He offers to take time to plead on the usual terms, thereby exposing himself to the chance of having terms imposed upon him; but how can it be implied from this that he in any way loses a right to take incidental steps in the cause? Why should a summons for time to plead have such an effect, any more than any other summons—a summons for particulars, for example? How far is such an implication to be carried? It might on the same ground be contended, that having applied in the ordinary form, he bound himself thereby to accept the order upon the usual terms, and to take short notice of trial. I certainly do not think that the fact of the order being made giving him time to plead (which he did not avail himself of) can deprive him of the right which, but for that order, he would have had.

COLTMAN, J.—When the application for time to plead is decided on, the party applying has the option of taking a reasonable time to determine whether he will avail himself of the order made. The ground on which I decided this case was, that the time being out for pleading, and the defendant not having taken the order, it stood as if the summons had been dismissed, and that he had then no right to change the venue; that he could not avail himself of the summons, and the order made thereon, for a collateral purpose. I agree, however, in the judgment given by my Lord.

MAULE, J.—I also think the rule should be absolute. I think the defendant has been quite regular throughout. The plaintiff might have signed judgment before the summons was taken out. He did not do so. The defendant then takes out a summons for time to plead. He is told he may have time upon certain terms. He was entitled to take a reasonable time to determine whether he will take the order on those terms or not. On the same day he determines not to take it. He delivers his plea, and obtains a rule to change the venue. Having been regular throughout, it is difficult to say that he has thereby deprived himself of any collateral right, merely because he may have had some other motive in this regular proceeding.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am inclined to think the order of my Brother Coltman was right, and that this rule ought to be discharged. If, in the event of the summons being dismissed, the defendant would have had the whole of the 24th of February to plead in, then he may have been right in his proceedings. But all the cases cited are distinguishable from the present, and no case has been cited to shew that where further time to plead has been refused, the party applying has the whole of the day to plead. Where an application is made to set aside proceedings, and that application is refused, and the rule discharged, and it is decided that the party applying is bound to go on, then he has the whole of the day to take the next step; but here, as it seems to me if this summons had been dismissed, the plaintiff might have signed judgment immediately. I am not aware that a party has time given him to deliberate whether he will take the order he has asked for or not. Time he has in many cases to determine whether he will abandon it, but if he has once taken it, he must be bound to admit that he has taken some benefit under it. If he would have been bound, in case the summons had been dismissed, to plead instantly, then by taking the order he took some advantage; for he thereby precluded the plaintiff from signing judgment: and if the learned Judge thought that he was guilty of something like a fraud in obtaining time in this way, then the Judge was right in setting aside the rule to change the venue.

at the Sittings for London, after Hilary term, 1847, when it appeared that the plaintiff was in the service of the defendant, and on being charged by the defendant with embezzlement, the plaintiff consented to appear before a magistrate to answer the charge. The parties met at the police office on the 12th of November 1846, when the magistrate refused to hear the case unless a charge was made. The defendant then charged the plaintiff Brown with embezzlement, upon which Brown was ordered to stand in the dock, and the case was heard. The learned Judge thought the giving into custody was the act of the magistrate, for which the defendant was not liable, and directed a nonsuit.

A rule had been obtained for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

Cockburn, Bramwell, and Huddleston were called on to support the rule (May 4).—There was evidence to go to the jury whether or not the defendant gave Brown into custody, and the case was for them to decide, upon the evidence, and not for the Judge. They also contended that the magistrate had no power to give a person into custody without a warrant, or until he had heard evidence upon oath, and that it could not be presumed the magistrate had acted improperly. Cur. adv. vult.

COLTMAN, J., in the absence of, and for, the Chief Justice, now (June 29) delivered the judgment of the Court.—This was an action of trespass and false imprisonment tried, before my Brother Coltman, at the London sittings after Hilary term, 1847, when the plaintiff was nonsuited. A rule was afterwards obtained, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside, and a new trial had; and upon the argument of the rule, the question was, whether the plaintiff had given evidence upon the trial which ought to have been submitted to the jury, that the imprisonment of the plaintiff was the act, and under the authority of, the defendant. It appeared from the report of the Judge who presided at the trial, that the first witness called on the part of the plaintiff was Mr. Gunn, who was clerk to the police magistrate at the public office, Lambeth Street, and the substance of his evidence was, that the plaintiff and defendant, with their respective attorneys, appeared at the police office on the 12th of November, when the plaintiff's attorney informed the magistrate that the plaintiff attended to answer a charge of embezzlement about to be preferred against him by the defendant, and that the defendant then said, also addressing the magistrate, "that he did prefer a charge of embezzlement against Brown," to which the witness added, "Brown was desired to go into the dock by one of us—I think I told him myself," and he added, "they were going into the matter without a charge being formally made, when the magistrate said, "I can't go into the matter unless a charge is made formally;" that the defendant then said, "Well, then I charge him with embezzling 30s.;" that the plaintiff was ordered to go into the dock, and the defendant was sworn. It is clear that there is nothing in the evidence of this witness which could properly be submitted to the jury to charge the defendant with this action. A witness named Coles was next called by the plaintiff, and he said, "that the defendant's attorney made some observations to the magistrate to the effect that they had a charge to make against the plaintiff," that the magistrate (as the witness believed) then said, "He could not entertain any charge unless the defendant gave the plaintiff into custody;" that the defendant then said, "He charged the plaintiff with receiving 30s. from Mr. Frances, and not accounting to him (the defendant) for the same." That the officers of the court then took the plaintiff and placed him in the dock for prisoners. This witness said that he believed the expression used by the magistrate was, that unless the defendant gave the plaintiff into custody, but added that he (the witness) would pledge his oath that the magistrate used the word "custody."

It will be observed that no expression is imputed to the defendant by this witness, but that "he charged the plaintiff with receiving 30s. from Mr. Frances and not accounting for it;" and he adds, "that the officers then placed the plaintiff in the dock." This expression of the defendant, addressed to the magistrate, was no evidence upon which to charge the defendant with the restraint or imprisonment of the plaintiff by the act of the officers of the court. What the defendant did, in thus preferring the charge of embezzlement to the magistrate (however it might subject him to another form of action if done without probable cause and maliciously), would not render him responsible in this action as for false imprisonment. The third and last witness called by the plaintiff was Johnson; and it is upon this man's evidence alone that any question can arise whether the case ought to have gone to the jury. This witness Johnson stated that upon the defendant preferring his complaint to the magistrate the magistrate said "he would not hear the charge unless it was brought formally before him;" that the defendant said "Brown had been embezzling some of his money," upon which the magistrate said "Do you intend giving him into custody for it?" that the defendant replied, "I do give him into custody;" and that the plaintiff was told to go into the dock; and then the matter was entered into, and he added "that it was one of the constables that told the plaintiff to go into the dock." The evidence given by the witness in his examination in chief, it will be observed, differed very materially from that of the two former witnesses, although that evidence purported to detail the same transaction as that to which the evidence of this witness referred, and if the case had depended on the comparative accuracy or credit due to the witnesses, that credit and accuracy would, of course, have been for the decision of the jury; but it did not so depend, because this witness, upon being cross-examined, said "that the statements which the two former witnesses had made as to what had passed before the magistrate were correct," thus leaving the case as it stood upon the evidence of these two witnesses. But, supposing this witness's evidence as given in his examination in chief to be correct, and disregarding the qualification of that evidence upon the cross-examination, still that evidence does not, as it appears to us, present any case for the consideration of the jury. In considering the effect of Johnson's evidence, as contained in his examination in chief, it is to be observed that the defendant, neither before his attendance at the police office nor at that time made any application for a warrant against the plaintiff, nor did any act voluntarily to cause the plaintiff to be taken into custody.

When at the police office he preferred his charge to the magistrate. All his communications and expressions were addressed to the magistrate alone, and the important expression which Johnson imputed to the defendant to have used, that is, "I do give him (the plaintiff) into custody," was said to have been so used in answer to the statement of the magistrate, "that he could not hear the charge unless it was brought formally before him;" and to the question, "Do you intend to give him into custody?" The question, therefore, upon the evidence, is whether the defendant should be considered as merely calling upon the magistrate to exercise his jurisdiction, leaving him to the exercise of that jurisdiction upon his own discretion; or whether the defendant's expression ought to be considered as addressed to any one who might happen to be in court and who should think fit to act upon it by taking the plaintiff into custody; or, in other words, whether the imprisonment ought to be referred to the exercise of authority upon the part of the magistrate or to the unauthorized act of some officer of the police court voluntarily interfering by ordering the plaintiff to go into the dock. It appears to us that the acts of the defendant throughout amounted to no more than calling on the magistrate to exercise his jurisdiction, and that the particular expression which alone can properly be argued to be evidence of an authority given by the defendant for the imprisonment of the plaintiff, was addressed to the magistrate and him only, and that no other person could properly act upon it; and we think that such an expression used by a party to a magistrate in the course of preferring a charge, cannot be considered as constituting the magistrate the agent of the suitor, or as calling upon him to act ministerially upon the authority of such suitor, any more than an individual who should move a Judge or Court for the commitment of a party for an alleged contempt can be considered as conferring a ministerial authority upon such Court or Judge, or as rendering him responsible for any imprisonment which might be consequent upon the motion. Therefore, even taking the precise words used by Johnson to be strictly accurate, still, regard being had to the place and occasion of their being used, they must be considered as merely invoking the exercise of the magistrate's authority. This view of the case appears to us to be consistent with the general principles of law, and with the decisions connected with this particular subject.

If an individual prefers a complaint to a magistrate, and procures a warrant to be granted upon which the accused is taken into custody, the complainant in such case is not liable in trespass for the imprisonment, and that, even although the magistrate had no jurisdiction. According to the case of West v. Smallwood, a party who shall make a direct application to a magistrate for a warrant, that a party may be taken into custody, is deemed thereby only to make an appeal to the magistrate to exercise his jurisdiction, and the imprisonment is referred to the magistrate's authority so as to exempt the complainant from all liability in trespass; and what takes place in the presence of the magistrate ought to be referred to the exercise of his authority, as in Barber v. Rollinson. In that case, the plaintiff having been discharged from criminal custody by a magistrate, was leaving the police office, when the defendant said "I have another charge against him for forgery;" upon which the plaintiff was again taken and placed at the bar: and upon the trial, before Lord Lyndhurst, in an action of trespass, in respect of this second imprisonment, the plaintiff was nonsuited; and upon motion to set aside the nonsuit it was held, that the acts of the defendant were part of the proceedings before the magistrate, for which the defendant could not be held liable in trespass; that the taking could not be considered as the act of the defendant, who had only put the law in motion for which he might be liable in case; and it appears to us in this case that the defendant never did more than call upon the magistrate to act, and that the plaintiff's being placed at the bar must be referred to the authority of the magistrate, and that the nonsuit in this case was right, considering the case only upon the evidence in chief given by Johnson. But the cross-examination of Johnson left the plaintiff's case upon the evidence of Gunn and Coles; and upon their statements it is quite clear that the defendant merely preferred his charge of embezzlement before the magistrate, which would not render him liable in trespass for the consequent imprisonment. The rule, therefore, for setting aside the nonsuit must be discharged.

This case was heard before my Lord Chief Justice, my Brothers Cresswell and Williams, and must be considered as their judgment.

Rule discharged.

MICHAELMAS TERM, 11 VICTORIÆ.

1847. } DOE d. STRICKLAND v. WOOD-
Nov. 5. } WARD.

Copyhold—Sale of reversionary Interest under Land-tax Redemption Act, 42 Geo. 3. c. 116; Effect of, where previous Grant invalid—Union of Tenements.

The last reversionary grant, by the rector and lord of the manor of Bredon, of certain copyhold premises, comprised in it, in one aggregate holding and at one aggregate undivided rent, three ancient tenements, originally held of the manor, under distinct grants at distinct rents. The same rector afterwards sold and conveyed the reversionary fee in those premises, under the powers in the Land Tax Redemption Act, to redeem a portion of the land tax on the living, and the sale was confirmed by the Land-tax Commissioners under that act. In ejectment by a subsequent rector, to recover the premises, held, that the title of the defendant, who claimed under the parliamentary sale and conveyance, could not be impeached, on the ground that the sale was the sale of a reversion expectant on a void grant.

Ejectment on a demise, dated the 9th of April, A.D. 1847, for lands situate in the chapelry of Norton, in the parish of Bredon, in the county of Worcester.

At the trial, before Erle, J., at the last Summer Assizes for Worcestershire, it appeared that the lessor of the plaintiff was rector, and, as rector, lord of the manor of the rectory of Bredon. The lands in question were originally held of the manor by copyhold grants, the first on the court roll commencing in 1762, and were from time to time renewed until the year 1834, when they were, with other premises held of the manor, sold under the Land-tax Redemption Act, the 42 Geo. 3. c. 116, for the purpose of redeeming a portion of the land-tax charged on the living. The last reversionary grant of the lands in question was at a court baron, holden on the 2nd of September 1826, of the Rev. John Keysall, the then rector, and that grant comprised in it, in one aggregate holding, and at one aggregate undivided rent, three ancient tenements, originally held of the manor under distinct grants, at distinct rents. There were two other instances on the court rolls (in prior grants) of the union in one grant of copyhold tenements, formerly held of the manor by distinct grants. By indenture, dated the 29th of August 1834,—made between John Keysall, the said rector and lord of the manor of Bredon, the Land-Tax Commissioners, and Mary Ann Thackeray,—the said J. Keysall did, in consideration, &c., grant, bargain, sell, and convey, and the said Commissioners did thereby confirm unto the said M. A. Thackeray the reversionary fee in, &c. (the premises comprised in the grant of the 2nd of September 1826), to hold, &c. discharged of all land-tax, &c.

The learned Judge directed the jury to find for the defendant, and intimated his opinion that the court rolls afforded evidence of the existence of a special custom in the manor to unite in one grant tenements originally held under distinct grants and at distinct rents: but, assuming the grant to be invalid, his Lordship thought the defendant had an indefeasible title, under the sale in 1834, for the redemption of the land-tax, which had caused no injury to his successor, inasmuch as if the grant were void, the rector might, preparatory to the sale, have made a valid grant for three lives, and have pocketed the fine.

J. Hodgson now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.—The learned Judge was wrong in the view he took of this question at the trial. The opinion he expressed as to the evidence afforded by the court rolls of a special custom in the manor to unite tenements originally held under distinct grants, is at variance with the express decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Doe d. Rayer v. Strickland (1).

[PARKE, B.—Assuming the grant of 1826 to be invalid, how do you get over the bargain and sale under the Land-tax Redemption Act? Do you mean to contend that it gives no title because the previous grant by the same lord was void?]

At the trial the Judge thought the defendant's title, under the deed of 1834, good, because the rector might, preparatory to the sale, have made a valid grant for three lives and pocketed the fine, and so that no injury had been done to his successor. But, if the rector failed to make a valid exercise of the power of sale given to him by the act, no consideration of what he might have done to remedy the defect can now impart validity to the by-gone sale.

[ALDERSON, B.—The 95th section of the act makes the Commissioners judges of the only material fact, viz. the value.]

[PARKE, B.—There is a judicial approbation of the sale; and unless you impugn it on the ground of fraud, it is valid.]

The statutory power which the rector had under the 42 Geo. 3. c. 116. s. 69. enabled him to sell the "reversion of copyhold lands granted according to the custom of any manor for life or lives, &c.," but not to sell, as he has done, a reversion expectant on a grant not made according to the custom of the manor. And therefore, as the rector had no other power to alienate the fee, it follows that the attempted sale is void, from non-compliance with the terms of the act.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—You say there ought to have been three grants instead of one, and then the sale would have been good; but is the sale made under the approbation of the Commissioners to be set aside on that ground?]

[ROLFE, B.—Assuming that the grant was void, why should not the Commissioners leave it as it was? Is there any reason why they should have put the parties to the expense of three grants?]

There is no evidence that the Commissioners knew of the fact of the union of the tenements in the grant. The sale was, in truth, an illegal exercise of the power given by the act. A power, whether given by act of parliament or by will, should be strictly followed. In Cockerell v. Cholmeley (2), an estate comprising a manor and tenements, with the appurtenances, was devised to trustees, to the use of the eldest son of Sir H. E. for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainders to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the first and other sons of his eldest son in tail male, &c., with a power to the trustees, at the request of the person who, for the time being, should be in possession of or entitled to the rents and profits of the said manor and tenements, with the appurtenances, by virtue of the limitations therein contained, by any deed or writing, to make sale and dispose of the same, or of any part or parts of the manor and tenements aforesaid, with the appurtenances, to any person, either together or in parcels; and to that end the trustees were also empowered, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, to revoke, determine, or make void all and every or any of the use and uses, trusts, estates, powers, provisions, and limitations thereinbefore limited, created, provided, and declared, of and concerning the manor and tenements aforesaid, with the appurtenances, sold, to be sold, disposed of, or exchanged; and by the same or any other deed or deeds, writing or writings, to limit and appoint the manor and tenements aforesaid, with the appurtenances, whereof the uses should be so revoked, unto the purchaser. The trustees sold the estate, exclusive of the timber growing upon it, for 13,400*l.*, and the tenant for life by the same deed sold the timber, wood, and underwood, for 2,448*l.* It was held, that there had not been a good and valid sale, according to the power, though there the tenant for life without impeachment of waste might, at law, have cut down all the timber trees and underwood.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—I do not see how the case of Cockerell v. Cholmeley applies. The rector sold all his interest, and the commissioners approved, as the act requires, of the sale; and now it is proposed to set aside the sale, because the commissioners had not all the facts before them: but if they had been before them, what difference could they have made?]

This is a conveyance of an estate in reversion, when in truth it was an estate in possession.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think there ought to be no rule. This is an action of ejectment, and it is a satisfaction to know that if our decision is wrong, the lessor of the plaintiff may bring another ejectment, and if the Judge at the trial should rule in the same way as in the present case, a bill of exceptions may be tendered which will bring the question before a superior court. It is unnecessary to go at any length into the grounds upon which our judgment proceeds, because they have been fully shewn in the course of the argument. It is said that the reversionary grant is void, because it united three tenements in one grant. That is a purely technical objection; and it may be that the commissioners on being told of the defect, if it be one, considered that it made no difference, and acted as though there had been three grants instead of one, and so approved of the sale. Why are we to say that that transaction is void, when all that we have to inquire into is, whether the substantial and proper price was paid, and when it appears there was a bargain and sale, and the money was paid and no fraud is imputed?

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite clear that my Brother Erle was right in the view he took of the case, and upon which he directed a verdict for the defendant. Whether he was right in the opinion he expressed as to the existence of a special custom of the manor to unite ancient tenements in one grant, and so that the grant of 1826 is valid, it is unnecessary to decide, because the defendant claims under a bargain and sale, and also under the Land-tax Redemption Act. It is objected that the prior rector did not receive an adequate consideration for the sale of the tenements, because he sold the reversion upon a grant of three lives, and received the price of the reversion only, when it was in fact an estate in possession. That is an objection to the conveyance of the reversion, and not to the inadequacy of the price; and if the defendant had derived his title under copy of court roll, it might have been void as against a succeeding lord of the manor. But then the act of parliament provides, that the decision of the Commissioners shall be conclusive as to the adequacy of the price; and the approbation of the commissioners, together with the conveyance by the tenant for life, is a good title, unless impeached by fraud. That being so, the defendant claims under the act of parliament, and his title must be taken to be valid, unless impeached by fraud, for which there is no pretence here.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that the grant of 1826 was void, and that may be so; but if there was a special custom in the manor for the lord to unite copyhold tenements, no doubt under such custom the grant would be good. That may have been so, and the question may have been before the Commissioners, who may have done what was perfectly right in law as well as in justice.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. This decision does not interfere with the case of Cockerell v. Cholmeley, which proceeded on this ground, that if the conveyance was not in accordance with the power, it was no answer to say that it might have been done in some other form. Apply that principle here. If this case turned on whether the sale of the reversion of three tenements in one grant was good, it would be no answer to say, that if the grantee's attention had been called to it at the time it might have been altered; that would have been analogous to the case of Cockerell v. Cholmeley; but the sale here is valid, because made under the act of parliament, and the sanction of the Commissioners is sufficient. It may be that the grant of 1826 was void, and that may have been known to the Commissioners, but it was a mere matter of form, or they would not have given their sanction. The parliamentary sanction to the sale makes a good title, and it is immaterial whether the Commissioners knew all the facts or not.

Rule refused.

Nov. 25. } THOMPSON v. LANGRIDGE.

Cognovit—Appearance, Entry of, after Lapse of a Year—Reg. Gen. Hil. Term, 4 Will. 4. rr. 35. & 73—Term's Notice.

Where a cognovit, in the simple form, was given before appearance, and nothing further was done for several years, the plaintiff was held to be entitled to enter an appearance, and proceed on the cognovit, notwithstanding Reg. Gen. Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. r. 35, and without obtaining the leave of a Judge, or giving a term's notice.

In this case the writ of summons was issued on the 29th of April 1840, and was served on the 6th of May. On the 9th of May, and before appearance, the defendant gave a cognovit in the simple form. Nothing further was done until the 10th of May 1847, when the plaintiff wrote to the defendant to say he should proceed on the cognovit; and, the next day, entered an appearance, and judgment having been signed, a ca. sa. issued on the 15th, and the defendant was arrested thereon. On summons before Platt, B., the defendant was, by order of the learned Judge, discharged out of custody. A rule, calling on the defendant to shew cause why that order should not be rescinded was obtained; and now, (Nov. 3.)

that a plaintiff may enter an appearance on the 11th of May 1847, and proceed to judgment and execution upon a simple unconditional cognovit given by the defendant on the 9th of May 1840, a period of seven years and two days; and that without either giving a term's notice or obtaining the leave of a Judge; whereas in the case of a final judgment, after the lapse of a year and a day, a defendant cannot be arrested without a sci. fa. First, the plaintiff was not entitled to enter an appearance at all; for, by Reg. Gen. Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. r. 35, "A plaintiff shall be deemed out of court unless he declare within one year after the process is returnable." That rule derives authority from the statute 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. s. 11, and therefore, in this case, the cause was really out of court.

[PARKE, B.—Suppose there had been an interlocutory judgment by default, and then a cognovit?]

In that case a term's notice would have been necessary.

[PARKE, B.—Not after a cognovit.]

Here there had been no entry of appearance; and the case is within the rule of court. No doubt a cognovit implies an authority to the plaintiff to make up the record; but that must be done while there is a cause in court; here, the writ having been served on the 6th of May 1840, the cause was out of court on the 7th of May 1841. The case of Richardson v. Daly (1), cited on moving for this rule, is not applicable here. In that case the defendant gave a cognovit after the expiration of a writ of capias against him; and this Court held, that the plaintiff might enter an appearance and proceed to execution, on the ground that if the defendant chose voluntarily to come into court and give the cognovit he might do so. That is no authority for the entry of an appearance in a cause which is out of court. A cognovit given before declaration is good—Webb v. Aspinall (2); but you cannot proceed on a cognovit without entering an appearance.

[PARKE, B.—Then you argue that there is a difference between a cognovit given after declaration, and a cognovit given before declaration, the latter being to admit the truth of a declaration to be afterwards filed; and that you contend must be done within a year after the writ is returnable?]

(1) 4 Mee. & Wels. 384; s.c. 8 Law J. Rep. (s.c.) Exch. 13.

(2) 7 Taunt. 701.

Yes; and, secondly, it is submitted, that a cognovit is within Reg. Gen. Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. r. 73, by which "leave to enter up judgment on a warrant of attorney, above one and under ten years old, must be obtained by a motion in term, or by order of a Judge in vacation." Webb v. Aspinall so decides. It was there held that a cognovit was within the rule of Hil. term, 14 & 15 Car. 2, which related to the execution of warrants of attorney. Thirdly, the defendant was entitled to a term's notice, before the plaintiff could take any further proceeding.

Bramwell (The Attorney General with him), contra.—No declaration filed or delivered is necessary previously to signing judgment on a cognovit—Morley v. Hall (3). It pre-supposes a declaration.

[Willes.—Roberts v. Spurr (4) shews there must be an appearance entered, otherwise the judgment will be a nullity.]

[PARKE, B.—No doubt there must be an appearance; but a cognovit is supposed to be given by a person who is in court, and to authorize the plaintiff's attorney to do everything necessary to obtain judgment.]

The 35th rule of Reg. Gen. Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. was intended to apply only to cases where a declaration is actually filed or delivered. The words are "unless he declare;" and the meaning of the rule is, that where the plaintiff is to declare, practically he is to do so within a year. Here, the plaintiff was not bound to declare at all. Moreover, it is but a rule of practice, and may be explained or modified by others, and the practice of the Queen's Bench is in accordance with that pursued in this case. Then as to the second point, the 72nd rule mentions both warrants of attorney and cognovits, but the 73rd omits cognovits, and applies only to warrants of attorney, and the reason may be found in the different powers they give and the different circumstances under which they are given. The rule as to giving a term's notice is not applicable here; it applies only to something to be done by the plaintiff as to which something is to be done by the defendant. It is applicable to hostile proceedings only, and does not apply where the proceedings have been delayed at the defendant's request.

POLLOCK, C.B. now delivered the judgment of the Court (5).—In this case, which was argued on the second day of term, we are of opinion the rule ought to be made absolute. The question turns upon this, whether, where a cognovit is given before there is an appearance, and upon which nothing has been done for more than a year, it is open to the plaintiff to act upon the cognovit without a term's notice, and without any application to the Court or a Judge, on the part of the plaintiff, for leave to enforce the cognovit. Now, a cognovit certainly may be given before appearance, and it contains an implied authority to enter the appearance. It admits a cause of action stated upon the record in the form of a declaration, and though there be not one, it is an admission on the part of the defendant, which operates as if there was one. There is, therefore, an authority to enter an appearance. If there had been an appearance and a declaration, and then a cognovit, it seems to be clear that no term's notice would be necessary, and that a party would not be prevented by any lapse of time from entering up judgment on the cognovit. It appears to us, that the absence of a declaration in this case cannot be successfully relied upon, because the defendant admits, in fact, that there is a declaration; that there is a cause of action on the record; and that is an implied authority to the other side to enter an appearance and to proceed to judgment, exactly as if there was a declaration. Neither the rule of court, Hil. term, 4 Will. 4. r. 35, nor any statute, nor any analogy arising out of the case cited of Webb v. Aspinall, seems to us to apply. We think, therefore, the order made was not a correct one, and the rule for setting aside the order must be made absolute.

1847. } SPINDLER AND JESSIE HIS WIFE
Nov. 12. } v. GRELLETT.

Promissory Note—When payable at particular Place—Presentment.

Declaration, alleging that the defendant made his promissory note, and thereby promised to pay to the plaintiff, by name and addition of Miss Jessie Hope, at 10, Duncan Street, Edinburgh, the sum of, &c. Averment, that the plaintiff, when and since the said sum became due and payable, was always ready and willing to receive the said sum according to the tenour and effect of the said note, of which the defendant had notice, yet, &c. On general demurrer, held, that this was a note payable at a particular place, and that the declaration was bad for want of an averment of presentment for payment there.

Debt. The declaration stated that the defendant, on the 25th of August, A.D. 1840, whilst the plaintiff Jessie was sole and unmarried, made his promissory note in writing, and then delivered the same unto the said Jessie, and thereby promised to pay to her, by name and addition of Miss Jessie Hope, at 10, Duncan Street, Edinburgh, the sum of 200*l.*, by instalments of 15*l.* per quarter, to commence on the 1st of December then next, and so on until the said sum of 200*l.* should be paid. Averment, that whilst the said Jessie was sole and unmarried, divers, to wit, seven of the said instalments had become due and payable, and that the said Jessie, whilst she was sole and unmarried, was always ready to receive the said last-mentioned instalments, according to the tenour and effect of the said note, and that since the marriage of the plaintiffs (which took place on the 10th of October, A.D. 1842), and before the commencement of this suit, the residue of the said instalments, and of the said sum of 200*l.* in the said note specified, had become due and payable; and that the plaintiffs since that time have always been ready to receive the said residue, and the said sum of 200*l.*, according to the tenour and effect of the said note, of which said several premises the defendant, before the commencement of this suit, had notice, yet the plaintiff hath not paid, &c.

One of the causes of demurrer was, that although the said promissory note is shewn to have been drawn payable at a particular place, it is not alleged to have been presented there for payment.

Addison, in support of the demurrer.—This declaration is bad for not averring a presentment of the note at 10, Duncan Street, Edinburgh, where it was payable. There can be no doubt, since the case of Rowe v. Young (1), that where a note or bill is drawn payable at a particular place, a presentment for payment at that place must be averred and proved. Sanderson v. Bowes (2) is a direct authority for that proposition; and the statute 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 78. cannot be relied on here, for it does not extend to promissory notes. Emblin v. Dartnell (3) is a case expressly in point, and decided since that statute.

[ALDERSON, B.—I suppose it will be said on the other side, that the words “at 10, Duncan Street,” are only part of the description of the payee, who is described by name and addition.]

Then it would have been of 10, Duncan Street, and not “at.” The rule is, that a pleading is to be taken most strongly against the party pleading it. A contrary maxim may be urged, viz. that where words are capable of receiving two interpretations, that is to be adopted which will give effect to the instrument declared on. But that rule must be received with some qualification; and, accordingly, in the case of The King v. Stevens (4), Lord Ellenborough said (5), “If the word ‘until’ occurred in a contract, and the context or subject-matter shewed that it was meant in an inclusive sense, there can be no doubt the Court, in furtherance of such intention, would so construe it.” In Fleetwood v. Curle (6) it was “agreed that words of an ambiguous sense shall receive the best sense.” Is not the obvious meaning and best sense of these words, that the note is made payable at a particular place?

(5) Ibid. 257.

(6) Hob. 267.

Needham, contra.—As to the point of construction, it is submitted that this is not a note payable at a particular place. If that had been the meaning of the words “at 10, Duncan Street, Edinburgh,” they would have been inserted in the declaration after the words “pay to her.” “At” is a term of mere description or addition; here it means of a certain name residing at, &c., being better known by place than name, especially in Scotland. Words are not, in a case of this kind, to be taken most strongly against the party pleading.

[ALDERSON, B.—If the word “at” means of, why not so state it? That would then be stating the instrument according to its legal effect, and there would be no variance.]

It might have been more certain to have done so; and though there is no ambiguity in the words used, possibly there may be some uncertainty; but that is ground of special demurrer only. But further, this case is not to be governed by the decisions upon bills of exchange; for a promissory note, whilst it continues in its original shape of a promise from one man to pay to another, bears no resemblance to a bill of exchange.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Take the case of an agreement.]

A covenant to pay at a particular place may be stated as a covenant to pay generally. In general between payee and maker no demand need be averred; and when an instrument is not negotiable, the maker cannot refuse payment, though the payee be unable or refuse to produce it—Wain v. Bailey (7). That case shews, that where the note is not negotiable, no presentment for, or demand of, payment is necessary.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—All that Wain v. Bailey decided is, that where the instrument is not negotiable, the payee need not produce it. Is it not part of the contract here that the maker will pay at a particular place?]

A promise to pay at a particular place does not limit the general liability; the only effect is to enable the maker to relieve himself, by shewing that he was ready to pay then and there, and that the plaintiff was not there to receive.

(7) 10 Ad. & El. 616.

[ROLFE, B.—Your argument comes to this, that though the maker is at the place named, and ready to pay there, yet because he is not somewhere else to pay you, you may bring an action against him.]

Then if presentment be necessary, it sufficiently appears here on general demurrer; for the declaration avers a readiness to receive according to the tenour and effect of the note, of which the defendant had notice—Huffam v. Ellis (8).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There is nothing here equivalent to a direct averment of presentment, on which presentment might be proved; there is no averment of demand.]

Addison, in reply.—The Court will not take judicial notice of the Scotch language; and the only question is, whether this note, by a reasonable construction, is not payable at a particular place: if the meaning is at all equivocal, the words are to be taken most strongly against the party pleading. Dovaston v. Payne (9), per Buller, J., is an authority for both propositions. He also cited Thornton v. Adams (10). If the proposition contended for, that no presentment or demand is necessary, is true, what a situation of danger and difficulty it would reduce the maker of the note to.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant. With respect to the form of the note, the question is, what is the effect of it as stated in the declaration, which alleges that the defendant made his promissory note, and thereby promised to pay to the plaintiff, “by the name and addition of Miss Jessie Hope, at 10, Duncan Street, Edinburgh, the sum of,” &c.? We must take it that that is the form of the note, and the question is, what is the legal effect of such a note? Is it necessary, on account of the ambiguity and uncertainty of the language, to seek for the meaning of the parties out of the note itself? or is it not rather a good conclusion of law, from the very form of the note, that it is payable at 10, Duncan Street? The act of 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 78. does not apply to promissory notes at all; which must still be presented for payment at the place (if any) at which they are payable. With respect to the distinction between notes and bills, the only distinction is, that the former are available only in the hands of the party to whom they are made payable, whereas the latter are payable to any bonâ fide holder. Wain v. Bailey fails to shew any such distinction as that contended for, that in negotiable instruments only, the place of payment is material. Where the instrument is between the parties themselves only, I should think it more likely upon principle that the law would require a presentment at the place named for payment. It is said that the averment that the plaintiff was ready to receive the said sum according to the tenour and effect of the note, of which the defendant had notice, sufficiently shews a presentment. I think that averment insufficient, especially to supply the want of an averment of a demand of payment. This, therefore, is a case in which the note is payable at a particular place; and as the declaration omits to aver either a presentment or demand, the defendant is entitled to judgment on general demurrer.

(8) 3 Taunt. 415.

(10) 5 Mau. & Selw. 33.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. We must construe this declaration according to the English language. If in truth, 10, Duncan Street, be a part of the description of the payee, the plaintiff should have substituted the word of for “at;” and there would have been no difficulty if it really means that: on the other hand, if it means, as we must understand it in this declaration, at then the plaintiff ought not to succeed on this declaration, as it contains no averment of presentment or demand.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion; and think the demurrer must succeed, as the declaration contains no such averment of presentment as the law requires in the case of a note payable at a specified place. It is said that is not the true construction of this note, and that the words “at 10, Duncan Street,” are descriptive only of the person of the payee; but we ought not to torture these words for the purpose of giving them such a meaning: and if not, then it leaves it quite plain that the note is payable at a particular place. That being so, then it is said that it is not necessary to aver a presentment, because the defendant is bound to apply to the payee herself wherever she may be. The case of Wain v. Bailey was, that the party was not damnified by the non-delivery up of the note, and not that presentment was unnecessary. Then the third point is, that, assuming this to be a note payable at a particular place, there is that in the declaration which amounts to an averment of presentment. But that seems a very strange construction to put on the words “that the plaintiff was always ready and willing to receive according to the tenour of the note.” They cannot apply to a presentment, and never were intended to mean it. The want of this averment is fatal.

To an action upon a bill for 25l., drawn by the defendant, indorsed by him to K, and by K. to the plaintiff, the defendant pleaded that K.'s indorsement was in blank, and that after the bill was indorsed and became payable, K. paid the plaintiff 25l. in satisfaction; that the plaintiff delivered the bill to K, who then and until and at the time of the commencement of the action hath been and still is the holder thereof. Replication, that at the commencement of the suit the plaintiff was the holder of the bill; without this, that at the time of the commencement of the suit K. was the holder. The defendant having demurred to the replication, a Judge set aside the demurrer as frivolous:—Held, on motion to set aside the Judge's order, that the replication was good, as it put in answer so much of the plea as was necessary to make K. the holder of the bill.

This was an application to rescind an order of Platt, B. for setting aside the demurrers to the replications as frivolous.

The declaration stated that the defendant made his bill of exchange for 25l., and indorsed the same to T. R. Kemp, who indorsed it to the plaintiffs.

Plea—That the indorsement by T. R. Kemp was in blank, and after such indorsement and after the bill became payable, T. R. Kemp paid to the plaintiffs 25l. in full satisfaction; that the plaintiffs delivered such bill to T. R. Kemp, who then and until and at and after the commencement of the action hath been and still is the holder of the said bill. The third plea in substance resembled the second.

The plaintiffs replied to the two pleas, that at the time of the commencement of the suit the plaintiffs were the holders of the bill; without this, that at the time of the commencement of the suit, the said T. R. Kemp was the holder modo et formâ.

To these replications the defendant demurred.

Flood now moved accordingly. — The order of the learned Judge cannot be supported, for the demurrers are good, and the replications bad. The latter admit that the bill has been paid, and is not in the hands of the plaintiffs; and if that be so, it is immaterial in whose hands it is. It is true, in the case of Fraser v. Welsh (1) the Court held the demurrer to a similar replication to be ill; but that case is distinguishable from the present, or at all events the Court will review it.

[PARKE, B.—The question is, whether the pleas would be good if the allegation of the delivery of the bill to Kemp were struck out.]

The plaintiffs' replications ought to have been, that Kemp re-delivered the bill to them for a valuable consideration, for it is admitted by the replications that the defendant gave the bill back to Kemp.

PARKE, B.—The question is, whether the point is so clear that the demurrer ought to be set aside as frivolous. The case does not resemble that of Fraser v. Welsh. The point is, what is involved in the traverse of Kemp being the holder of the bill? That traverse involves as much as was necessary to make him the holder. It traverses the delivery of the bill back to him. The replications are good, and the demurrer bad. I am disposed to think that the plaintiffs might have signed judgment on the whole record, as for want of a plea. One course would be to allow the defendant to set aside the order on the terms of paying costs, producing an affidavit of merits, adding the similiter, and taking short notice of trial.

This was an Excise information, containing several counts, at the suit of the Attorney General, against the defendant, for receiving a quantity of spirits from a person who was not a licensed distiller, &c.; for receiving spirits without a proper permit; for receiving spirits after they had been removed from the place where they ought to have been charged with duty, and before the duty had been charged; and for removing and concealing goods on which a duty was imposed, with intent to defraud Her Majesty of such duty. The defendant pleaded not guilty.

The case came on to be tried, before the Lord Chief Baron, at the sittings after Trinity term, 1846, when by consent a verdict was taken for the Crown, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following—

CASE.

The defendant is a wholesale druggist and manufacturing chemist, residing at Wolverhampton.

In the month of December 1842, one William Faulconbridge called upon the defendant, and offered him for sale, without any permit, some spirits of wine, 56 per cent. over proof, which had been illegally and privately distilled, and which had not paid or been charged with any duty. The defendant was aware at the time that the spirits so offered to him had been illicitly distilled, and had not paid or been charged with duty. He refused to buy any such spirits, but informed the said Faulconbridge that if he would make the spirits into spirits of nitre, he, the defendant, would buy 30*l.* worth a week of him. The said William Faulconbridge said he did not know how to make spirits of nitre, and the defendant then explained to him how to do so, and furnished him with certain ingredients, viz. oil of vitriol and ground saltpetre, and sold him a still for the purpose.

Within a short time afterwards, the said William Faulconbridge mixed the materials with which the defendant had provided him with a quantity of illicitly and privately distilled spirits, which had not paid duty, and distilled from them sweet spirits of nitre, and delivered the spirits of nitre so made, consisting of two gallons, to the defendant, who accepted and paid for it.

From that time down to the time of exhibiting the information, the defendant was in the habit of receiving and paying for, on numerous occasions, without a permit, from the said William Faulconbridge, in quantities of several gallons at a time, sweet spirits of nitre, which were made from spirits of wine and nitric acid (the nitric acid being substituted for the oil of vitriol and saltpetre used on the first occasion).

To make four and a half gallons of sweet spirits of nitre, six gallons of spirits, at 56 per cent. over proof, were used.

Sweet spirits of nitre is an article usually sold by chemists and druggists, and the spirits of nitre so purchased and received by the defendant from the said William Faulconbridge on the occasions aforesaid, were merchantable sweet spirits of nitre.

The ordinary article of trade called sweet spirits of nitre is made from spirits of wine, on which a duty is paid of 11*s.* 9*d.* per gallon, and the ordinary cost price of sweet spirits of nitre so made is from 18*s.* to 25*s.* per gallon. The price paid by the defendant to Faulconbridge was 12*s.* 9*d.* per gallon.

The chemical analysis of sweet spirits of nitre is as follows:—80 per cent. uncombined spirits, and the rest hyponitrous ether. Hyponitrous ether is a chemical compound of hyponitrous acid and alcohol. According to some methods of making sweet spirits of nitre, hyponitrous ether is not separately produced, while according to other methods they are made by a direct mechanical admixture of hyponitrous ether with spirits, in the proportion of four pints of the latter to one of the former.

The spirits from which the sweet spirits of nitre above mentioned were on all occasions made had been privately and illegally distilled by Faulconbridge, who was not at any time a licensed dealer in or retailer of spirits, and no duty was ever paid or charged on any part of such spirits.

The defendant, William Bailey, was throughout and during the whole time of the above dealings and transactions with Faulconbridge fully aware that the spirits of which the sweet spirits of nitre above mentioned were on every occasion composed had been illegally distilled by the said William Faulconbridge, and had not paid or been charged with the duty, and that the said William Faulconbridge was not a person duly qualified and licensed by law to sell or distil spirits.

The defendant also supplied Faulconbridge on the above occasions with the ingredients, viz., in the first place with oil of vitriol and ground saltpetre, and afterwards with nitric acid, for mixing with the spirit from which the spirits of nitre were distilled, for which ingredients no charge was made by the defendant upon the said William Faulconbridge.

The pleadings were to form part of the case.

If the Court should be of opinion that on the above facts the defendant had rendered himself liable to any of the penalties sought to be recovered under any of the counts of the information, a verdict for the Crown was to be entered for one penalty on any such count. If the Court should be of a contrary opinion, a verdict was to be entered for the defendant.

Sir J. Jervis (Attorney General), (April 30th), for the Crown, contended, that sweet spirits of nitre were to be deemed "spirits" within the meaning of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 80. ss. 92, 101. He cited and referred to 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 53. s. 32, The Attorney General v. Green (1), and The Attorney General v. Houlgrave (2). With respect to the illegal removal of the spirits, he cited and mentioned the schedule of 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 72, 6 Geo. 4. c. 80. s. 92, and 2 Will. 4. c. 16. s. 10.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This was an information against the defendant, for an infringement of the Excise laws, in having purchased and received from a man, named Faulconbridge, who was not a licensed distiller or rectifier, a large quantity of spirits, without a permit, and the duty on which had not been paid. There are several counts in the information; the subject-matter of the illicit dealing being in all of them described as a large quantity, to wit, twenty gallons of "spirits." It was proved at the trial that the defendant, who is a wholesale druggist and manufacturing chemist, had for some time been in the habit of purchasing from Faulconbridge large quantities of sweet spirits of nitre. It was also proved that the sweet spirits of nitre so sold were made by mixing nitric acid with spirits of wine, except on the first occasion, when oil of vitriol and saltpetre were used instead of nitric acid. The spirits used by Faulconbridge, in making the sweet spirits of nitre, had all been illegally distilled by him, and no duty had been paid; all which was known to the defendant, who supplied Faulconbridge gratuitously with the nitric acid, which he mixed with the spirits of wine. The sweet spirits of nitre, so supplied by the defendant, were ordinary merchantable sweet spirits of nitre, such as were usually sold by chemists and druggists. The defendant was convicted on all the counts of the information; and there is no doubt but that the conviction is perfectly good if the sweet spirits of nitre supplied by Faulconbridge were "spirits" within the true intent and meaning of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 80. and two subsequent acts, on which the information was founded. The Attorney General, in support of the conviction, argued that the liquid seized was clearly "spirits" within the statutes, it having been proved at the trial, that every four and a half gallons of the sweet spirits of nitre in question contained six gallons of spirits, at 56 over proof; and, further, that the chemical analysis of the compound gives eighty parts of uncombined spirits, to twenty of hyponitrous ether; and he further argued, that by the very terms of the statute, 6 Geo. 4. c. 80. s. 101, such a mixture is defined to be spirits within the act. The language of the clause referred to is as follows: after previous enactments, as to what shall be deemed to be "low wines," and what to be "feints," it goes on to enact that all other spirits produced by re-distillation, and which shall not have had any flavour communicated thereto, and all liquors whatever which shall be mixed or mingled with any such spirits, shall be deemed and called plain British spirits; and that all other spirits produced by re-distillation, and which shall have had any flavour communicated thereto, and all liquors whatever which shall be mixed or mingled with any such spirits, shall be deemed a British compound, called British brandy. With respect to any argument to be deduced from this last-mentioned section, it must be observed, that there is not in truth any definition as to what is meant by the word "spirits." The section is not an interpretation clause, explaining the meaning of the word "spirits," but an enactment as to what are to be deemed to constitute the different classes or denominations of "spirits." It assumes that "spirits" is a word of known import, and then proceeds to define the different classes of spirits; so that it does not enable us to determine the material point in this case, namely, what is the meaning of the word "spirits."

In the absence, therefore, of any statutable definition, we must assume that the word is used in the Excise acts in the sense in which it is ordinarily understood; and we do not think that in common parlance the word "spirits" would be considered as comprehending a liquid like sweet spirits of nitre, which is in itself a known article of commerce not ordinarily passing under the name of spirits. It is very true the case finds that "spirits" enter very largely into the composition of sweet spirits of nitre, but so they do into the article called sal volatile, and into most, if not into all, kinds of varnish, and so as to other fluids, which certainly no one in common parlance would speak of as "spirits." And we think that nothing can be taken to be "spirits" within the meaning of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 80, which does not come under the definition of an inflammable liquid produced by distillation, either pure or mixed only with ingredients which do not convert it into some article of commerce not known in common parlance under the generic appellation of spirits. It will be observed, that in the 101st section, referred to by the Attorney General, all the liquids there enumerated come within the description of liquids in different stages of progress towards alcohol, either pure or mixed with some other fluid or matter, supposed to render them more agreeable as a beverage. The argument derived from 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 72. and the 5 Vict. c. 25, is entitled to great weight, and is strongly confirmatory of our view of this case. The object of those statutes was to put England, Scotland, and Ireland on an equal footing in the exportation from one country to the other of articles which have paid a duty of Excise, the amount of which varies in the different countries. For this purpose the statutes allow a drawback, in the case of exportation, from the country where the duty is high, and impose a corresponding duty on exportation from the country where the duty is low. These statutes are only material to the present case so far as they shew the legislature did not treat the subject-matter of the enactments in those statutes (and which in terms comprise sweet spirits of nitre), as being "spirits," but as being mixtures, compounds, or preparations, into the manufacture of which spirits enter as the basis or principal ingredient or material thereof. This certainly tends very forcibly to shew that we are right in holding that sweet spirits of nitre are not, in the opinion of the legislature, of themselves to be considered as "spirits." Another strong argument, in favour of our view of this case, is derived from the licensing acts. The 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. compels every retailer of "spirits" to take out a licence for which he is to pay a duty at certain specified rates, and he cannot get such a licence without also taking out a licence to sell beer, which he can only do, after obtaining a previous licence from a magistrate. If, therefore, sweet spirits of nitre be "spirits" within the true intent and meaning of the Excise acts, it can only be sold by a licensed dealer in beer and spirits, and the same observation will apply to sal volatile, spirit varnish, and many other articles of commerce, of which spirits are a principal component part. All these matters are notoriously sold, and indeed this case states that they are sold, not by licensed dealers in spirits, but by chemists, apothecaries, or others; and we consider this to be a strong confirmation of the view of the case which treats them as something distinct from spirits, however largely spirits may enter into their composition. The only reported case relied on by the Attorney General, was The Attorney General v. Green, but that case differs materially from the present. It was an information in rem for the condemnation of a large quantity of liquor preparing for vinegar, fraudulently deposited in an unentered place. The information was framed on the 43 Geo. 3. c. 69, which imposes a duty on every barrel of vinegar, or liquor preparing for vinegar, which shall be made for sale. The defendant was a blacking manufacturer, and the liquor was clearly a preparation for vinegar, mixed with lamp black and other ingredients used in making blacking; and it was proved that the liquid, though used merely for the manufacture of blacking, was really good vinegar, when it had been left to stand and deposit the lamp black and other materials used with it. The real question in that case was, whether, in order to bring the liquor in question within the provisions of the statute, it was necessary to allege and prove that it was liquor preparing for vinegar, for sale as vinegar. The Court held that it was not, and that it was liable to seizure if it was liquor preparing for vinegar for sale, whether it was to be sold as vinegar or otherwise. It is obvious that this is not at all the present case. The analogous case would have been, if the proceedings had been taken against a purchaser of the blacking thus made, alleging that he had unlawfully in his possession vinegar which had not paid duty. The case is certainly no authority for holding that such a proceeding could have been supported. Inasmuch therefore as sweet spirits of nitre is itself a well-known article of commerce, not commonly known under the name of "spirits," and not adapted for ordinary use as an intoxicating beverage, we think it is not "spirits" within the meaning of that word, as used in the information, and consequently there must be

Nov. 24. } WITHAM v. LYNCH.

Judgment—Suitors' Fund; Annuity payable out of, by Order of Lord Chancellor, under 46 Geo. 3. c. 128.—Judge's Order charging the Annuity.

A Judge having made an order, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, charging an annuity, payable out of the suitors' fund, by order of the Lord Chancellor, under the 46 Geo. 3. c. 128,—this Court, considering it doubtful whether the Judge's order might not be enforced, left the question of its validity open, and discharged a rule nisi to set aside the order.

This was a rule obtained by Sir Fitzroy Kelly, on behalf of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why two orders of Platt, B., of the 6th and 16th of July last, should not be rescinded.

The following facts appeared on affidavits, on reading which the rule was drawn up. In the year 1738, the sums belonging to suitors in Chancery, paid in under decrees or orders of the Court, having accumulated to a very large sum of money, an act of parliament was passed, directing the same to be invested, for account of the parties interested therein and entitled thereto, in stock or annuities, to be purchased in the name of the Accountant General. That was accordingly done, and the several accounts opened under the act have since been popularly termed "The Suitors' Fund." At the date of the said order, that fund consisted of six several accounts of government or parliamentary annuities, standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, kept for the entry of the National Debt of Great Britain, in the name of the Accountant General of the High Court of Chancery, such several accounts having been opened, and the several amounts of stock carried to the credit of such accounts, under and by virtue of the following acts of parliament: 12 Geo. 2. c. 24; 4 Geo. 3. c. 32; 5 Geo. 3. c. 28; 8 & 9 Geo. 3. sess. 2. c. 19; 14 Geo. 3. c. 43; and 32 Geo. 3. c. 42. In addition to those accounts, another or seventh account was kept in the books of the Bank of England, in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, called "The Cash Balance Account," which is an account of cash paid in from time to time in the various suits in Chancery, on account of the suitors in Chancery, and to which account is also credited cash received by the Accountant General, for the dividends and interest accruing from time to time on the stocks and annuities so comprised in the said six several accounts above mentioned. From this account monies are paid under the orders of the Lord Chancellor. The defendant, who was one of the Masters of the Court of Chancery, became entitled to a retiring pension of 1,500*l.* per annum, under the 46 Geo. 3. c. 128, and under an order of the Lord Chancellor, dated the 31st of March 1847, made "In the matter of the Suitors of the High Court of Chancery." By that order, after reciting the 46 Geo. 3. c. 128; the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 84; and a certain order, petition, and deed of resignation of office by the defendant, Andrew Henry Lynch, the Lord Chancellor did order, "that out of the interest and dividends of the government or parliamentary securities, carried or to be carried to the account entitled 'Account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery,' and out of the interest and dividends of the government or parliamentary securities carried to the account entitled 'Account of securities purchased with surplus interest arising from securities carried to an account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery,' there shall be paid, but subject to and without prejudice to the payment of all salaries and other sums of money, by any act or acts of parliament not repealed by the said act of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, directed or authorized to be paid thereout by the governor and company of the Bank of England, by virtue of an order or orders of this Court, to be made for that purpose, without any draft from the Accountant General of this court, the sum of 203*l.* 13*s.*, being the proportionate part of the annual sum of 2,500*l.*, payable to the said Andrew Henry Lynch, as one of the Masters in Ordinary of this court, and which accrued from the 25th of February last, the last quarterly day of payment thereof, to the said 25th of March inst., the day of the resignation of the said Andrew Henry Lynch (both days inclusive); and his Lordship doth hereby, on the ground that the said Andrew Henry Lynch is afflicted with permanent infirmity, disabling him from the due execution of his office, further order, that out of the dividends and interest of the government or parliamentary securities, carried to the said account entitled 'Account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery,' and out of the interest and dividends of any government or parliamentary securities, after the passing of the said act, 46 Geo. 3, to be purchased and placed to the last-mentioned account, but subject to and without prejudice to the payment of all salaries and other sums of money, by the several acts of parliament, in the said act 46 Geo. 3. mentioned or referred to, directed or authorized to be paid thereout, there shall be paid by the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to the said Andrew Henry Lynch, an annuity or clear yearly sum of 1,500*l.*, by even and equal quarterly payments, on the 5th day of January, the 5th day of April, the 5th day of July, and the 10th day of October in every year, from the period of his resigning his said office, for and during the term of his natural life, free from parliamentary taxes, the first quarterly payment thereof to be made on the 5th day of July next, without any draft from the said Accountant General for that purpose; and his Lordship doth order, that there be paid in like manner, but subject as lastly hereinbefore mentioned, to the said Andrew Henry Lynch, on the 5th day of April next, the sum of 41*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, being the proportionate part of the said annuity or clear yearly sum of 1,500*l.*, which will have accrued from the said 25th day of March to the said 5th day of April next, without any draft from the said Accountant General for that purpose."

There was no appropriation of any part of the said stocks, funds, securities, or monies for the purpose of paying the said annual sum of 1,500*l.*; but the Bank of England are in the habit of paying salaries and pensions under the order of the Court of Chancery to a large amount out of the said funds. The two sums of 203*l.* 13*s.* and 41*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* mentioned in the above order were paid on the 11th of May 1847, by the Bank to the defendant's attorney duly authorized out of the general cash balance to the credit of the last-mentioned seventh account.

On the 6th of July the following order nisi of Platt, B., dated on that day, was served on the Governor and Company of the Bank of England:—" Witham v. Lynch. Upon reading the affidavit of the plaintiff, I do order that unless cause be shewn to the contrary, at my chambers, in Rolls Garden, Chancery Lane, on Tuesday next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, the annuity of the sum of 1,500*l.* a-year, payable to the defendant as a superannuated Master of the Court of Chancery out of the suitors' fund, standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, stand charged with the payment to the plaintiff of the sum of 4,007*l.* 17*s.*, the amount of the judgment debt in this action, pursuant to the statutes in that case made and provided." On the 16th of July, an order absolute of the said Judge, dated on that day, was served on the Bank of England as follows:—" Witham v. Lynch. Upon hearing counsel on both sides, and upon reading the affidavits of the plaintiff, I do order that the annuity of the sum of 1,500*l.* a-year payable to the defendant, as a superannuated Master of the Court of Chancery out of the suitors' fund, standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, stand charged with the payment to the plaintiff of the sum of 4,007*l.* 17*s.*, the amount of the judgment debt in this action, pursuant to the statutes in that case made and provided." These orders were made under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. ss. 14, 15, and the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82. s. 1. (1).

(1) The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 14. enacts, "That if any person against whom any judgment shall have been entered up in any of Her Majesty's superior courts at Westminster shall have any government stock, funds, or annuities, or any stock or shares of or in any public company in England (whether incorporated or not), standing in his name in his own right, or in the name of any person in trust for him, it shall be lawful for a Judge of one of the superior courts, on the application of any judgment creditor, to order that such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or such of them or such part thereof respectively as he shall think fit, shall stand charged with the payment of the amount for which judgment shall have been so recovered, and interest thereon, and such order shall entitle the judgment creditor to all such remedies as he would have been entitled to if such charge had been made in his favour by the judgment debtor; provided that no proceedings shall be taken to have the benefit of such charge until after the expiration of six calendar months from the date of such order.

On the 12th of July, after service of the above order nisi, the quarter's pension, due on the 5th of July, was demanded at the Bank by and was paid to the authorized attorney of the defendant out of the money standing to the credit of the said seventh account. The plaintiff had since brought an action on the case against the Bank of England, to recover damages in respect of that payment.

By sect. 15. the order of the Judge is to be an order nisi made ex parte in the first instance, and is to restrain the Bank of England from permitting a transfer until the order is made absolute or discharged.

The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82. s. 1. enacts, "That the aforesaid provisions of the said act (the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 14.) shall be deemed and taken to extend to the interest of any judgment debtor, whether in possession, remainder, or reversion, and whether vested or contingent, as well in any such stocks, funds, annuities, or shares as aforesaid, as also in the dividends, interest, or annual produce of any such stock, funds, annuities, or shares; and whenever any such judgment debtor shall have any estate, right, title, or interest, vested or contingent, in possession, remainder or reversion, in, to, or out of any such stocks, funds, annuities, or shares as aforesaid, which now are or shall hereafter be standing in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, or the Accountant General of the Court of Exchequer, or in, to, or out of the dividends, interest, or annual produce thereof, it shall be lawful for such Judge to make an order as to such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce thereof, in the same way as if the same had been standing in the name of a trustee of such judgment debtor: Provided always, that no order of any Judge as to any stock, funds, annuities, or shares standing in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, or the Accountant General of the Court of Exchequer, or as to the interest, dividends, or annual produce thereof, shall prevent the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, or any public company, from permitting any transfer of such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or payment of the interest, dividends, or annual produce thereof, in such manner as the Court of Chancery or the Court of Exchequer respectively may direct, or shall have any greater effect than if such debtor had charged such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce thereof, in favour of the judgment creditor, with the amount of the sum to be mentioned in any such order."

Martin and Peacock now shewed cause against the above rule.—The learned Judge's orders are correct. The suitors' fund has been dealt with by the legislature as an existing property. Under the 46 Geo. 3. c. 128. s. 2. a certain sum is to be invested in public securities, and according to the powers conferred on him by that act of parliament, the Lord Chancellor has by his order created this annuity. Having made the order he has no power to interfere: it is an absolute annuity, always available; and there is no uncertainty in it any more than there would be in a charge on land. Under the Chancellor's order there is a primary obligation on the Bank of England to pay the money. The words "government stock" in the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 14. mean government stock so called; and by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82. s. 1. the provisions of that section are extended to the interest of any judgment debtor whether in possession, remainder, or reversion, and whether vested or contingent, as well in any such stocks, funds, annuities, or shares as aforesaid, as also in the dividends, interest, or annual produce of any such stock, funds, annuities, or shares; and when standing in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, they are chargeable in the same way as if the same had been standing in the name of a trustee of the judgment creditor. Here, the defendant had a clear vested estate in possession in the annual produce of the funds standing in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery; and therefore it was lawful for the learned Judge to charge it, and the orders made by him are correct.

[ALDERSON, B.—The last statute was passed because we thought the Lord Chancellor was not a trustee.]

If these orders are not within the acts of parliament, then they are invalid and of no effect at all, and it is unnecessary to set them aside.

[ALDERSON, B.—That is rather a dangerous argument, because it would be inconsistent with the dignity of this Court to make an order which cannot be enforced.]

[PARKE, B.—You mean to say that if the Court feel any doubt about it, the order should be allowed to stand.]

Yes; because the question may then be carried to the House of Lords. The order is only to be enforced in the Court of Chancery where all the equities relating to the fund may be taken into consideration.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly and Sir J. Bayley, in support of the rule.—The form of the Lord Chancellor's order and the terms of the act of parliament, on which it is founded, plainly shew that this order is invalid and do not admit of any doubt on the point. The order directs the payment of an annuity out of certain stock or funds standing in the books of the Bank of England, and belonging to the suitors of the Court of Chancery; it is charged on the dividends and interest arising out of the suitors' fund. It is not stock standing in the name of the defendant, or in the name of any one in trust for him, but it is what the order calls it, an annuity, i. e. a pension to be paid out of the proceeds of a particular fund, which is the property of the suitors of the Court of Chancery, standing, under certain acts of parliament, in the Bank of England, in the name of the Accountant General of that court, but not in trust in any way for the defendant. The order recites and is framed in accordance with the terms of the 46 Geo. 3. c. 128. s. 2; and it is important to observe that neither by the order nor in practice is there any stock or dividends specifically appropriated so as to stand in the name of the defendant, or any one in trust for him. Indeed, the 6th section of that act shews clearly that the legislature did not intend to appropriate the suitors' money to their prejudice; and if it could so happen that the whole money could be claimed by its rightful owners, they would be entitled to it, and there would be no means of paying this annuity.

[ALDERSON, B.—Is not my Brother Platt's order the order of the Court acting by the Judge? Could it be enforced by attachment? and have we any jurisdiction over it?]

If the Bank of England took no notice of it, they would certainly be liable to an attachment. This is an order made by a Judge as a member of one of the superior courts.

[PARKE, B.—Acting on behalf of the Court as a member of the Court.]

Yes; and the 15th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. provides that the Judge shall upon the application of the judgment creditor or "any person interested" have full power to discharge the order. So that there is no doubt the Bank of England may apply to rescind the orders. This question, however, does not depend wholly on principle. In the case of Morris v. Manesty (2), it was held that a Judge's order charging a pension granted by the East India Company was not authorized by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and the Court set aside an order nisi on the application of the East India Company.

[ALDERSON, B.—The question of jurisdiction could not have arisen there.]

It really is the same question; though here there is a final order.

[ALDERSON, B.—Then Morris v. Manesty overrules Brown v. Bamford (3).]

Not on the point that the Court has jurisdiction to set aside the final order if wrongly made. That case is a clear authority for saying that the Court has power to rescind this order. With respect to the power to make the orders, there is nothing in the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. or the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82. which points to any pension or annuity. It is government stock alone standing in the name of the judgment debtor, or some one in trust for him, which is chargeable by the first act. Then the subsequent act makes a change only in this, that where stock is standing in the name of a party, which is paid into the Court of Chancery, to abide the event of a suit, for instance, and so stands in the name of the Accountant General of the Court, it may be charged; but here, there is no stock or dividend in the name of the defendant.

[PARKE, B.—You say this order charges a kind of fluctuating stock, and not any stock or dividend specifically appropriated.]

The order, in truth, charges by its language the annuity payable to the defendant out of the suitors' fund, and that is the allacy of the order.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The last act uses the word "interest."]

Yes; that may be in reversion, but still must be in some specific stock.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The question is, whether this is an interest in any government stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or the dividends thereof standing in the name of the Accountant General.]

The orders should have specified what stock the Bank were to be restrained from transferring.

[ALDERSON, B.—The Court of Chancery may direct what it thinks proper, notwithstanding the order of the Judge.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that my Brother Platt's orders should not be set aside; not because we have come to any clear opinion on the point; but we think there is sufficient doubt raised in the case to place us in a situation to allow the orders to stand. If we were to set aside the order we should conclude the question; and to say nothing about the acts of parliament, our power to interfere with the order is much too doubtful for us now to set it aside. If the order is good, it may be that it will stand; if it is bad, it may be set aside. We leave the question of its validity open.

ALDERSON, B.—The question is too doubtful for us to act upon affirmatively either way.

ROLFE, B.—The plaintiff had better not force the Court to a decision upon the point.

Covenant. The declaration alleged that the plaintiff, by an indenture of lease of the 9th of November 1842, demised a shop and dwelling-house to the defendant, subject to certain covenants to repair, and alleged as a breach that the defendant pulled down and destroyed a great part of the dwelling-house. The defendant pleaded non est factum, and traversed the breach in the declaration.

of Chancery, called "The Cash Balance Account," which is an account of cash paid in from time to time in the various suits in Chancery, on account of the suitors in Chancery, and to which account is also credited cash received by the Accountant General, for the dividends and interest accruing from time to time on the stocks and annuities so comprised in the said six several accounts above mentioned. From this account monies are paid under the orders of the Lord Chancellor. The defendant, who was one of the Masters of the Court of Chancery, became entitled to a retiring pension of 1,500*l.* per annum, under the 46 Geo. 3. c. 128, and under an order of the Lord Chancellor, dated the 31st of March 1847, made "In the matter of the Suitors of the High Court of Chancery." By that order, after reciting the 46 Geo. 3. c. 128; the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 84; and a certain order, petition, and deed of resignation of office by the defendant, Andrew Henry Lynch, the Lord Chancellor did order, "that out of the interest and dividends of the government or parliamentary securities, carried or to be carried to the account entitled 'Account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery,' and out of the interest and dividends of the government or parliamentary securities carried to the account entitled 'Account of securities purchased with surplus interest arising from securities carried to an account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery,' there shall be paid, but subject to and without prejudice to the payment of all salaries and other sums of money, by any act or acts of parliament not repealed by the said act of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, directed or authorized to be paid thereout by the governor and company of the Bank of England, by virtue of an order or orders of this Court, to be made for that purpose, without any draft from the Accountant General of this court, the sum of 203*l.* 13*s.*, being the proportionate part of the annual sum of 2,500*l.*, payable to the said Andrew Henry Lynch, as one of the Masters in Ordinary of this court, and which accrued from the 25th of February last, the last quarterly day of payment thereof, to the said 25th of March inst., the

Assumpsit. The declaration stated, that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in 10*l.*, for the wages or salary of the plaintiff, then due and payable, as the hired servant of defendant, and on his retainer. Account stated.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before the under-sheriff of Bristol, in August last, it appeared that the defendant, having missed some money from his house, had discharged all his servants, and amongst others the plaintiff, who was his cook, and that the present action was brought to recover a month's wages, commencing on the day of discharge from the defendant's service. The plaintiff was nonsuited at the trial, on the ground that she could not, in this form of action, recover a month's wages for a period subsequently to her discharge, but that she ought to have declared specially.

A rule nisi was afterwards obtained by M. Smith, to set aside this nonsuit, against which—

Greenwood shewed cause.—The plaintiff cannot, under the common count for wages, recover in respect of the month during which she was not in the defendant's service.

[PARKE, B.—There are several authorities both ways, and the Court must therefore, on review of the whole, decide which class of cases is correct.]

Archard v. Hornor (1) is precisely in point. The facts of that case were similar to the present, and Lord Tenterden said, "On that count (the count for wages) you cannot recover for any more than the time you have actually served." That case, in effect, overrules Gandell v. Pontigny (2), where Lord Ellenborough ruled that where a servant is hired by the quarter and discharged without sufficient cause in the middle of it, he may recover a quarter's wages under a count in indebitatus assumpsit, for work and labour. There, however, the plaintiff made an offer to do the duties of his situation. In Smith v. Hayward (3), the inclination of the Court was, that an action like the present could not be maintained. The decision of the Court in Snel- ling v. Lord Huntingfield (4) would have been different if the argument on the other side is correct; for the plaintiff could there have recovered on the common count for wages. The opinion of the reporters in that case (p. 26) is, that Gandell v. Pontigny cannot be supported.

[PARKE, B. referred to Eardley v. Price (5).]

In that case there was no determination of the contract. Besides the point was not much discussed, no cases having been cited. Collins v. Price (6) resembles it.

[ALDERSON, B.—Suppose the plaintiff had received her wages in full, and had then been turned away, could she have recovered?]

She could not. Suppose after she had made a bargain for a year's service, and before she had served at all she had been told that she would not be wanted, and had gone away at the same moment, could she have recovered a month's wages in this form of action, as for past services? The rule on this subject is laid down in Hartley v. Harman (7).

[PARKE, B.—The difficulty in the case is that the plaintiff has not served for a year.]

Beeston v. Collyer (8) is in point.

[PARKE, B.—The servant is entitled to something, not on account of services performed, but on a distinct contract. Under all the circumstances, there may be a debt, but not a debt for work and labour.]

He referred to Haigh v. Paris (9).

M. Smith, contra.—The nonsuit was wrong, and must be set aside. The question is, what is the contract? The plaintiff contends that the contract is, that the master shall pay so much additional for the services of the servant, if he dismisses him improperly.

[PARKE, B.—No doubt the master in this case is to pay a month's wages; but they are not to be paid for services, but for turning the servant away without cause.

The contract is, that the master will give a month's notice, or in lieu thereof a month's wages. The month's wages are not therefore due for bygone services, but by reason of the master not having performed his contract.]

In Eardley v. Price, Chambre, J. says, "The contract in this case being no longer executory at the time when the demand arose, the objection founded upon the stipulation being matter of special contract does not apply."

[PARKE, B.—The judgment in that case proceeds upon a refinement. The good sense of the point is to be found in the case of Smith v. Hayward, which has been adhered to by the Court of Queen's Bench. In this case there is not even an entering of the service by tendering service. What the defendant is called upon to pay for in this form of action is actual service.]

This is a conditional contract, and the present action may be maintained as in the case of goods furnished on sale or return. Smith v. Kingsford (10) is also in point.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think this rule must be discharged. This is the case of a special contract, and the wages cannot be recovered on the count for work and labour. Mr. Smith uses the case of Eardley v. Smith, as shewing that the condition was, that the master should pay for bygone services; and his argument is, in effect, this, that if a man has made a bargain he ought to fulfil it, and the Court may substitute one contract for another, provided the practical conclusion is the same. But, although justice ought to be enforced, there are certain modes of proceeding, certain technical rules and forms of action which must be adhered to. If we were to take any other course, it would be impossible to say where the Courts could stop. A servant claims a month's wages for having been turned away without warning; but the master is at liberty, if he pleases, to pay him a month's wages, in lieu of keeping him. The right, however, to recover those wages is not the same as a right to recover wages for services actually performed; and one contract cannot be substituted for another. I regret in this case that the plaintiff is deprived of what is actually due to her; but there is a mode of enforcing her claim, namely, by a special action, and in the present case we have no alternative. The case is governed by Archard v. Hornor, which, from the time of its being decided to the present, has been constantly recognized; we acted upon it in this court in the case of Broxham v. Wagstaffe (11).

PARKE, B.—I concur in opinion with the Lord Chief Baron. The case of Archard v. Hornor is full of good sense, and has been confirmed by the Court of Queen's Bench as well as by this Court. Nor has it been broken in upon by the case of Smith v. Kingsford, which proceeded upon a different ground. The true contract in these cases is, that a master may turn away a servant by giving him a month's wages or a month's warning; but it is a refinement to say that the month's wages claimed by the servant for a period during which she has not served, are to be considered as additional wages for bygone services. Eardley v. Price broke in upon the rule on this point, with the view, it would seem, of doing justice in the particular case. But that was afterwards set right in Archard v. Hornor.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. The meaning of the rule of law on the subject is, that if a party is turned away on the instant, without just cause, he is entitled to compensation.

Time of Sailing—Condition Precedent.*

In an action on a charter-party made between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the declaration alleged, as a breach, that the defendant did not ship a full cargo of linseed according to the terms of the charter-party. The defendant pleaded, setting forth the charter-party, which stated that it was mutually agreed between the plaintiffs, as original charterers of the vessel called the Dove, A, 1, "now at sea, having sailed three weeks ago," and the defendant, that the said ship should sail to Marseilles, and there load a full cargo of linseed, and should then proceed to one safe port in the United Kingdom, and deliver the same on being paid freight. Averment, that upon the making of the said charter-party time was an essential part of the contract, and that the probable situation of the vessel, with reference to the date of her sailing, was also a material and necessary part of the contract; that at the making of the charter-party, the vessel had not sailed three weeks before, but, on the contrary, had sailed at a materially and unreasonably later time, to wit, one week later, which plaintiffs, at the time of the making of the charter-party knew, wherefore the defendant declined to load any cargo. Replication de injuriâ. A verdict having been found for the defendant on this issue,—Held, on motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, that the fact of the vessel having sailed three weeks was a condition precedent to the defendant's liability to load, and that the defendant was entitled to judgment.

Assumpsit on a charter-party. The declaration stated, that under and by virtue of a certain charter-party of affreightment, it was agreed by the plaintiffs, therein described as the charterers of the good ship or vessel called the Dove, A 1, of the measurement of 149 tons or thereabouts, therein alleged then to be at sea, having sailed three weeks before, and the defendant, therein described as of London, merchant, that the said ship being tight, staunch, and every way fitted for the voyage, should, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Marseilles (after having delivered her cargo at Genoa for the ship's account), or so near there as she might safely get, and then load from the factors of the defendant a full cargo of linseed or other goods, which the defendant bound himself to ship, not exceeding, &c., and being so loaded should therewith proceed to one safe port in the United Kingdom, calling at Cork or Falmouth for orders, and deliver the same on being paid freight, at and after the rate, &c., the act of God, restraints of princes, &c. always excepted; that the freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, one-third in cash, and the remainder by an approved bill on London, at nine months' date. Thirty working days were to be allowed, Sundays excepted, the defendant (if the ship was not sooner despatched) for loading the said ship at Marseilles, and unloading at the return port.

Indebitatus assumpsit, for money had and received, and on an account stated.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

The cause was tried before Pollock, C.B., at the Middlesex sittings, after last term, when it appeared the action was brought to recover a deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* per share on 500 shares in the "Hull and Lincoln Direct Railway Company," provisionally registered. The defendant was one of the managing committee, and the deposit had been paid under the following circumstances. The day after the parliamentary deposit at the Bank of England, and the lodging of the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract at the Private Bill Office, the plaintiff, at the company's office, signed an application for shares, containing the usual undertaking to sign the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract, when required. There was no letter of allotment, but there was a minute in the company's books that 500 shares were to be allotted to the plaintiff on payment of the deposit. The plaintiff paid the deposit, and a day or two afterwards received scrip certificates for the shares, giving the usual receipt for them. The plaintiff never signed the subscribers' agreement or the parliamentary contract, but the form of the scrip was "The subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract having been signed by the person to whom the certificate is issued for the number of shares mentioned therein, and a deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* per share having been paid thereon, the shares have been registered in the company's books." The undertaking failed, and the affairs of the company were wound up. The concern was a bona fide one, and no fraud was imputed. The Chief Baron told the jury that if the plaintiff took the scrip, professing that he had signed the parliamentary contract, he must be taken to have acquiesced in the terms of the contract; and, the jury being of opinion that the plaintiff had entered into the same contract as though he had signed the parliamentary agreement, the defendant had a verdict.

W. H. Watson (Dowdeswell with him) now moved for a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial had.—The facts in this case, viz., the application for shares, the entry in the company's books that shares were to be allotted, and the delivery of scrip certificates amount to nothing, and the scheme having proved abortive, the case is within Walstab v. Spottiswoode (1); and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

[ROLFE, B.—Did not the plaintiff put himself in the same position as if he had signed the deed?]

Scrip certificates are a mere token, saleable in the market, and were no evidence of any contract.

[ALDERSON, B.—On what terms then does he sign the receipt for the scrip?]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The jury say that he did contract, and in the same way as if he had signed the deed.]

There was no evidence of any contract.

[PARKE, B.—The effect is that the plaintiff puts himself in the same position as regards the defendant as if he had signed the deed.]

had not sailed as in the said charter-party set forth, to wit, upon, &c., and wholly neglected and refused to load any cargo on board her, to wit, upon, &c., as he lawfully might for the cause aforesaid. Verification.

At the trial, before Pollock, C.B., at the London Sittings, after Hilary term last, the jury found a verdict for the defendant on the eighth, ninth, and eleventh issues, leave being reserved to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them on the two latter issues.

Crowder, for the plaintiffs, having obtained a rule nisi, accordingly, on the ground that the facts proved did not support those issues, and also for judgment on the eighth plea, non obstante veredicto,—

Watson and Greenwood shewed cause.—First, there was ample evidence to sustain the verdict on the ninth and eleventh issues (1). The main question, however, arises upon the eighth plea, and it is this, whether the statement in the charter-party and in the plea, that the vessel was “now at sea, having sailed three weeks ago,” is a condition precedent to the defendant's liability to load the vessel, or merely a representation. If it is a condition precedent, then as the condition had not been complied with, the eighth plea, which has been found for the defendant, is good, and affords an answer to the action. Glaholm v. Hays (2) is precisely in point. There it was agreed by a charter-party that the vessel should proceed to Trieste, and load a cargo of wheat, &c., and should then proceed to a port in the United Kingdom: “the vessel to sail from England on or before the 4th of February then next.” It was held, that the sailing of the vessel was a condition precedent to the owner's right to sue the merchant for not providing a cargo at Trieste. So where in a charter-party, no time of sailing is mentioned, it is an implied condition that the vessel shall sail within a reasonable time; and if she does not arrive within a reasonable time the charterers may refuse to load her—M'Andrew v. Adams (3). In cases like the present the delay of a week may be most important; and here the jury, by their verdict, have found it to be so. It cannot be contended that if this vessel were not, in the terms of the charter-party, “tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage,” the merchants would be bound to load her. The case of Hart v. Windsor (4) throws some light on this point.—(They were then stopped by the Court.)

Crowder and Bovill, contra.—The statement as to the time of sailing is not a condition precedent, but merely a representation, for which, if false, an action would lie. The plea states, that the plaintiffs knew that the ship had sailed a week later than the stipulated time: that shews that the defendant did not require anything more than a representation, which, if false, should have the effect of vitiating the charter-party. It never was the intention of the parties to this contract, that the instrument should be void if the vessel did not sail exactly within the time specified. The case would have been different if the plaintiffs had used the word “warranted.” Glaholm v. Hays is distinguishable, because there the position in the charter-party of the clause as to sailing shews that it was meant to be a condition precedent. Besides, there the stipulation was for a future act; whereas here it refers to a past event. In the present case the language of the charter-party is more like a statement agreed upon by both parties than a condition precedent. They cited and referred to Dunlop v. Waugh (5), and the case of Jeudwine v. Slade (6), and Stavers v. Curling (7). They then contended that the rule ought to be made absolute for entering a verdict on the ninth and eleventh issues.

PARKE, B.—This rule must be absolute for entering a verdict on the ninth and eleventh issues, and discharged as to the eighth. The eighth plea, which raises an important question, is proved, except so far as relates to the averment that the plaintiffs knew that the vessel had sailed; and as to the importance of that allegation, the plaintiffs may, if they please, take the opinion of a Denman's Act was framed with the same object as the stat. of Eliz., which it recites, viz., to avoid trifling and frivolous suits; and by that act, if a plaintiff brings what by the verdict of a jury for him with less damages than 40s., is shewn to be a frivolous action, he is not to recover in respect of such verdict any costs whatever.

[ALDERSON, B.—The words of the stat. of Eliz. are remarkable, viz., that where the debt or damages to be recovered shall not amount to 40s., the Judge shall not award for costs to the party plaintiff any greater or more costs than the damages recovered.]

Lord Denman's Act does not contemplate a division of causes of action, for the purposes of costs; and where a plaintiff recovers less than 40s., and the Judge does not certify, the action is frivolous, and the plaintiff is to have no costs at all—Marriott v. Stanley (2). It ought, like all statutes which deprive a plaintiff of costs, to be construed generally and liberally, and not to be limited—Irvine v. Reddish (3). The statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. ss. 4, 5, does not apply here. That statute only applies where there is a plea found for the defendant, which would entitle him to the general costs of the cause—Richmond v. Johnson (4); here the plaintiff would, but for Lord Denman's Act, be entitled to the postea. The case of Newton v. Rowe (5) is in point. That was an action of libel to which the defendant pleaded the general issue, and several special pleas; and the plaintiff had a verdict with one farthing damages; and there was no certificate under Lord Denman's Act; and it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any costs, either on the general issue or the special issues.

Yes, the statute of Anne did not apply; nor does it in this case, because there is no plea here found for the defendant, which, independently of Lord Denman's Act, would give him the general costs. The 7th rule of Hilary term, 4 Will. 4, does not apply here; it is subservient to the statute of

Anne—Simpson v. Hardiss (6), Robinson v. Messenger (7), Fry v. Monckton (8); and the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. is subsequent to it.

Montague Smith, in support of the rule.—There are three distinct causes of action here, to which there are distinct lines of pleading, and on two of those causes of action the defendant has substantially succeeded, and the plaintiff has succeeded on the third, as to which it is admitted that the verdict being under 40s., and there being no certificate under Lord Denman's Act, he is entitled to no costs. The plaintiff, however, is entitled to the costs of those issues found for him which are applicable to the causes of action on which the defendant has succeeded. This case is distinguishable from Newton v. Rowe, where there was but one cause of action, and all the issues on the record were found for the plaintiff. The present plaintiff seeks to have these costs, not in respect of "such verdict," that is, the verdict for less than 40s., but in respect of a verdict on different matters, and under the statute of Anne, contending that there are two causes of action, to which the defendant has pleaded several useless pleas, which have been found for the plaintiff, while the fact of the defendant having succeeded on those causes of action prevents their being of necessity frivolous under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. In Howard v. Cheshire all the issues were found for the plaintiff. The effect of the statute of 4 & 5 Anne was to allow the plaintiff costs where the defendant pleaded several pleas and succeeded on one only—Spencer v. Hamerton (9), where, in an action of libel, the defendant having succeeded on the general issue, which went to the whole cause of action, the plaintiff was allowed the costs of several special pleas found for him. The result of the argument on the other side is, that the plaintiff is in a much worse position than if he had lost the verdict on the new assignment.

To a declaration, containing three counts, the defendant, who had appeared by attorney, obtained a rule generally to plead coverture and the Statute of Limitations, and, accordingly, pleaded those pleas to the whole declaration. The pleas were set aside by a Judge at chambers, on the ground that a defendant could not appear by attorney and plead coverture. The defendant then, without obtaining a fresh rule to plead, pleaded to the first two counts, coverture, and to the whole declaration, the Statute of Limitations, whereupon the plaintiff signed judgment:—Held, that the judgment was irregular, for as the rule to plead had not been set aside, the defendant was at liberty to plead the pleas in question, and was not bound by the terms of the rule to plead them to the whole of the declaration.

This was an action on two promissory notes, and the declaration contained two counts on the notes, and a third count on an account stated. The defendant, who was a married woman, appeared by attorney, and having obtained a rule in general terms to plead coverture and the Statute of Limitations, pleaded those pleas to the whole declaration. A summons was afterwards obtained, and an order made thereon for setting aside these pleas, on the ground that a married woman could not appear by attorney, and the defendant had two days' time to plead de novo. The defendant thereupon, without entering a fresh appearance, or obtaining a fresh rule to plead, pleaded the Statute of Limitations to the whole declaration, and coverture to the first and second counts. The plaintiff, under these circumstances, having signed judgment as for want of a plea, Platt, B. made an order to set it aside, with costs to be paid by the plaintiff.

Unthank moved for a rule, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the order of Platt, B., setting aside the judgment signed by the plaintiff, should not be rescinded, or why a rule to plead several matters should not be set aside. It is submitted that the judgment was regular, and that the order setting it aside must be rescinded. First, the rule to plead several matters directed the plaintiff to plead the pleas in question to the whole declaration, whereas she has confined one of her pleas to the first two counts.

[PARKE, B.—The rule does not specify to which counts the pleas are to be pleaded; it is a permission to the defendant to plead the pleas in any manner she may think fit.]

Secondly, when the Judge set aside the pleas, he in fact set aside the rule to plead; the defendant, therefore, could not plead the same pleas again without a fresh rule to plead.

[PARKE, B.—The first rule is a sufficient sanction for the pleas as they were last pleaded; it does not tie the defendant down to plead them in any particular form. The pleas were warranted by the order, and my Brother Platt was right in setting aside the judgment, as it ought not to have been signed.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—If the defendant in the first instance made a bad use of the rule to plead, there is no reason why she should not afterwards make a good use of it. There will be no rule.

PARKE, B.—The pleas were set aside on a collateral ground, that the defendant ought not to appear by attorney and plead coverture. The judgment signed was irregular, for the defendant was right in availing herself of the pleas ultimately pleaded by her.

Ship and Shipping—Supercargo—Commission—"Net Proceeds."

The following letter was addressed to a captain and supercargo by his employers:—
"Your commissions are 6l. per cent. on the net proceeds of your homeward cargo, after deducting the usual charges as arranged by the African Association, viz., 4l. per ton from the gross sales of the oil when taken from the quay, and 4l. 15s. when warehoused:—Held, upon the construction of this letter, (Parke, B. and Rolfe, B. dubitantibus,) that the commissions were payable only upon the proceeds which came to hand, after deducting bad debts upon the sales.

Debt, for work and labour, care, diligence, journeys, and attendances, as the factor and agent of the defendants, and for commission in respect thereof, for money paid, for interest, and on an account stated. The defendant pleaded nunquam indebitatus, acceptance in satisfaction and discharge, and set-off. The particulars of demand shewed that the action was brought to recover 2,275*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* for commission on several cargoes of palm oil. The particulars of set-off shewed various items and cash payments to an amount exceeding the sum claimed.

At the trial, before Rolfe, B., at the Lancashire Spring Assizes, 1847, it appeared that the plaintiff had for many years been in the employ of the defendants, as master and supercargo; and the matter in dispute between the parties was, whether, upon the following document, the plaintiff, as captain on an African voyage, was entitled to a commission of 6*l.* per cent. on the proceeds of his homeward cargo of palm oil, on the amount of sales, without any deduction in respect of bad debts, arising out of the failure of parties, to whom portions of the oil had been sold.

"Liverpool, February 3, 1845.

"Captain Charles Caine,

"Your commissions are 6*l.* per cent. on the net proceeds of your homeward cargo, after deducting the usual charges as arranged by the African Association, viz., 4*l.* per ton, from the gross sales of the oil when taken from the quay, and 4*l.* 15*s.* when warehoused. No commissions allowed in watered oil. We are, &c.,

"Charles Horsfall & Son."

There was evidence that, in ordinary mercantile language, "net proceeds" meant exclusive of bad debts.

The learned Judge was of opinion that the defendants should be allowed to deduct losses, sustained by reason of bad debts, on certain sales of portions of the cargo, before the plaintiff was entitled to his commission; and his Lordship nonsuited the plaintiff, with leave to enter a verdict for 370*l.*, if the Court should think his construction of the instrument wrong. A rule having been obtained accordingly,

W. H. Watson and Forsyth now shewed cause.—The object of this commission on the homeward cargo, beyond the regular wages, is to ensure the energy and skill of the captain as supercargo in a hazardous employment, and the proceeds of the adventure are as it were divided between the parties in certain proportions, so that a loss to the property, by bad debts or otherwise, incurred without the default of either party, ought not to fall on one only. The true meaning of the document is, that the plaintiff is to have a commission of 6*l.* per cent. on the sum actually received; it means on the net proceeds when ascertained, or on the money which actually comes into the defendants' hands. It cannot mean that the 6*l.* per cent. is to be calculated on the value of the cargo, because the sales must be made, and the charges thereof taken into account. Moreover, there might be a total destruction of the cargo by fire, and in that case the plaintiff would clearly be subject to the loss of his commission. A bad debt cannot be said to be part of the proceeds of the cargo.

[PARKE, B.—Take the letter altogether, and what do you say to it?]

It strengthens the defendants' view of the meaning of the words "net proceeds," inasmuch as it shews that all charges are to be deducted; the charges of 4*l.* per ton, when taken from the quay, and 4*l.* 15*s.* when warehoused, being specified merely on account of their being of a fluctuating nature. That is a limitation on a peculiar and uncertain class of charges. Cases might arise in which it would be impossible to carry out the view contended for on the other side. Suppose, for instance, the case of a fraudulent purchase of a portion of the cargo, the owner might maintain trover, and revest himself with the goods, and then there might be a subsequent sale, for a less sum, the price having fallen in the mean time; on which sale would the commission be payable? Or suppose the goods landed, and then injured or destroyed by fire before sale. It does not mean that the 6*l.* per cent. shall be paid on a nominal contract of sale, but on the net proceeds, or sum realized. The words "after deducting," &c. is a mere statement of deduction of particular charges. The expression "net proceeds" has the same meaning as "net profits," used in Storey vs Partnership, p. 62. The plaintiff trusts to the care and prudence of his employer in making the sales; and he could not be liable to loss, though in some cases he might not get much profit.

Martin and Cowling, in support of the rule.—The whole letter, which is a letter of instructions, must be read together; and it is then plain that “net proceeds” there means not on an account current, but the amount of gross sales, less the 4*l.* or 4*l.* 15*s.* per ton. The captain, who acts as supercargo, has discharged his duty by expending his labour and skill in procuring and bringing home a cargo; and is it reasonable to suppose that the intention could be that he should be deprived of his compensation for it, by bad debts incurred by sales over which he had not the least controul?

[PARKE, B.—The 4*l.* per ton only includes dock charges; you would be making the owner pay commission on brokerage.]

It means 6*l.* per cent. on amount of the sales, deducting the charges of the sale at the time. The letter shews that the African charges are to be deducted from the gross sales, and then the 6*l.* per cent. is to be calculated on the residue.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged.—I have always understood that in construing an act of parliament, or a deed, or a contract, we ought to read the words in their ordinary sense, and not to alter their general signification unless it is quite clear that they are used in a different sense. This document is an agreement for a commission of 6*l.* per cent. on the net proceeds of a homeward cargo, after deducting the usual charges, &c. viz. a specified sum per ton from the gross sales thereof when taken from the quay and when warehoused. The question is, what is the meaning of that? I do not entertain any doubt that it means that the 6*l.* per cent. is to be payable on the sum actually received after making all deductions, and not on what is nominally received as the amount of the sales, without taking into consideration deficiencies arising from losses by bad debts or otherwise. It is contended that the proper construction of this contract is, that the commission is payable on the amount of sales, after deducting the specified sum per ton only, and that the words “net proceeds” are explained and controuled by those subsequent words; so that it is proposed to read it thus: “Your commissions are 6*l.* per cent. on the net proceeds of your homeward cargo,” that is to say, “after deducting the usual charges,” &c. But why should we so read it?—and if not, the words “net proceeds” must be understood here to mean what they ordinarily mean in mercantile language. The correct way of reading the letter is as if it began thus: “After deducting the usual charges, &c. then your commission is 6*l.* per cent. on the net proceeds.” There would be little difficulty then if you only give the words “net proceeds” their ordinary and proper meaning. So that I think this is a contract to pay commission on the net proceeds, with a stipulation for a deduction of 4*l.* per ton in respect of certain particular charges. As to this being a hard bargain for the plaintiff, that cannot make any difference in the construction of the letter; but I do not see the hardship. It is said that the plaintiff gets nothing for his labour; nor ought he unless the owner receives some remuneration for the outlay of his capital. He is pretty certain to get his commission on some part of the cargo. It is said he has no controul over the sales, but the owner has so large an interest in taking care that the sales are properly made that the captain’s risk in that particular is but small. There is a necessity for trust on both sides. I own I think the case very clear, and that the rule should be discharged.

PARKE, B.—I concur in opinion that this rule should be discharged. In the course of the argument I entertained some doubt (and I cannot say that it is entirely removed) on the only view of this question in which it is open to doubt; but the best course seems to be to adopt the construction put on this letter at the trial, which is, certainly, not an unreasonable one. It is said the captain has no controul over the sales, and that it is a hardship on him, after his labour in procuring a cargo, to be at the mercy of the owner; but the answer is, that the captain trusts the owner of the cargo to get the best price for it; and as ninety-four parts belong to the owner and the captain has but six, that seems reasonable enough. The expression “net proceeds” means the sum which comes into the defendants’ pocket; and the short question is, whom the said shares should be allotted by a committee of management of the said proposed company. That before and at the time of the defendant's application for shares, and the making of his said promise as hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs formed and were the committee of management of the said proposed company. That before the making of the promise by the defendant as hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 8th of October A.D. 1845, the defendant applied to the plaintiffs, then forming and being such committee of management as aforesaid, and requested them to allot him, the defendant, fifty of the said shares in the said proposed company, and then undertook to accept the same, or any less number that might be allotted to him; and thereupon heretofore, to wit, on the 25th of November 1845, the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, allotted to him thirty-five of the said shares in the said company, upon certain terms then agreed upon by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that is to say, that a deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* upon each and every of the said shares so allotted to him as aforesaid, making in the whole a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 73*l.* 10*s.*, should be paid by him the defendant, on or before the 9th of December A.D. 1845, to the account of the said company, to one of certain bankers then appointed and agreed upon in that behalf, to wit, the London and County Joint-Stock Bank, Lombard Street, and Brighton, and at their several country branches, and Messrs. Hall, West, & Borrer, Union Bank, Brighton, of all which premises the defendant afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, had notice; and thereupon, in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, then, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, promised the defendant to perform and fulfil the said terms on their part, the defendant then promised the plaintiffs to perform and fulfil the said terms on his the defendant's part, and although the plaintiffs were always ready and willing to perform and fulfil the said terms in all things on their part, and although the said 9th day of December elapsed after the said promise of the said defendant, and before the commencement of this suit, of all which premises the defendant hath always had notice; yet the defendant, disregarding his said promise, did not, nor would on or before the said 9th of December, pay, nor hath he since paid, to any or either of the said bankers, or at any of their banks, either in London or elsewhere, or to any other person, to the account of the said company, the said deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* per share; but hath wholly neglected so to do. By means of which said premises the plaintiffs have been and are greatly injured and damaged," &c.

The defendant's points as marked for argument were: first, that the declaration is bad both in form and substance, and shews no sufficient cause of action; secondly, that the matters therein stated are not sufficient from which to imply the promise alleged; thirdly, that the only consideration stated for the promise declared on is, the allotment to the defendant of shares in a company which the plaintiffs and others once upon a time before the making of the promise had agreed with each other to endeavour to form, but which said agreement and the formation of the said company and all endeavours to form the same may (consistently with the said declaration) have been given up and abandoned long before the said allotment or promise, and that such consideration is insufficient to sustain the said promise; fourthly, that the declaration is wanting in certainty in not stating whether the formation of the company commenced before or after the coming into operation of the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; fifthly, that if the formation of the company commenced before the coming into operation of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. all the several parties to the agreement for its formation, and not the plaintiffs alone, ought to have sued in this action, and if the formation commenced after the said act came into operation, then the declaration ought to have shewn that the plaintiffs were according to the act entitled to allot shares and receive deposits, and that the deposits sued for are such as the act authorizes; sixthly, that the declaration ought to have shewn with certainty that the defendant accepted the allotment; seventhly, that the declaration ought to have stated with certainty the terms which the plaintiffs are alleged to have promised to fulfil, and been ready and willing to fulfil.

of 1*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* for," &c.; that Laffeatty held the bill upon the terms that the said debt should be set off against the said sum so due from the defendant to Laffeatty upon the bill; that Laffeatty, in order to deprive the defendant of his right of set-off in respect of the said sum of 1*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, and in fraud of the defendant, and in collusion with the plaintiffs, and contrary to the said terms, indorsed the bill to the plaintiffs; and that the plaintiffs were suing in this action only as agents of Laffeatty, according to the said fraud and collusion. Verification.

The plaintiffs thereupon signed judgment, on the ground that the plea was not issuable, and a rule having been obtained to set aside this judgment,—

Petersdorff shewed cause.—The judgment was properly signed, for the plea is not issuable. In the first part, it professes to answer a part only of the plaintiffs' demand; and in the latter part, to be a good answer to the whole declaration. Parratt v. Goddard (1) decides that pleas pleaded in form to the whole declaration, but applicable to one count only, are not issuable pleas. The plea is also bad on another ground. The plaintiffs could not safely go to trial upon this plea.—He referred to Thomson v. Redman (2).

Hawkins, in support of the rule.—The plea answers the whole of the declaration, and is an issuable plea. The defendant would not be entitled, in an action against him by an innocent indorsee, to set off the debt due to him from Laffeatty the drawer —Burrough v. Moss (3). The plea states that the bill was fraudulently indorsed over, in order to deprive the defendant of his right of set-off. The case would have been different if there had been no fraud, and the bill had been transferred to the plaintiffs in the ordinary course of business.

[ALDERSON, B.—The set-off may perhaps be good as to 1*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* The plea, however, is not issuable; it does not enable the plaintiffs to go to trial upon the merits. I do not say what the result would have been if the effect of the plea had been to get rid of the set-off to the whole amount.]

The plea is founded on Watkins v. Bensusan (4). That was an action by an indorsee against the acceptor of a bill, and the plea was that before the drawer indorsed it he owed the defendant a sum of money exceeding the amount of the bill; that after the bill became due, and in order to deprive the defendant of his right of set-off in respect of the debt, he fraudulently indorsed the bill to enable the plaintiffs to sue the defendant on the bill, and without any consideration for the indorsement. This was held to be an issuable plea.

[ALDERSON, B.—The plea here states that the plaintiffs are fraudulently suing for the whole sum secured by the bill, whereas, in fact, they are entitled to part only. The defendant had better plead the plea as to 1*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, and bring the remainder into court. The plea is not pleaded to issue.]

The defendant has an affidavit of merits.

Per Curiam.—The rule will be discharged unless the defendant bring the balance into court within seven days, and consent to a change of venue. If he comply with these terms, the rule will be absolute for setting aside the judgment.

The Lord Chief Baron was of opinion that under the terms of the subscribers' agreement the action could not be maintained, and nonsuited the plaintiff, with leave to him to move to enter a verdict.

Knowles now moved accordingly.—It is manifest that the deposit of 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* per share consisted of 2*s.* 6*d.* per share, being 10*s.* per 100*l.* on each 25*l.* share deposited in pursuance of the 23rd clause of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. for the general purposes of the undertaking, and the residue, 2*l.* 10*s.* per share, being the 10*l.* per cent. required to be deposited by the standing orders of parliament. Now, the 23rd clause defines and limits the powers of the directors. Under it they can only receive on the shares at the rate of 10*s.* in every 100*l.* for the general purposes of the concern, and the further deposit of 10*l.* per cent. is for a specific purpose only, and cannot be legally appropriated to any other purpose. The terms of the subscribers' agreement, therefore, must be understood as applying only to that portion of the plaintiff's demand which consists of the deposit of 10*s.* per 100*l.*, viz. 2*l.* 10*s.* of the 52*l.* 10*s.* deposited, and as respects that sum, it may be that the plaintiff ought not to recover. The deed, however, does not create a partnership, and the remaining 50*l.*, or 10*l.* per cent. deposit required by the standing orders, not having been used as under the act of parliament it only could be used, and the scheme being at an end, is money received by the defendant to the plaintiff's use, and recoverable in this action—*Nockels v. This deed does not use words sufficient for that purpose.

[PARKE, B.—It amounts very nearly to that, because it empowers the directors to go on with the undertaking, or any part of it, and to employ the money which may come to their hands in paying and satisfying all costs or liabilities which they sustained in relation to the undertaking. So that the effect of the agreement is, that if the undertaking went on the money was to be deposited under the standing orders; if it did not go on, there was to be this disposition of it.]

The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 23. limits the amount of such disposition of the money deposited to that part of it which consists of the 10*s.* in every 100*l.*; and the subscribers never intended to give any right to the directors to expend in preliminary steps any part of the deposit of 10*l.* per cent.

Per Curiam.—The plaintiff has by this deed disposed of his own money, and there never was a time when it was money in the defendant's hands to the plaintiff's use. The nonsuit was therefore right.

In fact he never signed the sub-* plaintiffs alone; and that all ought to have sued jointly. The declaration, however, appears to me to shew a consideration in respect of which the plaintiffs may have a sufficient interest to sue the defendant. I think that on the face of the contract, as stated here, there is a sufficient consideration to support the promise alleged, if any such were made by the defendant.

Other objections (of form only) are made; and Mr. Maynard has urged upon our consideration that the declaration shews that there were certain terms to be performed by the plaintiffs, without shewing what those terms were; and on this ground he contends that the declaration is defective. Now as to the effect of a declaration, which merely refers to certain terms, as forming part of the consideration for the contract declared on, whether or not it would be open to such an objection on special demurrer, I give no opinion. I doubt whether it would not come within the rule long established, and recognized in the case of Cryps v. Baynton (14), which was an action upon a promise by the defendant to pay for necessities provided to a third person, and the declaration which averred generally that necessities were provided, was objected to, for not shewing what necessities were provided; and it was held good without such special shewing, for the avoiding of multiplicities of reckonings. It is, however, unnecessary to consider this case in that view, because I think that there are terms fully stated in this declaration, which are sufficient to support the promise. The allegation is, that the shares "were allotted to the defendant upon certain terms then agreed upon by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that is to say, that a deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.*, upon each and every of the said shares so allotted to him, as aforesaid, making in the whole," &c., "should be paid by him, the defendant, on or before the 9th of December 1845, to the account of the said company, to one of certain bankers, then appointed and agreed upon in that behalf, to wit," &c.; and it adds, "of all which premises the defendant had notice; and, thereupon, in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, then, to wit, on &c., promised the defendant to perform and fulfil the said terms on their part, the defendant then promised the plaintiffs to perform and fulfil the said terms on his, the defendant's, part." Now it is said that there may be more terms, but I think such an objection cannot be taken advantage of on special demurrer, though it may be otherwise available. For instance, on the plea of non assumpsit, if, at the trial, it appeared there were more terms, there would be a variance between the plaintiffs' proof and their declaration; and the defendant would succeed upon that. If these terms require anything to be done, either expressly or by implication, the plaintiffs, no doubt, were bound to do what they promised; but, if those terms do not express anything as requisite to be done, then the reference to them, in this declaration, is surplusage. The plaintiffs promise to do all that on their parts was to be done; but they were not bound to ascertain and allege the extent of their obligation, either express or implied. There certainly was an implied promise to some extent, if only to keep their accounts at particular bankers, or, if they changed their bankers, to give the defendant notice; and if there was any implied promise, we cannot treat this as surplusage. I think none of the objections, either of substance or form, are well founded, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment upon this demurrer.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. As to the question of illegality, I think that on the face of this declaration we must presume the transaction to have been legal. It may be that it was illegal, if the company were not registered; but though the company were not registered, the transaction may have been legal, because it is consistent with the allegations of this declaration that the company was formed before the 1st of November 1844. If the facts were not so, the defendant should have shewn that by plea, which he has not done. Then, with respect to Woolmer v. Toby, it does not govern the present case; because, in Woolmer v. Toby, the proof did not correspond with the allegation in the declaration. There the consideration for the contract was stated to be with A, B, and C, whereas the proof was, that it was with D, E, and F. The statement here is, that the defendant's promise was made with the managing commit-and for the plaintiff on not guilty to the new assignment, with a farthing damages: the other pleas were all found for the plaintiff. There was no certificate under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24:—Held, that the trespasses in the three closes were divisible causes of action; and that the plaintiff was entitled under the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. ss. 4. and 5. to the costs of the issues found for him as to closes A. and B, on which he had failed; but that under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. he was entitled to no costs in respect to close C, on which he had succeeded, but had recovered less than 40s. damages. So that the effect of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. combined with the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. ss. 4. and 5. as construed by decided cases is, that the plaintiff is in a better condition by bringing an action in which he fails altogether, than by bringing a frivolous one in which he succeeds. The defendant when he succeeds is punished by the one statute if he improperly plead pleas which he cannot support, and the plaintiff when he succeeds is punished by the other statute if he brings a frivolous action.

Trespass. First count for breaking and entering certain closes of the plaintiff, situate in the parish of Ilminster, in the county of Somerset, that is to say, a certain close being part of a certain field called "Six Acres," &c., a certain other close called "Five Acres," and a certain other close called "Northovers," and there, &c. Second count for breaking and entering a certain other close in the said parish of Ilminster, to wit, a certain close, (describing it by abutments,) and there, &c. The defendant pleaded, first, not guilty to the whole declaration, and to the first count he pleaded secondly, that the several closes in the said first count mentioned were not nor was either of them, or any part thereof, at &c., the closes of the plaintiff, modo et formâ. Thirdly, a public footway over the said closes in which, &c., in the said first count mentioned, justifying the said trespasses under a user of the said way, and concluding with a verification. Fourthly, a footway by user for twenty years, as of right and without interruption by the defendant and others, as occupiers of Eames's Mill Farm, in the said parish of Ilminster, justifying the said trespasses thereunder, and con-

Replications—As to the first and second pleas, issue joined. As to so much of the third plea as relates to two of the closes in the first count mentioned, to wit, the said close being parcel of the field called "Six Acres," and the said close called "Five Acres," a denial of the public footway, modo et formâ, &c.: and as to so much of the said third plea as relates to the close in the first count mentioned, called "Northovers," a new assignment of trespasses extra viam. As to the fourth and fifth pleas, a denial of the user for twenty and forty years respectively, modo et formâ. Not guilty was pleaded to the new assignment, and issues having been joined, the cause was tried, before Williams, J., at the Somersetshire Summer Assizes, 1847, when a verdict was found on the plea of not guilty, for the plaintiff, on the first count, and for the defendant on the second count. On the second plea, the verdict was for the plaintiff. On the third plea, as to "Six Acres" and "Five Acres," the verdict was for the defendant. On the new assignment of trespasses extra viam as to "Northovers," the verdict was for the plaintiff, with one farthing damages. The issues on the fourth and fifth pleas were found for the plaintiff. There was no certificate under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. The Master having on taxation refused to tax the plaintiff any costs, a rule was obtained, calling on the defendant to shew cause why the Master should not review his taxation.

Taprell (Nov. 22) shewed cause.—The Master was right in not taxing the plaintiff the costs of the issues found for him. The question turns on the construction of Lord Denman's Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. The words in the statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. s. 5, are only that costs shall be given at the discretion of the Court; and under the statute 43 Eliz. c. 6, the rule of practice was, that if there was a certificate under that statute, the plaintiff should not have the costs of any plea pleaded with leave of the Court, although the issue thereon was found for him, and the Judge had not certified that the defendant had a probable cause for so pleading—Hovard v. Cheshire (1). Lord

(1) Sayer, 260.

Denman's Act was framed with the same object as the stat. of Eliz., which it recites, viz., to avoid trifling and frivolous suits; and by that act, if a plaintiff brings what by the verdict of a jury for him with less damages than 40s., is shewn to be a frivolous action, he is not to recover in respect of such verdict any costs whatever.

[ALDERSON, B.—The words of the stat. of Eliz. are remarkable, viz., that where the debt or damages to be recovered shall not amount to 40s., the Judge shall not award for costs to the party plaintiff any greater or more costs than the damages recovered.]

Lord Denman's Act does not contemplate a division of causes of action, for the purposes of costs; and where a plaintiff recovers less than 40s., and the Judge does not certify, the action is frivolous, and the plaintiff is to have no costs at all—Marriott v. Stanley (2). It ought, like all statutes which deprive a plaintiff of costs, to be construed generally and liberally, and not to be limited—Irwine v. Reddish (3). The statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. ss. 4, 5, does not apply here. That statute only applies where there is a plea found for the defendant, which would entitle him to the general costs of the cause—Richmond v. Johnson (4); here the plaintiff would, but for Lord Denman's Act, be entitled to the postea. The case of Newton v. Rowe (5) is in point. That was an action of libel to which the defendant pleaded the general issue, and several special pleas; and the plaintiff had a verdict with one farthing damages; and there was no certificate under Lord Denman's Act; and it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any costs, either on the general issue or the special issues.

Yes, the statute of Anne did not apply; nor does it in this case, because there is no plea here found for the defendant, which, independently of Lord Denman's Act, would give him the general costs. The 7th rule of Hilary term, 4 Will. 4, does not apply here; it is subservient to the statute of

Anne—Simpson v. Hardiss (6), Robinson v. Messenger (7), Fry v. Monckton (8); and the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. is subsequent to it.

Montague Smith, in support of the rule.—There are three distinct causes of action here, to which there are distinct lines of pleading, and on two of those causes of action the defendant has substantially succeeded, and the plaintiff has succeeded on the third, as to which it is admitted that the verdict being under 40s., and there being no certificate under Lord Denman's Act, he is entitled to no costs. The plaintiff, however, is entitled to the costs of those issues found for him which are applicable to the causes of action on which the defendant has succeeded. This case is distinguishable from Newton v. Rowe, where there was but one cause of action, and all the issues on the record were found for the plaintiff. The present plaintiff seeks to have these costs, not in respect of "such verdict," that is, the verdict for less than 40s., but in respect of a verdict on different matters, and under the statute of Anne, contending that there are two causes of action, to which the defendant has pleaded several useless pleas, which have been found for the plaintiff, while the fact of the defendant having succeeded on those causes of action prevents their being of necessity frivolous under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. In Howard v. Cheshire all the issues were found for the plaintiff. The effect of the statute of 4 & 5 Anne was to allow the plaintiff costs where the defendant pleaded several pleas and succeeded on one only—Spencer v. Hamerton (9), where, in an action of libel, the defendant having succeeded on the general issue, which went to the whole cause of action, the plaintiff was allowed the costs of several special pleas found for him. The result of the argument on the other side is, that the plaintiff is in a much worse position than if he had lost the verdict on the new assignment.

The judgment of the Court (10) was now delivered by—

POLLOCK, C.B.—In this case the plaintiff brought an action for several trespasses, in three different closes, Six Acres, Five Acres, and Northovers, in one count. In the second count, in another close. Not guilty was pleaded to all; secondly, not the plaintiff's closes; thirdly, a public way over the three closes in the first count. Fourthly and fifthly, a private way over the three closes, by prescription, twenty years' user, and forty years' user. These four latter pleas were to the first count alone. The replications took issue on the first and second pleas and traversed all the others, except that of public way, so far as related to Northovers, as to which the plaintiff newly assigned trespasses extra viam, which was denied by the rejoinder.

On not guilty the verdict was for the plaintiff on the first count; for the defendant on the second. On the second plea for the plaintiff. On the third, as to Six Acres and Five Acres, for the defendant. On the new assignment for the plaintiff, with one farthing damages. And the issues on the fourth and fifth pleas were found for the plaintiff.

The Master refused to tax the plaintiff any costs, and a rule nisi was obtained to review the taxation.

Upon this record it appears that the plaintiff has altogether failed, and the defendant has succeeded with respect to the causes of action in two closes; but that he has pleaded as to those causes of action four several unnecessary pleas, on which the plaintiff had a verdict. With respect to the cause of action for trespasses in the third close, the plaintiff has brought an action, in respect of which he has obtained only one farthing damages, and so far, therefore, as relates to that cause of action, the effect of Lord Denman's Act is to deprive the plaintiff of all costs. This result is a punishment for having brought a frivolous action for that cause; and there is no doubt that if the plaintiff had sued for that cause of action alone, and there had been special pleadings all found for him, he would have lost all the costs of all the issues, as was properly decided in the case of Newton v. Rowe. In such a case the statute 4 Anne, c. 16. does not apply, for no one plea to the cause of action is found for the defendant. In such case it may be that there is an inconvenience (as suggested in this case) as contrasted with the case of a verdict for the defendant upon the plea of not guilty, and for the plaintiff on the justifications. But in the case where the defendant so succeeds, the matter in dispute may have really been of serious amount to the plaintiff; whereas when the plaintiff succeeds, it is, by the verdict of the jury, ascertained to be so frivolous that the legislature has thought no action at all should have been brought in respect of it. "Other hardships," as my Brother Maule, in Newton v. Rowe, properly observed, "might possibly be suggested, but no doubt the legislature has thought that all these are outweighed by the advantages to result from the discouragement of petty litigation." We concur entirely in that decision, and if there had here been a set of special pleas to the new assignment, all found for the plaintiff, the plaintiff could still have had no costs whatever in respect thereof.

But here there is a divisible cause of action, in respect of the trespasses in two of the three closes in the first count. We have held such a cause of action to be divisible in ejectment—Doe d. Bowman v. Lewis (11), as it had been previously held to be divisible in other cases, as in Cox v. Thomason (12), and other authorities on this point. The plaintiff, therefore, with respect to these causes of action, is not in the position of a person bringing a frivolous action, but in that of a person who has brought an action, it may be, for a real grievance, but in which he has failed. If this action had been brought for that cause alone, it is clear that, under the statute of 4 Anne, c. 16, the plaintiff would have been entitled to the costs of those issues found for him, there being also issues found for the defendant, giving the general costs of the cause to him; for that statute applies to cases where one or more issues are found for the defendant—Richmond v. Johnson.

(10) Pollock, C.B., Parke, B., Alderson, B., and Rolfe, B.

Being of opinion that the causes of action are divisible, we think that this case is to be treated as if it were a separate action for the trespasses in two closes, and consequently, that the plaintiff is entitled to have the costs of the issues found for him, as to those closes, taxed; but he is entitled to no costs in respect of the third close. The consequence is that the plaintiff is in a better condition by bringing an action, in which he fails altogether, than by bringing a frivolous one, in which he succeeds. But this, we think, is the true result of Lord Denman's Act, combined with the cases, as establishing the proper construction of the statute of Anne.

It is, however, to be observed, that the defendant, when he succeeds, is punished by the one statute for improperly pleading pleas which he cannot support; and the plaintiff, when he succeeds, is punished by the other statute for bringing a frivolous suit. The rule, therefore, must be absolute for the Master to review his taxation.

ALDERSON, B. added,—It comes to this; the legislature punishes a defendant who, being in the right, has improperly pleaded, while, on the other hand, it punishes a plaintiff, where, being in the right, he uses that right for frivolous and vexatious purposes.

Assumpsit—Consideration—Right to sue.

Assumpsit. The declaration alleged that in consideration that the plaintiff and W. D. would sell and assign to the defendant their copartnership business the defendant promised the plaintiff to pay him all the money he had advanced in respect of the co-partnership, and for which the co-partnership was accountable to the plaintiff. The declaration then averred performance by the plaintiff and W. D., and that the plaintiff, at the time of the promise, had advanced a sum of money in respect of the co-partnership, for which the co-partnership was, at the time of the promise, accountable to him, alleging, as a breach, the non-payment of that sum by the defendant:—Held, that the declaration disclosed a sufficient consideration to entitle the plaintiff to sue alone.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that one W. Dalton and the plaintiff carried on the business of ironmongers in co-partnership; that in consideration that he, the plaintiff, and the said W. Dalton would sell and assign to the defendant the said co-partnership business and the stock in trade, and would become trustees for the defendant in respect of all debts and rights due or belonging to them, the plaintiff and the said W. Dalton, as such co-partners, by assigning to the defendant all their beneficial interest in the said debts and rights, and would put the defendant in possession of the said business and stock in trade, he, the defendant, promised the plaintiff to pay him all the money that he, the plaintiff, had advanced in respect of the co-partnership, and for which, at the time of the promise, the co-partnership was accountable to the plaintiff; and also promised the plaintiff and W. Dalton that he, the defendant, would discharge all the debts due from the plaintiff and W. Dalton, as such co-partners, and all liabilities to which they were subject as such co-partners; that the plaintiff and W. Dalton in a reasonable time did sell and assign to the defendant the said co-partnership business and the stock in trade, then being of the value of 500*l.*, and became trustees for the defendant in respect of all debts and rights due or belonging to them, the said plaintiff and the said W. Dalton, by their assigning to the defendant all their beneficial interest in the said debts and rights, and put the defendant into possession of the said business and stock in trade; that he, the plaintiff, had, at the time of the promise, advanced in respect of the co-partnership, money amounting to 112*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*, for which money the said co-partnership was at the time of the promise accountable to the plaintiff. Breach, non-payment of the last-mentioned sum. The declaration also contained the common counts.

The cause having been tried, and the plaintiff having obtained a verdict on the first count,—

Martin moved to arrest the judgment.—The plaintiff is not entitled to sue alone in this case. Dalton ought to have joined with him, it being a rule that all the persons from whom the consideration moves ought to be the parties to bring the action. The contract belongs to the persons from whom the consideration moves, and it is immaterial to whom the promise is made.

[PARKE, B.—The consideration in this case is, the separate interest of the plaintiff in the partnership fund; he has a larger interest in it than his partner.]

This question was argued at great length in Lord Bentinck v. Connop (1), where the point is stated, although the argument is not given in the report. Either party might have released this contract.

[PARKE, B. referred to Price v. Easton (2), and Crow v. Rogers (3).]

POLLOCK, C.B.—There will be no rule, as no authority has been cited in support of the defendant's argument.

PARKE, B.—There is a consideration in this case, namely, the joint interest of the plaintiff and Dalton in the partnership fund. That is a sufficient consideration to support the defendant's promise to pay.

ALDERSON, B. and ROLFE, B. concurred.

Railway—Pleading—Contract—Allotment of Shares—Statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.

Declaration in assumpsit, that on a certain day, to wit, on &c. the plaintiffs had agreed together with divers, to wit, 200 other persons, to establish a joint-stock company for making a railway, which required the authority of parliament, the capital, to wit, &c. to be divided into shares of 20l. each, and a deposit of 2l. 2s. per share to be paid by the persons to whom they should be allotted by a committee of management; that the plaintiffs were the committee of management; that the plaintiffs, to wit, on &c., at the request of the defendant, allotted him thirty- five shares in the proposed company, upon certain terms then agreed upon between them, that is to say, that the deposit on each share should be paid by the defendant on a certain day, to certain bankers then agreed upon; and thereupon, in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, had promised the defendant to perform the said terms on their part, the defendant promised the plaintiffs to perform the said terms on his part. Averment of the plaintiffs' readiness and willingness; and, breach, the non-payment by the defendant of the deposit:—Held, on general demurrer, that the declaration disclosed a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant, on which they might sue him without joining the other members of the company. Also, that the declaration was good, though it did not allege that the company was provisionally registered pursuant to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, or that it was formed previously to the date of that act.

And held, on special demurrer, that the declaration was not bad for not alleging that the company was continuing when the shares were allotted to the defendant; nor for not shewing with sufficient certainty that the defendant accepted the allotment; nor for not shewing with certainty what the terms to be performed by the plaintiffs were.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that heretofore and before the making of the promise by the defendant hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 20th of August A.D. 1845, the plaintiffs had agreed together, with divers, to wit, 200 other persons, to endeavour to form and establish a certain joint-stock company or partnership undertaking, for the making, constructing, and working a certain railway, to be called "The Dorking, Brighton, and Arundel Atmospheric Railway," and to endeavour to obtain an act of parliament for that purpose, the said railway not being capable of being constructed without the authority of parliament; and the capital of which said proposed company or partnership undertaking was to consist of a certain sum of money, to wit, 1,000,000l. sterling, to be divided into 50,000 shares of 20l. each, and upon which a deposit of 2l. 2s. for each and every share was to be paid by such persons respectively as should apply for, and to whom the said shares should be allotted by a committee of management of the said proposed company. That before and at the time of the defendant's application for shares, and the making of his said promise as hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs formed and were the committee of management of the said proposed company. That before the making of the promise by the defendant as hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 8th of October A.D. 1845, the defendant applied to the plaintiffs, then forming and being such committee of management as aforesaid, and requested them to allot him, the defendant, fifty of the said shares in the said proposed company, and then undertook to accept the same, or any less number that might be allotted to him; and thereupon heretofore, to wit, on the 25th of November 1845, the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, allotted to him thirty-five of the said shares in the said company, upon certain terms then agreed upon by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that is to say, that a deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* upon each and every of the said shares so allotted to him as aforesaid, making in the whole a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 73*l.* 10*s.*, should be paid by him the defendant, on or before the 9th of December A.D. 1845, to the account of the said company, to one of certain bankers then appointed and agreed upon in that behalf, to wit, the London and County Joint-Stock Bank, Lombard Street, and Brighton, and at their several country branches, and Messrs. Hall, West, & Borrer, Union Bank, Brighton, of all which premises the defendant afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, had notice; and thereupon, in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, then, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, promised the defendant to perform and fulfil the said terms on their part, the defendant then promised the plaintiffs to perform and fulfil the said terms on his the defendant's part, and although the plaintiffs were always ready and willing to perform and fulfil the said terms in all things on their part, and although the said 9th day of December elapsed after the said promise of the said defendant, and before the commencement of this suit, of all which premises the defendant hath always had notice; yet the defendant, disregarding his said promise, did not, nor would on or before the said 9th of December, pay, nor hath he since paid, to any or either of the said bankers, or at any of their banks, either in London or elsewhere, or to any other person, to the account of the said company, the said deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* per share; but hath wholly neglected so to do. By means of which said premises the plaintiffs have been and are greatly injured and damaged," &c.

Special demurrer.

The defendant's points as marked for argument were: first, that the declaration is bad both in form and substance, and shews no sufficient cause of action; secondly, that the matters therein stated are not sufficient from which to imply the promise alleged; thirdly, that the only consideration stated for the promise declared on is, the allotment to the defendant of shares in a company which the plaintiffs and others once upon a time before the making of the promise had agreed with each other to endeavour to form, but which said agreement and the formation of the said company and all endeavours to form the same may (consistently with the said declaration) have been given up and abandoned long before the said allotment or promise, and that such consideration is insufficient to sustain the said promise; fourthly, that the declaration is wanting in certainty in not stating whether the formation of the company commenced before or after the coming into operation of the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; fifthly, that if the formation of the company commenced before the coming into operation of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. all the several parties to the agreement for its formation, and not the plaintiffs alone, ought to have sued in this action, and if the formation commenced after the said act came into operation, then the declaration ought to have shewn that the plaintiffs were according to the act entitled to allot shares and receive deposits, and that the deposits sued for are such as the act authorizes; sixthly, that the declaration ought to have shewn with certainty that the defendant accepted the allotment; seventhly, that the declaration ought to have stated with certainty the terms which the plaintiffs are alleged to have promised to fulfil, and been ready and willing to fulfil.

Butt, (Maynard with him) in support of the demurrer (Trinity term, June 9).—The first objection to the declaration is, that it does not state that the company were provisionally registered under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. ss. 4, 23, and 24. Provisional registration is necessary before the company can make any contract for allotting shares, and that fact ought to have been averred in the declaration.

[Pollock, C.B.—The defendant ought to have pleaded that the company had not been registered.]

The 1st, 2nd, 4th, and 23rd sections apply to this part of the argument.

[Pollock, C.B.—The defendant admits that he and the plaintiffs made a contract. In such a case is the plaintiff to aver that the contract is legal, or is the defendant to plead the illegality?]

The question is, whether the compliance with the requisites of the act of parliament is not a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right to sue. The defendant submits that it is, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to sue, unless they shew, on the face of the declaration, that they are within the act of parliament. Secondly, it does not appear, from the declaration, that any contract was made with the plaintiffs alone. It was made with all the parties who were engaged in the undertaking. In Woolmer v. Toby (1), the defendant was sued as an allottee of shares by the managing committee of a railway company, and the Court made absolute a rule for entering a nonsuit on the ground that the contract had been made by the defendant with the provisional committee. Here it is not alleged that the deposits were to be paid to the plaintiffs; but it is stated, that they were not paid to certain parties on account of the company. There is no express contract with the plaintiffs, and if there is any implied contract it is with the company. Thirdly, the consideration for the defendant's promise appears to be the allotment of shares in a proposed railway company, and it is consistent with the declaration that the project may have been abandoned before the allotment took place. Fourthly, the declaration does not contain any averment that the defendant accepted the allotment of shares. Fifthly, the declaration is defective in another particular; it states that, "in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, promised the defendant to fulfil the said terms on their part." Now, the "premises" are, that the 200 persons were endeavouring to form a company for making a railway: that the plaintiffs were the committee of management of the company, being a mere delegated body of those persons to whom the shares belonged. Again, the "terms" that the plaintiffs are alleged to have been bound to fulfil, are not stated with so much certainty that any promise on the part of the defendant to fulfil the terms on his part can be implied.

J. Brown (Martin with him) in support of the declaration (Michaelmas term, Nov. 12).—The first objection made on the other side is, that the declaration does not shew that the company had been provisionally registered, and so that the act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. not having been complied with, the company could not legally allot shares, and therefore the contract declared on was not shewn to be legal, and the declaration was bad on that ground. The answers to that objection are, first, that the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, which did not come into operation until the 1st of November 1844, applies only to companies formed after that day; and as the dates in this declaration are laid under *videlicet*s, for all that appears on the face of it this company may have been formed prior to the 1st of November 1844. Secondly, an illegality of this kind must not be presumed, but should be pleaded and proved by the party relying upon it—Daintree v. Hutchinson (2), where it was held, that the objection that a coursing match was illegal under the 16 Car. 2. c. 7, could not be taken advantage of unless specially pleaded. It is contended here that the registration was a condition precedent to the right to make this contract; but the contract is good at common law, and the true principle is that where a statute makes certain circumstances necessary to the validity of an act which in itself is valid at common law, that does not alter the manner of pleading in use before the statute—Bac. Abr. tit. 'Statute,' (L, 3). And in Stephen on Pleading, 3rd edit. p. 375, the rule is thus laid down, "Where a thing is originally made by act of parliament, and required to be in writing, it must be pleaded with all the circumstances required by the act; as in the case of a will of lands, it must be alleged to have been made in writing; but where an act makes writing necessary to a matter where it was not so at the common law, as where a lease for a longer term than three years is required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds, it is not necessary to plead the thing to be in writing, though it must be proved to be so in evidence." No person can act as a broker within the city of London unless he is duly licensed pursuant to 6 Anne, c. 16; but in an action by a broker to recover commission, the fact of his being licensed is never averred—Cope v. Rowlands (3). So in the case of a contract to perform at a theatre, which would be illegal unless the theatre were licensed; it is unnecessary to state the licence in the declaration—Astley v. Weldon (4).

(He was then stopped by the Court on that point.)

Then, secondly, it is objected that the declaration is framed upon a promise implied, if any can be implied, from facts which shew that the promise was made to all the members of the company, and not to the plaintiffs alone, and that all should have joined in suing, for which Woolmer v. Toby was cited. But on the declaration in that case, it did not appear that there was any provisional or managing committee, and the case turned on the sufficiency of the evidence, and not on any point of pleading. The case of Jones v. Robinson (5), which was decided in this court a few days ago, seems to shew, that although the consideration for a contract moves from several, one of them may declare on the contract, and allege the promise to be made to himself alone.

With respect to the formal objections, the first is, that it is consistent with this declaration that the projected establishment of the company might have been abandoned before the allotment of shares to the defendant. But the Court will not presume that, for it is a rule well established and recognized in the recent case, in this court, of Price v. Price (6), "that things are to be presumed to continue in the same state till the contrary appears" (7). There is nothing in the second formal objection, that it does not appear with certainty that the defendant accepted the allotment of shares, because the declaration expressly avers that the allotment was made at the defendant's request. The last objection is, that, inasmuch as the declaration avers the implied promise to be "in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs at the request of the defendant, promised the defendant to perform and fulfil the said terms on their part," it ought to have stated what the terms to be performed by the plaintiff were. But it does not appear that there were any terms to be performed by the plaintiff other than those stated in the declaration; and the allegation implying that there were may be rejected as surplusage,—utile per inutile non vitiatur. The rule is thus stated in 1 Chitty on Pleading, 6th edit., p. 295: "When part of an entire consideration, or one of several considerations, stated in a declaration, is merely frivolous and void, without being illegal, and the residue is good, and extends to the whole of the promise, the void part will not vitiate the declaration, but may be rejected as surplusage; and the promise will be referred to, and supported by that part of the consideration which is legally sufficient."

Maynard, in reply.—First, as to the point of illegality, it may be conceded that where a declaration states a consideration which may be legal under one state of facts, and illegal under another state of facts, the illegality must be pleaded; but where an implied contract is stated which can only be legal in one state of facts, it is different, and the declaration should aver all that is necessary to shew its legality. As to the case cited of Daintree v. Hutchinson it goes too far, because the declaration there shews the contract to be illegal, and it is sufficient if the illegality appears on any part of the record. In the case of an insurance on a ship, where, under the 19 Geo. 2. c. 37, it is necessary to the legality of the contract that the insurer shall have an interest in the subject-matter, it is usual to aver an interest. In Cousins v. Nantes (8) it was held, that a policy in the common form was a policy on interest, and that the declaration must aver in whom the interest vested. That case and Craufurd v. Hunter (9), are expressly in point. Executing contracts for the sale of stock not being in possession, are illegal under 7 Geo. 2. c. 8; and, accordingly, all the precedents contain an averment of possession in the party selling. The principle is laid down in Com. Dig. 'Pleader,' (C, 76), where it is said, "The plaintiff, in his declaration, ought to aver every fact, without being informed of which the Court cannot judge whether the plaintiff has cause of action. . . . So in all cases where any circumstances are required by the purview of an act to make it good, they ought to be averred; as, where the statute 1 R. 3, 1, makes a feoffment, &c. by cestuis que use of full age, sane, and at large, &c. good, he who pleads a feoffment by cestuis que use ought to aver that he was sane, of full age, and at large." Then as to the right of the plaintiffs to sue alone, the consideration moves from all the members of the company, and not from the plaintiffs alone. The interest is in the entire body, and the action is improperly brought by a section of it. In truth, Woolmer v. Toby governs this case, for the only difference is, that, in this case, the circumstances which there came out in evidence are stated on the record. On this point he cited Bowen v. Morris (10). But, further, the letter of allotment would contain the terms that the defendant should be entitled to scrip certificates, upon signing the parliamentary contract, and there is nothing to shew, but the reverse rather, that the company was continuing; and, lastly, the consideration for the promise is insufficiently stated. There must upon this declaration, have been some terms to be performed by the plaintiff; but it does not appear what they were; and, on special demurrer, this is a good objection. The rule of pleading is, that all the consideration must be stated.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—I very much doubt whether it is always necessary to set out the whole of the consideration. The whole consideration may be the whole agreement.]

Beach v. White (11) is an authority for saying that the whole of the consideration for the contract sued upon must be set out. In Figes v. Cutler (12) Lord Tenterden held that an action cannot be maintained for the breach of an agreement for not entering into partnership with the plaintiff, without its being shewn what the terms were on which the parties had agreed to become partners. That case was recognized in M'Neil v. Reid (13).

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. Two objections are made to this declaration in matters of substance. The first of those objections is, that the declaration does not shew that the company was provisionally registered as required by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; and it is said, that without such registration a company of this nature has, by the operation of that act, no power to allot shares. That may be so; but the answer is, that the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. is not retrospective, and applies only to companies formed after the 1st of November 1844, and for anything that is averred or appears to the contrary, this company may have been formed before that time. But it is said, if that be so, that the declaration should have shewn that the company existed prior to the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; otherwise the company do not shew they were acting legally, or had any power to allot shares, without which, it is argued, they are not entitled to maintain the action. I think the authorities cited by Mr. Brown are sufficient to shew that this argument is not well founded. A party suing is not bound to anticipate matters of that kind, and the objection, if it really exists, (and assuming it to be good) should come by way of answer, and cannot be taken advantage of on demurrer to the declaration. The second objection in point of substance, is, that the consideration for the implied promise moves from all those who were associated together to form the company, and not from the

whom the said shares should be allotted by a committee of management of the said proposed company. That before and at the time of the defendant's application for shares, and the making of his said promise as hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs formed and were the committee of management of the said proposed company. That before the making of the promise by the defendant as hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 8th of October A.D. 1845, the defendant applied to the plaintiffs, then forming and being such committee of management as aforesaid, and requested them to allot him, the defendant, fifty of the said shares in the said proposed company, and then undertook to accept the same, or any less number that might be allotted to him; and thereupon heretofore, to wit, on the 25th of November 1845, the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, allotted to him thirty-five of the said shares in the said company, upon certain terms then agreed upon by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that is to say, that a deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* upon each and every of the said shares so allotted to him as aforesaid, making in the whole a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 73*l.* 10*s.*, should be paid by him the defendant, on or before the 9th of December A.D. 1845, to the account of the said company, to one of certain bankers then appointed and agreed upon in that behalf, to wit, the London and County Joint-Stock Bank, Lombard Street, and Brighton, and at their several country branches, and Messrs. Hall, West, & Borrer, Union Bank, Brighton, of all which premises the defendant afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, had notice; and thereupon, in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, then, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, promised the defendant to perform and fulfil the said terms on their part, the defendant then promised the plaintiffs to perform and fulfil the said terms on his the defendant's part, and although the plaintiffs were always ready and willing to perform and fulfil the said terms in all things on their part, and although the said 9th day of December elapsed after the said promise of the said defendant, and before the commencement of this suit, of all which premises the defendant hath always had notice; yet the defendant, disregarding his said promise, did not, nor would on or before the said 9th of December, pay, nor hath he since paid, to any or either of the said bankers, or at any of their banks, either in London or elsewhere, or to any other person, to the account of the said company, the said deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* per share; but hath wholly neglected so to do. By means of which said premises the plaintiffs have been and are greatly injured and damaged," &c.

The defendant's points as marked for argument were: first, that the declaration is bad both in form and substance, and shews no sufficient cause of action; secondly, that the matters therein stated are not sufficient from which to imply the promise alleged; thirdly, that the only consideration stated for the promise declared on is, the allotment to the defendant of shares in a company which the plaintiffs and others once upon a time before the making of the promise had agreed with each other to endeavour to form, but which said agreement and the formation of the said company and all endeavours to form the same may (consistently with the said declaration) have been given up and abandoned long before the said allotment or promise, and that such consideration is insufficient to sustain the said promise; fourthly, that the declaration is wanting in certainty in not stating whether the formation of the company commenced before or after the coming into operation of the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; fifthly, that if the formation of the company commenced before the coming into operation of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. all the several parties to the agreement for its formation, and not the plaintiffs alone, ought to have sued in this action, and if the formation commenced after the said act came into operation, then the declaration ought to have shewn that the plaintiffs were according to the act entitled to allot shares and receive deposits, and that the deposits sued for are such as the act authorizes; sixthly, that the declaration ought to have shewn with certainty that the defendant accepted the allotment; seventhly, that the declaration ought to have stated with certainty the terms which the plaintiffs are alleged to have promised to fulfil, and been ready and willing to fulfil.

tee, and the contract, as it appears on the declaration, is a contract made with the present plaintiffs. That is sufficient on demurrer, though it may turn out, as in Woolmer v. Toby, that the contract sued on was made with the plaintiffs and others jointly. I am also of opinion that the formal objections made to this declaration cannot be supported. If the allegation had been that, in consideration of the premises, and of the plaintiffs' undertaking to perform what was to be performed on their part, the defendant undertook and promised on his part, I should have taken time to consider whether the omission to specify the terms to be performed by the plaintiffs would not be a good objection on special demurrer. The allegation, however, is "in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiffs at the request of the defendant promised the defendant to perform and fulfil the said terms on their part;" and that refers to the previous statements in the declaration, which are sufficient to shew certain express or implied terms, and which must be taken to be embodied in the allegation of the promise.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. With respect to the objection that the contract in this declaration should have been treated as a contract with all the members of the company, and not as a contract with its managing committee: it may be, in fact, a contract with the company; but there is nothing illegal in a contract between the managing committee of such a company as this, and an allottee, to enure to the benefit of the company. The declaration does not shew that the committee of management forms part of the company, but only that the plaintiffs had agreed with other persons to form a company, of which they were to be part, and were to allot shares in it. It then alleges that they entered into a contract with the defendant to allot him shares, that they performed all they had undertaken to perform, and that he had not performed what he had undertaken to perform. I think if the facts be as stated, they are enough to sustain the action. As to the question of illegality, it is said, the contract does not appear to be legal on account of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. But it is a contract which is good at common law, and illegal only if made after the passing of a particular act of parliament, and if certain requisitions in that act are not complied with. We cannot presume those facts; if they exist they ought to come from the other side. The only point I had any doubt about was, that the declaration shewed there were certain terms to be performed by the plaintiff, and did not shew what they were. That is an objection taken on special demurrer; but the truth is, that the declaration shews there are no terms except those previously averred in it; and, therefore, the words implying other terms, are surplusage, as in the case of Ring v. Roxburgh (15). There a declaration stated, that in consideration of work and labour, &c., and certain diseases, the defendant promised, &c.; and Bayley, B. said, that though the allegation of the defendant being indebted for certain diseases was nonsense and surplusage, yet as there were other good considerations in the declaration sufficient to support the promise, it was good. I think, in this declaration, there is a consideration stated sufficient to support the promise, viz., the consideration of having done what was done, and the subsequent allegation of readiness to perform other terms may be rejected.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiffs to shew cause why the record and all subsequent proceedings should not be set aside for irregularity, with costs.

The declaration stated, that the plaintiffs were the drawers, and the defendant the acceptor of a bill of exchange, payable three months after date, for the sum of 38*l.* 11*s.* There were also counts for goods sold and delivered and on an account stated.

The pleas were, first, that the defendant did not accept the bill; secondly, to the residue of the declaration, "never indebted."

The issue delivered was in conformity with the declaration and pleas.

At the trial, before Wilde, C.J., at the last Bristol Summer Assizes, the plaintiffs, in support of their case, put in evidence a bill of exchange, drawn by them and accepted by the defendant, payable at two months after date, for the sum of 38*l.* 11*s.*

Ball, for the defendant, objected that this was not the bill declared on. On reference to the record it appeared that the word "two" had been written on an erasure. The learned Chief Justice said he could only try the issues as they appeared on the record, and accordingly a verdict was returned for the plaintiffs for the amount of the bill and the interest.

Immediately on the giving of the bill for 2,000*l.*, in the said indenture mentioned, the said Robert Phillott held the said sum of 2,000*l.* as the agent of and in trust for the said defendant and the said E. J. Lack, to be advanced and disposed of by their directions, and became accountable to them for the due disposition thereof, except that as to 100*l.*, part of the said sum of 2,000*l.*, the said Robert Phillott held that sum for himself and H. M. Elderton, with the consent and by the authority of the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, as discount, which he, the said Robert Phillott, represented to the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, he, the said Robert Phillott, and the said Henry M. Elderton, paid for the loan of the said sum of 2,000*l.* on the said bill, but no part of this discount was ever received by the plaintiff. This was the first advance made by the plaintiff to the defendant and the said E. J. Lack. In like way, on the giving of the bill for 1,500*l.*, in the said indenture mentioned, the said Robert Phillott held the sum of 700*l.* as the agent of and in trust for the said defendant and the said E. J. Lack, to be advanced and disposed of by their directions, and became accountable to them for the due disposition thereof. As to the sum of 300*l.*, and as to 1,000*l.*, part of the secondly-mentioned sum of 2,000*l.*, the said Robert Phillott received and held these sums respectively for the said defendant and the said E. J. Lack, to be advanced and disposed of by their directions, and became accountable to them for the due disposition thereof, immediately he, the said Robert Phillott, received those portions of the proceeds of the said stock, which was some days after he first held the said bill for 1,500*l.* on account of the plaintiff. And the said Robert Phillott received and held the remainder of the said secondly-mentioned sum of 2,000*l.*, as the agent of and in trust for the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, to be advanced and disposed of by their directions, and became accountable to them for the due disposition thereof immediately on the receipt of the said bill for 1,000*l.*, subject as to each of the four last-mentioned bills to a like holding of a part for discount, as in the case of the first-mentioned bill.

The last-mentioned sum of 1,892*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* was received by R. Phillott on the said 1st day of September, and 242*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.*, part thereof, was then lent by him, as the agent of the plaintiff, to the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, and the residue, 1,150*l.*, was held by him on account of the plaintiff until January, A.D. 1842, when the same was lent by him, as the agent of the plaintiff, to the defendant and the said E. J. Lack. The said R. Phillott was duly authorized by the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, to procure and hold the said sums of 2,000*l.*, 700*l.*, 300*l.* and 2,000*l.* on account of the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, and the same were loans from the plaintiff to the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, at the several times the said R. Phillott held the same respectively on account of the defendant and the said E. J. Lack as aforesaid. Although the said R. Phillott held the same on account of the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, he did not pay the full amount thereof to them, or apply it for their benefit, but held considerable portions thereof as aforesaid, and he and the said Henry M. Elderton untruly represented to the defendant and the said E. J. Lack, that they, the said R. Phillott and H. M. Elderton, had been obliged to pay the sums so held for discount of the said several bills.

The said several bills were received by the said R. Phillott from the defendant and the said E. J. Lack on or about their respective dates. The bill for 2,000*l.* was given specifically for the said first-mentioned sum of 2,000*l.*, so lent as aforesaid, and held by the said R. Phillott, as the agent of the plaintiff, from the time of its date. The bill for 1,500*l.* was given and held by R. Phillott partly for advances made, partly in expectation of advances to be made, and which were made as aforesaid; and the bills for 300*l.* and 200*l.* were set apart, and held by R. Phillott, as the agent for the plaintiff, from the 17th of August. And the bill for 1,000*l.* was made and given to and held by him, as the agent of the plaintiff, to make up the amount of 5,000*l.*, which the plaintiff was to lend and advance, and did lend and advance as aforesaid.

In the month of December 1842, the plaintiff so being the holder of the said bill of exchange, the said defendant and the said E. J. Lack and H. M. Elderton proposed to the plaintiff to execute the said indenture, on his the plaintiff's cancelling or destroying the said bills and executing the release of the said defendant, the said E. J. Lack, and H. M. Elderton, in the said deed contained. The plaintiff, being unable to procure any other or better security for the money so obtained by the sale of his stock, acceded to the said proposal, and the said deed was accordingly executed by the several parties thereto, and the said bills of exchange were given up and cancelled, as in the said recital of the said deed mentioned. At that time the defendant and the said E. J. Lack were indebted to the plaintiff in 6,392*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* for money lent by him to them, 5,000*l.* of which was secured by the said five bills of exchange as aforesaid. The said Elderton and Phillott did, as above stated, obtain from the plaintiff a larger sum than 5,000*l.*; but they have not, up to the present time, rendered an account to the defendant of the expenditure thereof, and it is admitted by the plaintiff that no such account can be rendered to make up the sum of 5,000*l.*, unless the receipt by Elderton and Phillott, or one of them, is to be considered as a receipt by the defendant. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to retain the verdict on the second issue: if so, whether the judgment ought to be arrested. If not so entitled to retain the verdict, then whether he was entitled to judgment notwithstanding a verdict for the defendant on such issue.

Willes (with whom was Peacock), for the plaintiff.—First, the issue ought to be for the plaintiff. The substance of the matter is to be looked at. The facts found by the case amount to the issue being found for the plaintiff. The money left the plaintiff's hands, and reached those of persons authorized by the defendant and E. J. Lack to receive it. It is found by the case, that Phillott received it as agent for the Lacks. Secondly, here, there was no pecuniary consideration, and in such case no inrolment is requisite. In Blake v. Attersoll (1), where a son-in-law agreed with the executors of the father to cancel a marriage settlement, under which he was a creditor in 10,000*l.*, and in consideration thereof to receive 5,000*l.* and an annuity of 125*l.*, it was held that such annuity need not be inrolled. The Annuity Act only applies to annuities granted for pecuniary consideration. The cases on this subject are collected in Chitty's Statutes, p. 27. The word "pecuniary," which appears in the 53 Geo. 3. c. 141, is omitted in the previous Annuity Act of 17 Geo. 3. c. 26.

Watson (with whom was Corrie).—The memorial states that five specific sums had been lent, and that five bills of similar amounts were held as security for those sums. This was not so in fact. Under the 53 Geo. 3. c. 141, the Court has no discretion as to setting aside an annuity deed, when the memorial does not truly state the consideration. The statement in the memorial must be precise, and must state the fact—Ex parte Lewis (2). In Drake v. Rogers (3) it was held, that where part of the consideration consisted of a draft, payable at a banker's, it was necessary to state in the memorial at what time such draft was payable. Horwood v. Underhill (4), decided on the 17 Geo. 3. c. 26, is in point. In Kirkman v. Price (5) it was held that the memorial must set forth precisely the manner in which the consideration money was paid.

Morris v. Wall (6). If it be set forth in the memorial that the consideration was so much in money paid, when the real consideration was part in money and part is the giving up of a former annuity, the Court will set aside the security—Washburn v. Birch (7). Annuities are not regarded with favour. In the 17 Geo. 3. c. 26. the practice of raising money by annuity is called "pernicious," and the case of the bills is worse than that of raising money—Erle v. Brown (8).

Willes, in reply.—No fraud is suggested by the other side. The five bills mentioned in the memorial were given to secure amounts equivalent to what was on the face of them.

[ROLFE, B.—The Annuity Act intends that you should state the exact transaction.]

Bygone transactions are not within the Annuity Act. But if they are, they need not be stated in the memorial with the strictness contended for. In Symmons v. Mortimer (9) it was held, that where 1,200*l.* had been paid for the grant of an annuity, and the securities to prevent their being registered had been renewed from twenty days to twenty days, and then 600*l.* had been paid for the grant of a further annuity; and the securities renewed in like manner, and sometimes after a longer period than twenty days, and afterwards had been registered, a memorial of the annuity stating the consideration to be 1,800*l.* was valid. So, in Kelfe v. Ambrose (10), it was held, that money lent and paid at different times for the education and advancement of the defendant is a good consideration for an annuity, and is sufficiently expressed in the memorial as "money lent and advanced, and also paid, laid out and expended to and for the maintenance, education, and advancement in the world of the defendant." Ex parte Lewis was a case under the old act.

The judgment of the Court was now, in Michaelmas term, 1847, delivered by—

ROLFE, B.—This case was argued last Trinity term, by Mr. Willes, for the plaintiff, and Mr. Watson, for the defendant. It was in action of covenant, brought to recover the arrears of an annuity, claimed to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff, under the terms of an annuity deed, dated the 21st of December 1842. By that deed, after reciting that the plaintiff had at various times advanced and lent to the defendant and his son Edward John Lack, among other monies, five several sums of 300*l.*, 200*l.*, 2,000*l.*, 1,500*l.*, and 1,000*l.*, as a security for the re-payment of which the plaintiff held five several bills of exchange for the same sums of 300*l.*, 200*l.*, 2,000*l.*, 1,500*l.*, and 1,000*l.*, bearing date on various days, mentioned in the deed, in the months of July and August 1841; and further reciting, that all interest on these sums had been duly paid up to the 29th of September 1842, and that the defendant and his said son had some time since agreed with the plaintiff for the sale to him of an annuity of 804*l.*, in consideration of the sums so due on the said five bills of exchange, such consideration to be satisfied by the cancellation of the bills and a release from the same, to be executed by the plaintiff; and further reciting, that in pursuance of that agreement, the first bill had been that day delivered up by the plaintiff to the defendant and his son, and had been cancelled, it is witnessed, that the plaintiff, pursuant to the said agreement, released the defendant and his son from the said bills, and all claim in respect thereof. And it was further witnessed, that in consideration of the said sums so released and discharged, by cancellation of the said bills, the defendant and his son did grant to the plaintiff an annuity of 804*l.*, payable quarterly on the days therein mentioned; and the defendant covenanted for due payment of the annuity on the specified days. There are a great many other provisions in the deed, but they do not appear to us material to the present case. The declaration, after setting out the deed verbatim, and alleging performance of all its stipulations on the part of the plaintiff, alleges various breaches of the covenants entered into by the defendant, and particularly of the covenant for payment of the annuity, to the plaintiff's damage of 4,000*l.*

There were several pleas, but the questions before us turn entirely on the second, the plaintiff having succeeded on all the others. By that second plea, the defendant pleads, that the deed in question was made after the passing of the Annuity Act, 53 Geo. 3. c. 146, and alleges that the annuity was granted for a pecuniary consideration, and that no memorial was inrolled according to the provisions of the statute, whereby the indenture is null and void.

To this the plaintiff replied, that a memorial was duly inrolled according to the statute, which memorial was and is as follows,—and then sets out the memorial verbatim. The language under the column "Consideration, and how paid," being to the effect following: "5,000*l.* made up of five several sums of 300*l.*, 200*l.*, 2,000*l.*, 1,500*l.*, and 1,000*l.* previously lent and advanced by C. R. Hall, to or for the use of John Lack and E. J. Lack, and owing to C. R. Hall, on security of five several bills of exchange, drawn by E. J. Lack upon and accepted by J. Lack, and indorsed by E. J. Lack, the said consideration being paid or satisfied by the cancellation of the same bills; and a release by C. R. Hall of J. Lack and E. J. Lack, from the sum secured thereby and interest.

The replication then goes on to aver that the said memorial did duly contain and truly set forth (inter alia) the pecuniary consideration for granting the said annuity.

The defendant, by his rejoinder, says, that the memorial did not truly set forth how the pecuniary consideration was paid, because the plaintiff did not previously to the grant of the said annuity, lend or advance to or for the use of the defendant and J. Lack the said sums of 300*l.*, 200*l.*, 2,000*l.*, 1,500*l.*, and 1,000*l.*; of this he puts himself upon the country,—thus traversing the averments in the replication that the memorial did truly set forth the pecuniary consideration for the grant of the annuity.

The plaintiff joined issue on the traverse so taken by the defendant; and on the trial of that issue a verdict was, by consent, taken for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of this Court as to whether the facts warranted such a finding. It appeared by the case that in the year 1840 the plaintiff being about to leave England, and being entitled to certain 3*l.* per cent. annuities, standing in his name, gave a power of attorney to Robert Phillott, enabling him to sell out the same, with directions to place the proceeds out at interest, on good securities. Phillott made various sales of the stock in the months of July and August 1841, the whole net proceeds of such sales amounting to 6,392*l.*, and in those same months made advances by way of loan to the defendant and to Edward John Lack out of the said net proceeds, to the extent of 5,000*l.*, save that he claimed to deduct, and actually did deduct, several sums amounting to 250*l.*, which he falsely represented that he had been obliged to pay by way of discount, in order to obtain the said loans. The plaintiff was entirely ignorant of the deductions, the whole of the sums retained having been appropriated by Phillott to his own purposes. At or about the time of these advances, Phillott took, by way of security for the money advanced, five several bills of exchange as follows, that is to say, one for 300*l.*, one for 200*l.*, one for 2,000*l.*, one for 1,500*l.*, and the other for 1,000*l.* All the bills were drawn by E. J. Lack, payable to his own order. They were all drawn upon and accepted by the defendant, and were indorsed by E. J. Lack, and were handed over to Phillott, as agent for the plaintiff, by way of security for the advances. The bills were dated on different days between the 22nd of July and the 18th of August 1841: the dates of the bills did not exactly correspond with the date of the advances, nor were the advances made in the exact sums for which the bills were given, but sums to the amount of 5,000*l.* (subject to the deductions before adverted to) were advanced nearly about the times when the bills were given, for which sums the bills were intended to be securities.

In the month of December 1842, the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to accept the annuity granted by the deed set out in the declaration, in satisfaction of the five bills of exchange and the 5,000*l.* thereby secured. The bills were accordingly cancelled and the deed was executed, and a memorial was enrolled, as stated in the pleadings. On these facts, Mr. Watson, for the defendant, argued, either that a verdict ought to be entered for him on the issue as to the memorial, or if the verdict should be entered for the plaintiff, then that the defendant was entitled to arrest the judgment.

The argument for entering the verdict for the defendant rested on these grounds. The sums advanced and covered, or intended to be covered, by the five bills, did not, it was said, really amount to 5,000*l.*, but only to that sum less 250*l.*; the memorial, therefore, stating the amount to be 5,000*l.* was contended to be untrue, and so that the averment that the memorial did truly set forth the pecuniary consideration was not made out. It was further contended, that no such precise sums as those for which the several bills were given ever were advanced, and on this ground also it was contended that the memorial was untrue, for that it ought to have stated the exact amount of each advance, and so that even supposing the aggregate of all the advances to be correct, still that the statement was insufficient. We are of opinion that neither of these objections can prevail. The money, it must be recollected, was all advanced to the Lacks without any reference to the purchase of an annuity, and merely by way of loan.

The first thing, therefore, to be done in order to arrive at a just conclusion as to the rights of the parties, is to look at the question apart from any consideration of the annuity, and merely as a transaction of lending and borrowing; and when it is so considered, there can be no doubt but the defendant was liable on the bills to the full amount. The exact days on which the different advances were made were wholly immaterial, and it was certainly competent to the parties to treat the 5,000*l.* as having been advanced in sums and at dates corresponding with the five bills. So also it was lawful for the defendant to treat the 250*l.* retained by Phillott as having been advanced to him. If the plaintiff had sued the defendant on the bills it would have been no answer to the plaintiff, as to any part of the demand, to shew that Phillott had retained a part of the money. Even treating it as clear that Phillott was the agent of the plaintiff, and not of the defendant, still it did not lie in the mouth of the defendant to say that the plaintiff did not advance the whole of the 5,000*l.* He did, in fact, advance the whole of that sum. What was kept back by Phillott was retained by him for his own use in fraud of the other parties, and without the privity of the plaintiff. And the defendant, by accepting the bills of the full amount of 5,000*l.*, must be taken to have agreed to treat the whole sum as received by him by so accepting the bills. He enabled Phillott to discharge himself as against the plaintiff. He afterwards paid to the plaintiff interest regularly on the whole 5,000*l.*, treating the whole as having come to his hands; and having done so, he cannot afterwards turn round and say that a part of the sum for which he accepted the bills, and on which he regularly had paid interest, was not really received by him, but was intercepted in its progress by the agent.

For these reasons, we think it clear, that at the time when the annuity was granted the plaintiff had an undoubted claim on the defendant for the 5,000*l.* due on the five bills; and this being so, it follows that the consideration is described in the memorial with strict accuracy. Indeed, it would have been incorrect to have stated that the advance of 5,000*l.*, or any part of it, formed the consideration, or any part of the consideration, for the annuity. The whole of the 5,000*l.* was a debt justly due before the annuity was thought of, and the consideration for the grant of the annuity is correctly described, not as the advance of the 5,000*l.*, but as the release of the previously existing debt, and the cancellation of the bills by which it was secured. This case, therefore, closely resembles that of Kelfe v. Ambrosae, referred to by Mr. Willes, where, under the original Annuity Act, 17 Geo. 3. c. 26, which requires the consideration to be correctly stated in the body of the deed, it was held, that the statement of a pre-existing debt due from the grantor to the grantee was a sufficient compliance with the act, without shewing how the debt had arisen. The principle acted on in that case as to the statement of the consideration in the body of the deed, under 17 Geo. 3. c. 26. s. 3, is equally applicable to the statement of the consideration in the memorial under the more recent act, 53 Geo. 3. c. 141. Indeed, to hold that it is necessary in the case of existing by-gone debts to state when and how each sum constituting the debt was advanced, would obviously in many cases be equivalent to holding that an annuity cannot be granted in consideration of such debts. It might often be quite impossible, more especially in the case of cross accounts, to state when and how all the items of which the debt is made up arose. The statute does not require any such statement. All that it requires is, that the memorial should state the pecuniary consideration, and how paid; and in the present case this has been done with perfect fairness and with as much detail as the nature of the transaction permitted. The consequence will be, that the verdict on the issue raised by the replication to the second plea must be entered for the plaintiff.

It is hardly necessary to say that our

In the month of December 1842, the plaintiff so being the holder of the said bill of exchange, the said defendant and the said E. J. Lack and H. M. Elderton proposed to the plaintiff to execute the said indenture, on his the plaintiff's cancelling or destroying the said bills and executing the release of the said defendant, the said E. J. Lack, and H. M. Elderton, in the said deed contained. The plaintiff, being unable to procure any other or better security for the money so obtained by the sale of his stock, acceded to the said proposal, and the said deed was accordingly executed by the several parties thereto, and the said bills of exchange were given up and cancelled, as in the said recital of the said deed mentioned. At that time the defendant and the said E. J. Lack were indebted to the plaintiff in 6,392*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* for money lent by him to them, 5,000*l.* of which was secured by the said five bills of exchange as aforesaid. The said Elderton and Phillott did, as above stated, obtain from the plaintiff a larger sum than 5,000*l.*; but they have not, up to the present time, rendered an account to the defendant of the expenditure thereof, and it is admitted by the plaintiff that no such account can be rendered to make up the sum of 5,000*l.*, unless the receipt by Elderton and Phillott, or one of them, is to be considered as a receipt by the defendant. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to retain the verdict on the second issue: if so, whether the judgment ought to be arrested. If not so entitled to retain the verdict, then whether he was entitled to judgment notwithstanding a verdict for the defendant on such issue.

Willes (with whom was Peacock), for the plaintiff.—First, the issue ought to be for the plaintiff. The substance of the matter is to be looked at. The facts found by the case amount to the issue being found for the plaintiff. The money left the plaintiff's hands, and reached those of persons authorized by the defendant and E. J. Lack to receive it. It is found by the case, that Phillott received it as agent for the Lacks. Secondly, here, there was no pecuniary consideration, and in such case no enrolment is requisite. In Blake v. Attersoll (1), where a son-in-law agreed with the executor of the father to cancel a marriage settlement, under which he was a creditor in 10,000*l.*, and in consideration thereof to receive 5,000*l.* and an annuity of 125*l.*, it was held that such annuity need not be enrolled. The Annuity Act only applies to annuities granted for pecuniary consideration. The cases on this subject are collected in Chitty's Statutes, p. 27. The word "pecuniary," which appears in the 53 Geo. 3. c. 141, is omitted in the previous Annuity Act of 17 Geo. 3. c. 26.

Watson (with whom was Corrie).—The memorial states that five specific sums had been lent, and that five bills of similar amounts were held as security for those sums. This was not so in fact. Under the 53 Geo. 3. c. 141, the Court has no discretion as to setting aside an annuity deed, when the memorial does not truly state the consideration. The statement in the memorial must be precise, and must state the fact—Ex parte Lewis (2). In Drake v. Rogers (3) it was held, that where part of the consideration consisted of a draft, payable at a banker's, it was necessary to state in the memorial at what time such draft was payable. Horwood v. Underhill (4), decided on the 17 Geo. 3. c. 26, is in point. In Kirkman v. Price (5) it was held that the memorial must set forth precisely the manner in which the consideration money was paid.

PARKE, B.—There is no ground for a rule. The defendants are responsible for all the reasonable consequences arising from their breach of contract. Whether the expense of the clerk's going and remaining three days at Bedford was a reasonable consequence of the defendants' breach of contract was a question for the jury. If he went down unnecessarily, or stayed there too long, the defendants ought not to be compelled to pay that expense. The truth is, the jury have given too large damages, but as the damages are less than 20*l.*, we cannot grant a new trial on the ground of the verdict being against the evidence. There is no misdirection.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. Whether the expenses of the clerk and of sending the goods to St. Neot's were reasonable, was a question for the jury. The law was rightly laid down by the Judge. The jury have given too much by way of damages, and if the amount that they have given were sufficient to warrant a new trial, we should be willing to grant a rule.

ROLFE, B. concurred.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The jury were wrong in giving too large an amount of damages, but we cannot set the verdict aside. The real question is, whether it was incumbent on the Judge to decide as a matter of law, whether certain expenses were reasonable. I think it was not. The notice to the carriers of the consequences of an unreasonable delay in the delivery of the goods makes no other difference than this, that if they have notice of that fact and then take them they may be liable for some expenses for which they would not otherwise be liable. But whether a particular class of expenses is reasonable or not will depend upon the subject-matter, upon the nature of the goods, upon the usage of trade, upon what a reasonable man would do under the particular circumstances, and other matters of that kind. It would therefore be for the jury to say what were reasonable expenses. I regret that we cannot interfere in this case.

Devise—Estate in Fee.

A testator devised as follows:—"I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate, monies, securities for money, and all other my real and personal estate, of what nature or kind soever, and wheresoever the same may be, which I am now possessed of, or which at any time hereafter I may be possessed of, or entitled unto, subject to the payment of all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the expense of proving this my will, unto my dear wife, to and for her sole and separate use and benefit":—Held, that, under the above words, the devisees took an estate in fee in the lands of the testator.

This was an action of ejectment, to recover possession of a tenement and land, called Penybonge, in the parish of Llandwrog, in the county of Carnarvon.

At the trial, before Maule J., at the last Carnarvonshire Summer Assizes, the following facts appeared:—The lessor of the plaintiff claimed the property as heir-at-law of Thomas Roberts, who died in 1833, having made his will in these terms: "I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate, monies, securities for money, and all other my real and personal estate of what nature or kind soever, and wheresoever the same may be, which I am now possessed of, or which at any time hereafter I may be possessed of, or entitled unto, subject to the payment of all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the expense of proving this my will, unto my dear wife Catherine, to and for her sole and separate use and benefit." The defendant claimed, under the will of the testator's wife, Catherine Roberts, who died in 1842. On the part of the plaintiff, it was contended that, under the terms of the will of T. Roberts, the wife of the testator took no more than an estate for life in the premises in question. The learned Judge was of opinion that the testator's wife took an estate in fee, and directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, reserving leave to the lessor of the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him.

Townsend now moved accordingly.—The wife of the testator took only an estate for life in the premises in question. It is not given to her and her heirs. In Moor v. Denn (1) the devise was "all the rest of my lands, tenements, and hereditaments, either freehold or copyhold, whatsoever or wheresoever; and also all my goods, &c., after payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I give and devise the same unto my wife Sissily Carr," and it was held that the wife took only an estate for life. That was a decision of the House of Lords, and proceeded on the ground that the premises were devised, and subject to a charge.

[PARKE, B.—The lessor of the plaintiff is to cut down the will. It does not direct that the devisee is to pay the debts. The only question then is, whether the devise to the "sole and separate use and benefit" of the wife reduces the estate to an estate for life.]

The rule on this subject is stated by Grose, J., in Goodtitle v. Maddern (2): "The rule has been long established, that if the executor be bound to pay the debts by the terms of the devise, he must take a fee in the lands devised to him, in respect of which such obligation is thrown upon him; but if he be only to pay them out of the produce of the land devised to him, or only to take the land after payment of debts, then, without words of inheritance, the fee will not pass." And the language of Lawrence, J. is to the same effect. He referred to Saunderson v. Dobson (3).

Per Curiam (4).—We are all of opinion that the wife of the testator took an estate in fee in the premises in question; and, therefore, there will be no rule.

of staying the execution of the writ, made an order on the 6th of July 1846, for setting aside the verdict, on the ground of the irregularity of the notice of trial:—Held, that this was not a nullity, but an irregularity; and that an application to rescind the order made on the last day of Trinity term 1847 was too late.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Platt, B. should not be rescinded. A writ of trial having issued, directing the cause to be tried before the sheriff, the plaintiff gave notice of trial for a time when the Court did not sit, except for the purpose of trying, by adjournment, causes previously undisposed of. The defendant's attorney attended at the court on the day in question, and protested against the trial taking place on the ground of the insufficiency of the notice, but the trial proceeded, and the plaintiff had a verdict.

On the 6th of July 1846, Platt, B. made an order, directing that the verdict and all subsequent proceedings should be set aside.

In Michaelmas term, 1846, the defendant obtained a rule for judgment as in case of a nonsuit; and on the last day of Trinity term, 1847, the plaintiff obtained the present rule.

C. C. Jones, Serj. shewed cause.—The ground on which this rule was obtained is, that in the case of a writ of trial a Judge at chambers has no power to set aside a verdict, his authority being confined to staying execution on the writ. The course, however, taken by the Judge was, at the most, a mere irregularity, and has been waived by the plaintiff's delay in coming to this Court.

Crouch, contra.—The Judge had no power to set aside the verdict; his power under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 18. was limited to staying the judgment or the execution upon the writ. The proceeding therefore was not a mere irregularity, but an absolute nullity, and is not cured by the lapse of time. Roberts v. Spurr (1) shews that an interlocutory judgment signed without an appearance entered is a nullity, and cannot be waived.

[ALDERSON, B.—The act 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, that enables writs of trial to be executed before the sheriff, had reference to immediate execution; but then, under the statute that power may be taken away by the Judge. But if the Judge does not take it away, execution proceeds, and the effect is the same as in the case of a verdict at Nisi Prius. What then would be the consequence of a single Judge setting aside a verdict at Nisi Prius? If his act would be a mere nullity you are right: if it is an irregularity you are wrong.]

It is submitted that the act of the Judge was a nullity.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This rule must be discharged. The service of the order of July 1846 being an impediment to the plaintiff's proceeding, he ought to have applied in Michaelmas term to set aside the order. Instead of this, he waits until an application is made for judgment as in case of a nonsuit. And he even then omits to apply to this Court to set aside the order until Trinity term in this year. That was too late, for the order of the Judge was not a nullity, but a mere irregularity.

ALDERSON, B.—The act of the Judge in setting aside the verdict was a mere irregularity, and if pointed out at the time would have been set right; and under the circumstances we should not have rigidly scrutinized the time for making the application. The practice in such a case is to apply to the Court promptly to set the order aside. Here, the order was erroneous, but the application to rescind it ought to have been made in Michaelmas term, 1846. The general rule must prevail, as the motion was not made in reasonable time. There must be an end of litigation. The general maxim applies to this case, quod fieri non debet factum valet.

Upon appeal against a Judge's order to hold a defendant to bail under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3, affidavits in denial of the plaintiff's cause of action are admissible, but the Court will not interfere unless it be clear that there is no cause of action.

Where upon a Judge's order and writ of capias the defendant gave bail to the sheriff, and on appeal against the order it appeared that the defendant had no intention of leaving England for two months, but that the plaintiff would not be able to get judgment in that time, the Court, considering the arrest premature, cancelled the bail bond, but directed the order and capias to stand.

In this case, Williams, J., on the 25th of October 1847, made an order for the arrest of the defendant, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3, upon an affidavit of one of the plaintiffs, which stated that the defendant was justly and truly indebted to the plaintiffs in 650*l.*, for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant in the early part of the present year, in the kingdom of Spain, where the defendant then resided; that he had received information from a clerk of certain brokers to a Portuguese steamer called the Falcon, that the defendant was about to leave England for Portugal on board that steamer as soon as certain repairs to her machinery were completed; and that he believed the defendant would leave England unless forthwith apprehended. A capias accordingly issued, on which the defendant was held to bail.

Pashley thereupon moved for and obtained a rule, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the above order should not be rescinded and all subsequent proceedings thereon be set aside; and why the bail bond given to the sheriff should not be delivered up to be cancelled. He produced an affidavit of the defendant denying the debt, and stating that he was master and supercargo of the Falcon, which sailed regularly between Portugal and England, usually arriving in England every month, and remaining about ten days; that he did not intend to discontinue his business and occupation, as such master and supercargo; that the Fal- closed at night by the defendant or his servants, (the defendant keeping the key thereof).

The gateway into the yard is entirely covered over by a portion of the house, No. 115, in High Street aforesaid, which house stands in the straight and direct line of, and abuts and fronts upon that street to the west of, and over the said gates and gateway, and is duly rated in and by the said rate, and the house adjoining to No. 115, on the east of the said gates and gateway is numbered No. 114, in the High Street, and such last-mentioned house also stands in the straight and direct line of and abuts and fronts upon the High Street, and is also duly rated in and by the said rate. The said gates and gateway are not distinguished by any number at all.

That part of the footpath of the said street which is opposite to and between the said gates and the general carriageway of the said High Street, is not laid down with flag stones, but with ordinary carriageway pavement, as is usual in similar cases in the metropolis, where a party is entitled to an entrance across the footway, and the carts and other carriages, and the horses and cattle of the defendant, in passing through the said gateway to or from the said yard, houses, &c., have at all times during his occupation and possession as aforesaid, necessarily traversed and passed over, and do necessarily traverse and pass over a large portion of the said street so paved and repaired by such commissioners, and the pavement thereof.

No part of the said yard has ever been paved, repaired, raised, sunk, or altered by the said commissioners, nor have they within the said yard at any time exercised any of the powers conferred upon them by the said acts or either of them, and none of the said houses or other buildings round the said yard ever fronted or were differently placed with respect to or more open to the High Street than they are now.

[The case then stated the making of a rate on the 22nd of November 1844, of one shilling in the pound of the yearly rent or yearly value of such houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, vaults, or other tenements respectively, (so far as the same can be known,) except only such houses, &c. as are situate on the south side of the said High Street, &c.]

The other occupiers of the houses, warehouses, and buildings in the said yard as above mentioned, were and are also rated in the said rate in respect of such last-mentioned houses, &c.

The sum of 10*l.* 14*s.*, being the sum total and aggregate of the several sums at and in which the defendant is rated, in and by the said rate as aforesaid was, and the several sums of which the said sum of 10*l.* 14*s.* is such aggregate, were duly demanded of him before the commencement of this action, but he upon such demand refused and continually hitherto hath refused to pay the same, and each of such several sums, and every part thereof. And it is agreed that all steps, matters, and things necessary to be taken and done by the commissioners, the plaintiff, and all other parties to entitle the plaintiff as such clerk to maintain this action, (if the defendant is liable to be rated in respect of the premises occupied by him as aforesaid, and comprised in the said rate, and therein rated at the aggregate sum of 10*l.* 14*s.* as aforesaid, or any part thereof,) were by them and him taken and done previously to the commencement of the action.

Copies of the said acts and of the pleadings in this action accompany this case, and are to be deemed and taken to be part thereof for all purposes.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, under the aforesaid acts or either of them, the defendant is liable to be rated for or in respect of the premises occupied by him as aforesaid, and mentioned in the said rate, or any part thereof, and in respect of which he was rated or assessed in the said rate as aforesaid. If the Court should be of opinion that the defendant is not liable under the said acts or either of them to be so rated, then judgment of nolle prosequi is to be entered; but if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then the plea of the defendant is to be withdrawn, and judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff, for the sum of 10*l.* 14*s.*, or for such other and less sum as that an interlocutory judgment signed without an appearance entered is a nullity, and cannot be waived.

[ALDERSON, B.—The act 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, that enables writs of trial to be executed before the sheriff, had reference to immediate execution; but then, under the statute that power may be taken away by the Judge. But if the Judge does not take it away, execution proceeds, and the effect is the same as in the case of a verdict at Nisi Prius. What then would be the consequence of a single Judge setting aside a verdict at Nisi Prius? If his act would be a mere nullity you are right: if it is an irregularity you are wrong.]

It is submitted that the act of the Judge was a nullity.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This rule must be discharged. The service of the order of July 1846 being an impediment to the plaintiff's proceeding, he ought to have applied in Michaelmas term to set aside the order. Instead of this, he waits until an application is made for judgment as in case of a nonsuit. And he even then omits to apply to this Court to set aside the order until Trinity term in this year. That was too late, for the order of the Judge was not a nullity, but a mere irregularity.

ALDERSON, B.—The act of the Judge in setting aside the verdict was a mere irregularity, and if pointed out at the time would have been set right; and under the circumstances we should not have rigidly scrutinized the time for making the application. The practice in such a case is to apply to the Court promptly to set the order aside. Here, the order was erroneous, but the application to rescind it ought to have been made in Michaelmas term, 1846. The general rule must prevail, as the motion was not made in reasonable time. There must be an end of litigation. The general maxim applies to this case, quod fieri non debet factum valet.

wife of the testator took only an estate for life in the premises in question. It is not given to her and her heirs. In Moor v. Denn(1) the devise was "all the rest of my lands, tenements, and hereditaments, either freehold or copyhold, whatsoever or wheresoever; and also all my goods, &c., after payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I give and devise the same unto my wife Sissily Carr," and it was held that the wife took only an estate for life. That was a decision of the House of Lords, and proceeded on the ground that the premises were devised, and subject to a charge.

[PARKE, B.—The lessor of the plaintiff is to cut down the will. It does not direct that the devisee is to pay the debts. The only question then is, whether the devise to the "sole and separate use and benefit" of the wife reduces the estate to an estate for life.]

The rule on this subject is stated by Grose, J., in Goodtitle v. Maddern(2): "The rule has been long established, that if the executor be bound to pay the debts by the terms of the devise, he must take a fee in the lands devised to him, in respect of which such obligation is thrown upon him; but if he be only to pay them out of the produce of the land devised to him, or only to take the land after payment of debts, then, without words of inheritance, the fee will not pass." And the language of Lawrence, J. is to the same effect. He referred to Saunderson v. Dobson(3).

Per Curiam(4).—We are all of opinion that the wife of the testator took an estate in fee in the premises in question; and, therefore, there will be no rule.

Nov. 20. } ORGILL v. BELL.

Writ of Trial—Judge's Order to set aside Verdict—Irregularity.

The plaintiff having obtained a verdict in a writ of trial, a Judge at chambers, instead of staying the execution of the writ, made an order on the 6th of July 1846, for setting aside the verdict, on the ground of the irregularity of the notice of trial:—Held, that this was not a nullity, but an irregularity; and that an application to rescind the order made on the last day of Trinity term 1847 was too late.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Platt, B. should not be rescinded. A writ of trial having issued, directing the cause to be tried before the sheriff, the plaintiff gave notice of trial for a time when the Court did not sit, except for the purpose of trying, by adjournment, causes previously undisposed of. The defendant's attorney attended at the court on the day in question, and protested against the trial taking place on the ground of the insufficiency of the notice, but the trial proceeded, and the plaintiff had a verdict.

On the 6th of July 1846, Platt, B. made an order, directing that the verdict and all subsequent proceedings should be set aside.

In Michaelmas term, 1846, the defendant obtained a rule for judgment as in case of a nonsuit; and on the last day of Trinity term, 1847, the plaintiff obtained the present rule.

C. C. Jones, Serj. shewed cause.—The ground on which this rule was obtained is, that in the case of a writ of trial a Judge at chambers has no power to set aside a verdict, his authority being confined to staying execution on the writ. The course, however, taken by the Judge was, at the most, a mere irregularity, and has been waived by the plaintiff's delay in coming to this Court.

Crouch, contra.—The Judge had no power to set aside the verdict; his power under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 18. was limited to staying the judgment or the execution upon the writ. The proceeding therefore was not a mere irregularity, but an absolute nullity, and is not cured by the lapse of time. Roberts v. Spurr(1) shews order on being shewn to the gaoler was by him forwarded to the sheriff, who lived at some distance from the gaol. On the Sunday following a warrant of detainer, founded on a ca. sa. which had been issued on the previous day, was served upon the gaoler, who thereupon detained the defendant:—Held, that the defendant had no right to his discharge, as the sheriff was entitled to a reasonable time to search his office for other writs against the defendant, and that the service of the warrant on the Sunday made no difference in the case.

This was a rule to set aside the execution of a writ of ca. sa., and to discharge the defendant out of the custody of the sheriff of Cambridgeshire, under the following circumstances, disclosed by the affidavits. The defendant having been in custody of the sheriff of Cambridgeshire, in the county gaol at Cambridge, at the suit of a Mr. Brown, received on Saturday, the 12th of November an order from Brown for his discharge out of custody. This order having been shewn to the gaoler, was by him forwarded to the under-sheriff, who resided at Wisbeach. On the Sunday following the gaoler received from the under-sheriff a warrant of detainer under a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, which had been issued on the day previous.

Pashley now moved accordingly.—In this case the defendant is entitled to his discharge, for he is detained under a warrant executed on Sunday, and such detainer is void under the stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 7. s. 6, which provides, “that no person or persons upon the Lord’s day shall serve or execute, or cause to be served or executed any writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or decree (except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace), but that the service of every such writ, process, order, warrant, judgment, or decree shall be void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.” This case has been moved before Platt, B., and by him referred to the full Court. His Lordship indeed expressed an opinion against the defendant’s discharge, on the ground that by analogy to the 16th section of the Statute of Frauds, relating to a fi. fa., the body of the defendant was bound from the issuing of the writ of ca. sa. on the Saturday. It is submitted, however, that that ground cannot be supported.

[PARKE, B.—This is not a service or execution of process. If there had been no warrant of detainer, it does not follow that the defendant would have had a right to his discharge. The sheriff is entitled to wait a reasonable time before he discharges a prisoner; he is to have time to search his office to ascertain if there are other writs lodged against him. If, in this case, a reasonable time had not elapsed until the Monday, the defendant would not be entitled to his discharge before that day.]

The defendant is detained in custody by virtue of the warrant which has been lodged against him on the Sunday.

PARKE, B.—The defendant is not entitled to his discharge. The warrant came from the sheriff on the Sunday, the writ of ca. sa. having been lodged with him the day before. The sheriff did not live at Cambridge, and, being responsible for the safe custody of the defendant, was entitled to a reasonable time to inquire if any other writs had been lodged against him.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. The sheriff is entitled to a reasonable time for making inquiries in his office as to other writs against the defendant.

POLLOCK, C.B., and ROLFE, B. concurred.

Pashley took nothing.

Affidavit to hold to bail, Validity of.

An affidavit to hold to bail is bad, which states that the defendant “before and at the time of the commencement of this action was and still is justly indebted to the deponent in 100l., for work done, and materials for the same provided, and goods manufactured and made by the said deponent for the said defendant, and at his request.”

This was a rule, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why an order of Platt, B. for holding the defendant to bail should not be rescinded, on the ground of the insufficiency of the affidavit on which the order was made. The affidavit in question, which was made by one of the plaintiffs, stated that “Sergius de Maltzoff, the defendant in this action, before and at the time of the commencement of this action was and still is justly and truly indebted to the deponent and to Edward Pontifex, his, deponent's, partner in trade, in 100*l.* for work done, and materials for the same provided, and goods manufactured and made, by the deponent and his said partner, for said Sergius de Maltzoff, and at his request."

Martin shewed cause.—The affidavit is sufficient. The goods in question, having been ordered by an individual for a particular purpose, cannot be expected to produce the same price if they were to be re-sold. The case differs from that of the affidavit to hold to bail for goods sold.

Hoggins, contra, was not called on.

PARKE, B.—The affidavit is indefinite. Non constat that any property in the goods passed to the defendant; the defendant may not have accepted the goods. The contract may be executory. The case cannot be put more strongly in favour of the plaintiffs, than by comparing it to the case of goods bargained and sold, without alleging that they are delivered, and an affidavit stating that a party is indebted to another for goods sold cannot be supported (1). The rule for discharging the defendant out of custody must be made absolute. The capias is to stand as a justification to the sheriff.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiffs to shew cause why the record and all subsequent proceedings should not be set aside for irregularity, with costs.

The declaration stated, that the plaintiffs were the drawers, and the defendant the acceptor of a bill of exchange, payable three months after date, for the sum of 38*l.* 11*s.* There were also counts for goods sold and delivered and on an account stated.

The pleas were, first, that the defendant did not accept the bill; secondly, to the residue of the declaration, "never indebted."

The issue delivered was in conformity with the declaration and pleas.

At the trial, before Wilde, C.J., at the last Bristol Summer Assizes, the plaintiffs, in support of their case, put in evidence a bill of exchange, drawn by them and accepted by the defendant, payable at two months after date, for the sum of 38*l.* 11*s.*

Ball, for the defendant, objected that this was not the bill declared on. On reference to the record it appeared that the word "two" had been written on an erasure. The learned Chief Justice said he could only try the issues as they appeared on the record, and accordingly a verdict was returned for the plaintiffs for the amount of the bill and the interest.

Ball having obtained a rule nisi to set aside the record, &c.,

Nov. 20. } COLLIER.

Mortgage—7 Geo. 2. c. 20. s. 1.—Action of Covenant—Jurisdiction of Court and Judge.

The 7 Geo. 2. c. 20. enacts, that “where any action shall be brought on any bond for payment of the money secured by such mortgage or performance of the covenants therein contained,” the persons entitled to redeem may pay to the mortgagee the principal, interest, and costs, and the Court may, by rules of the same Court, compel such mortgagee to deliver up all deeds, &c. to the mortgagor:—Held, that the statute was applicable to an action of covenant on a mortgage deed, and that a Judge at chambers, as well as the Court, had power to order the delivering up of the deeds.

All powers possessed by the superior courts at common law, as well as those given by statute to the Court in general terms, without any special limitation, may be exercised by a single Judge, as the delegate of the Court.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Platt, B. should not be rescinded or varied. It appeared from the affidavits that the defendant having in January 1845 borrowed the sum of 400*l.* of the plaintiffs’ testator, secured by a mortgage, the plaintiffs, as executors of the mortgagee, in December 1846, brought an action of covenant against the defendant on the mortgage deed. The defendant then obtained a Judge’s order, by consent, for staying all proceedings in that action on payment of the principal, interest, and expenses, which were accordingly paid. The defendant then demanded the mortgage deed and title deeds, which the plaintiffs refused to deliver up on the ground that the attorney for the plaintiffs had a lien upon them for work done for the defendant. A Judge’s summons for the delivery of the deeds having been taken out, and attended before Platt, B., his Lordship on the 25th of February made an order for the plaintiffs to deliver to the defendant a certain mortgage deed of the 6th of January 1845, and all other deeds and writings relating thereto in the possession of the plaintiffs, the amount of the mortgage, interest, and expenses having been paid and satisfied by the defendant. A rule nisi to rescind this order having been obtained,—

Whitehurst and Flood now shewed cause.—The order of Platt, B. was good, and ought not to be rescinded. It will be contended, on the other side, that the present being an action of covenant, the statute 7 Geo. 2. c. 20. does not apply to the case, and that the Judge had no power to make the order in question. The first section of that statute enacts, that “where any action shall be brought on any bond for payment of the money secured by such mortgage, on performance of the covenants therein contained, or where any action of ejectment shall be brought,” the mortgagor may pay to the mortgagee all the principal monies and interest due on such mortgage and costs, and may by rules of court compel the mortgagee to surrender the lands and deliver up title deeds, &c. It is true the statute uses the word “bond,” but an action of covenant is clearly within the mischief intended to be prevented, and ought to stand in the same situation. Anonymous (1) is precisely in point. That was an action of covenant, and the Court granted a rule to shew cause why, upon payment of interest and costs, the mortgage deed should not be delivered up to the mortgagor. A similar application was made in Dixon v. Wigram (2), which was also an action of covenant, and the Court held distinctly that the case was within the statute. Besides, the word “bond” is not to be taken in the limited sense of an obligation under seal for the payment of money. It is often used in a more extensive signification. In Sawyer v. Mawgridge (3) the following writing under seal was held to be a bond:—“These are to authorize you to sell my goods to the amount of 9*l.*, which I do hereby acknowledge to owe you.” There Holt, C.J. and Powell, J. held that “the word ‘oblige’ is not necessary to make a bond, for if one under hand and seal acknowledges himself ‘indebted,’ it is enough to bind him.” The authorities are collected in 2 Roll. Abr. ‘Obligation,’ p. 146; and in Petersdorff’s Abridgment, tit. ‘Bond.’

(2) 2 Cr. & Jer. 613; s. c. 1 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 233.

(3) 11 Mod. 218.

Sealed bills for the payment of money were formerly denominated 'bonds.' [They referred to Doe d. Capps v. Capps (4).] The other point contended for by the plaintiffs is, that a Judge at chambers has no power to make such an order as the present, but that it ought to be made by the Court. This argument is founded upon the strict words of the statute, which says, that if the mortgagor shall bring into court the principal monies, interest and costs, such money for principal, interest, and costs, to be ascertained and computed by the Court where such action is or shall be depending, or by the proper officer (by such Court to be appointed for that purpose), the monies so paid to such mortgagee or mortgagees, or brought in such court, shall be deemed and taken to be in full satisfaction and discharge of such mortgage, and the Court shall and may discharge any such mortgagor or defendant of and from the same accordingly; and shall and may, by rule or rules of the same court, compel such mortgagee or mortgagees, at the costs and charges of such mortgagor or mortgagors, to assign, surrender, or re-convey such mortgaged lands. It may be conceded that a Judge at chambers has no original jurisdiction, but he possesses so much power as the Court may think fit to delegate to him.

[ALDERSON, B.—The act of a Judge setting aside a judgment in vacation is in fact the act of the Court.]

[PARKE, B.—He is the delegate of the Court.]

Where, indeed, a statute directs any act to be done in term time, or in open court, there, indeed, the Court alone have power to act; but where authority is given to the Court generally to do any act, the Court, unless specially prevented, may delegate their authority to a single Judge.

[PARKE, B.—The 43 Geo. 3. c. 46. s. 2. enacts, that where a defendant having deposited a sum of money in lieu of bail, afterwards puts in and perfects bail, the sum of money deposited by him "shall, by order of the Court, upon motion to be made for that purpose, be repaid to such defendant." The language of the act in that case shews that a Judge at chambers has no power to interfere. There are cases where the legislature has distinguished between the powers of the Judge and those of the Court; but where no such distinction is drawn, the Judge may do all that may be done by the Court. The act of the Judge, when adopted by the Court, is binding on the Court.]

The order of a Judge may be varied or altered by the Court, and therefore there can be no hardship; but the most monstrous consequences would ensue if a Judge had not the power contended for. (They were then stopped by the Court.)

[ALDERSON, B.—The point is perfectly clear.]

Martin and Mellor, contra.—The Judge had no jurisdiction to make this order, for the statute applies only to actions upon bonds, and not to actions of covenant on a mortgage deed. The case of Dixon v. Wigram is not law, and ought to be overruled. In the anonymous case in Chitty's Reports, Bayley, J. seems to have doubted whether the Court had such authority, for he says, "To grant this motion seems to be converting this court into a court of equity. However, the rule nisi may as well be granted, as cause may afterwards be shewn." Parke, B. says, in Becke v. Smith (5), "It is a very useful rule in the construction of a statute to adhere to the ordinary meaning of the words used, and to the grammatical construction, unless that it is at variance with the intention of the legislature, to be collected from the statute itself, or leads to any manifest absurdity or repugnance, in which case the language may be varied or modified, so as to avoid such inconvenience, but no further" (6). The statute in question does not, in its terms, apply to an action on a mortgage deed. The words of the preamble also lead to the same conclusion.

[PARKE, B.—The word "mortgage" means the pledge of an estate.]

It is submitted that the word means the deed of mortgage.

[ROLFE, B.—Proceedings have frequently been stayed under circumstances similar to the present. Perhaps the legislature introduced the word "bond" ex majore cautela, intending to include even actions on collateral securities.]

[ALDERSON, B.—The statute would be rendered almost useless if we adhered to such a literal interpretation as you contend for.]

Secondly, the authority of a Judge at chambers is not a delegation of power from the Court. In the present case the words of the statute are plain and imperative in directing the motion to be made in open court. This is a power which is given solely by statute, and ought, therefore, to be strictly construed.

[ALDERSON, B.—At common law a judgment improperly obtained may be set aside by the Court, and is continually set aside by a Judge at chambers. There are cases, indeed, where the power of the Judge is taken away by statute: for instance, where an act of parliament directs the motion to be made in open court during term time, or in vacation by a Judge. That language shews that in such a case the motion during term time must be made in banc. As, therefore, the power given by the common law may be exercised by a Judge, where is the difference in regard to its exercise between such a power and one that is conferred by statute? If your construction were correct a very useful statute would be rendered useless during three-fourths of the year.]

Jones v. Fitzaddams (7) and Shaw v. Roberts (8) shew that in many cases the authority of a Judge at chambers is taken away.

[ALDERSON, B.—The first section of the Interpleader Act 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58. enacts, that "it shall be lawful for the Court, or any Judge thereof, to make rules" of interpleader; whereas the 6th section says that "it shall be lawful to and for the Court" to call the parties before them by rule of court.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—In that case the statute itself which gives the authority makes the distinction between the powers of the Court and of the Judge.]

They then argued upon the facts of the case.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This rule must be discharged. The two questions in this case lie in a very narrow compass. Mr. Martin contends, first, that the power of a Judge to interfere in this case is confined to actions on bonds or of ejectment; secondly, that a Judge at chambers has no authority in a case like the present. As to the first point, there is an express authority against Mr. Martin's argument, in the shape of a decision of more than twenty years' standing. It is clear that an action of covenant is within the mischief contemplated by the statute, and it would be a strained construction of the statute which should give another meaning to it. I may observe that the statute speaks of an action on a bond for the "performance of the covenant," but says nothing as to an action of debt upon the mortgage deed. The word "bond" has a large meaning; it signifies an obligation to pay a sum of money. I think, therefore, that the Judge had the power of making this order. Where a power is given simply by the legislature to the Court, it is intended that the Judge should exercise all the ordinary powers of the Court; and no distinction exists between powers existing at common law and those conferred by statute, unless such distinction can be collected from the language of the statute itself. That distinction may arise in many ways. Where a motion is by the legislature expressly directed to be made in open court during term, there it may reasonably be urged that the authority was intended to be confined to the Court. This was the case in Jones v. Fitzaddams, where the application for the defendant's discharge is directed to be made in term time to one of the superior courts at Westminster. Unless, therefore, the power given by any act of parliament is specially limited by the act itself, it is to be exercised in the same manner as any other of the powers of the Court. The plaintiffs, therefore, are not entitled to succeed on either of the points. With regard to the facts of the case, as the order has been suffered to remain unquestioned for two terms, it is sufficient to say that the Court will not interfere.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the first point: if the matter had been res nova, I should perhaps have hesitated to construe the statute 7 Geo. 2.

(7) 1 Cr. & M. 855.

(8) 2 Dowl. P.C. 25.

c. 20. in the manner that it has been lately construed, so as to make it include the action of covenant. But the rule is an important one, and has been acted upon in a different manner for a considerable time. With regard to the principle as to the construction of statutes, I proceed on that which was laid down by Burton, J., in Warburton v. Loveland, and, guided by this principle, I should have hesitated to hold that the language of the statute would include an action of covenant. But this is not the first time the point has arisen; for my attention has been called to the case of Dixon v. Wigram, and I have acted upon it. The principle laid down in that case is a salutary one, and ought to be abided by. We have authority for holding the present case to be within the statute. The second point is, whether a Judge at chambers has authority to act upon the statute, and make the order in question. In construing this statute we must hold that the legislature intended that the powers conferred by the statute should be exercised in the ordinary way, unless the context shews a different intention. When, therefore, the Judge performs those duties which belong to the Court, he must be considered as exercising a delegated power, and is to exercise it in the same manner as the Court, unless the act of parliament, which confers the power, shews by its context a different intention on the part of the legislature. For example, in the 43 Geo. 3. c. 46, the enactment that the motion is to be made in open court, shews that a Judge was not intended to have any power in the matter. In like manner, the language of the 48 Geo. 3. c. 123, which enacts, that the application must be made in term time to one of the superior courts, shews the intention of the legislature to be that the powers should be exercised by the Court and not by the Judge. So in the Interpleader Act, the 1st section states that it shall be lawful for "the Court or any Judge thereof" to make rules or orders; whereas the 6th section enacts, that "the Court" shall have power, by "rule of court," to call the parties before them. That shews a distinction between the powers to be exercised by the Court and the Judge. I am of opinion, therefore, that in this case the Judge had jurisdiction to make the order. With regard to the other parts of the case, I think the order was proper.

The rule therefore will be discharged, with costs.

ALDERSON, B.—If the matter were res nova, I should require some time to consider before giving an opinion. But I am almost inclined to think that the words of the act will bear the construction placed upon them by the defendant. At all events, that construction has been acted on for many years, and no doubt has been entertained on the point. I have acted on this view of the statute, having considered myself bound by the same authorities that have been cited to-day. Those decisions are in conformity with the real spirit and intention of the act; and I am glad that such cases exist, enabling us to do substantial justice, by allowing defendants to get rid of actions against them on doing what is just towards the plaintiffs. It would certainly be strange if the legislature, by allowing parties to shift the form of the action, and bring covenant instead of debt, had enabled them to deprive defendants of the benefit of the statute. I form my opinion, however, on the authority of decided cases. With respect to the other point, as to the authority of a Judge at chambers, I think there is no doubt when the legislature gives the Court powers in general terms, it is the same as if those powers were given by the common law. The legislature is aware of the powers habitually exercised by the Court, and when they grant any fresh powers, they are to be exercised in the same way. If special terms are intended to be imposed, the legislature would so express themselves. Cases of statutes have been referred to, where it is clear that the authority is to be exercised only by the Court in banc, and when that intention is expressed, it is reasonable so to construe it. But if authority is given to the Court on the ordinary terms, it is to be exercised in the usual way in which the Court exercises its powers.

ROLFE, B.—I rejoice that an authority can be found in support of the defendant's view of this case; and whatever may be said as to Mr. Justice Bayley's view of this question, in the Anonymous case in Chitty's Reports, the decision of the Court of Exchequer, of which Bayley, J. was a Judge, fourteen years afterwards, in Dixon v. Wigram is to the effect that the case was clearly within the statute. And certainly it would be most mischievous, if a point which has been settled and acted upon for so many years were now to be called into question. Under some circumstances it is not necessary to inquire if a decision was in the first instance correct; although in the present case I should say that such a decision was a reasonable one. I quite assent to the position that statutes are to be construed according to their plain and obvious meaning; but there are many cases in which a word is introduced into a statute by mistake. In the present case, the act of parliament refers only to one species of action brought with reference to a mortgage. It says, "where any action shall be brought on any bond for payment of the money secured by such mortgage, or performance of the covenants therein contained." Now, the ordinary case is that of an action brought on the mortgage deed itself. I am almost disposed to think that we might reject the words, "on any bond," seeing that the substantial object of the action is to secure the mortgage debt and interest. The words, too, "covenants therein contained," are an imperfect expression. I do not, therefore, think that the defendant's argument would have been hopeless if the matter had been res integra; but I am satisfied of the propriety of abiding by a decision which has been acted upon for years. With respect to the jurisdiction of the Judge, I have no difficulty in saying, that I agree with the rest of the Court.

1847. { GREEN AND OTHERS, ASSIGNEES
Nov. 23. { OF OSBORN, A BANKRUPT,
v. LAURIE, KNT., AND OTHERS.

Bankrupt—Prior Act of Bankruptcy—
2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1, and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122.
s. 22.—Execution.

A trader, being indebted to the defendants, on the 1st of July filed a declaration of insolvency, pursuant to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22, and, on the following day, gave notice thereof to the defendants; at a subsequent period of the same day the defendants levied an execution on the trader's goods. A fiat in bankruptcy issued on the day following:—Held, that the act of bankruptcy dated from the time of filing the declaration of insolvency, and that the defendants, having had notice thereof, were not entitled to the proceeds of the execution within the meaning of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1.

Interpleader. In this case the plaintiffs, assignees of W. H. Osborn, a bankrupt, affirmed that the proceeds of the goods, seized by the sheriff of Middlesex, under a fi. fa., at the suit of the defendants against W. H. Osborn, were not liable to be paid over to the defendants. The contrary was affirmed by the defendants.

At the trial, before Pollock, C.B., at the London Sittings after Hilary term, 1847, the following facts appeared:—The plaintiffs were the assignees of the estate and effects of W. H. Osborn, a bankrupt; and the defendants were the trustees and directors of the Union Bank of London; and the question was, whether the proceeds of certain goods, which had been seized and sold by the sheriff of Middlesex, were liable to be paid over to the defendants as the execution creditors of W. H. Osborn, under the following circumstances: In 1844, Osborn opened an account with the Union Bank of London, at their branch office in Argyle Place, and was in the habit of discounting bills there. The bank, having discounted a bill for 300*l.*, drawn by Osborn, and the same having been afterwards dishonoured, brought an action against Osborn, who consented to a Judge's order for payment of the amount on the 1st of July, and for the issuing of execution in case of default. On the 1st of July, Osborn signed a declaration of insolvency, attested by his attorney, and a petition to the Chancellor for a fiat in bankruptcy; and on the same day, the declaration of insolvency was filed in the office of the Secretary of Bankrupts, and a docket struck. At five minutes before ten, on the 2nd of July, a notice of the filing of the declaration of insolvency was served on the manager of the branch bank, in Argyle Place; and, at a subsequent period of the same day, a writ of fi. fa., at the suit of the present defendants, was issued against the goods of the bankrupt. The fiat issued on the 3rd of July. Under these circumstances, it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that they were entitled to the verdict. The learned Chief Baron was of opinion, on the authority of Conway v. Nall (1), that the defendants were entitled to the verdict; and he directed the jury accordingly, reserving leave to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them for 325*l*.

Martin having, in Easter term, obtained a rule nisi, accordingly,—

Gurney shewed cause.—The question in this case is, whether the execution of the defendants is valid under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. s. 1, which gives validity to executions executed and levied before the date and issuing of the fiat, provided the execution creditor had no notice of any prior act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt. Here the defendants, having had notice of the declaration of insolvency on the 2nd of July, levied their execution at a subsequent period of the same day, and on the following day a fiat in bankruptcy issued against the bankrupt. Under these circumstances, it is submitted that the defendants cannot be considered to have had notice of an act of bankruptcy. The question turns upon the construction of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22, which enacts, "that if any trader shall file in the office of the Lord Chancellor's secretary of bankrupts a declaration in writing (in the form, schedule D, hereunto annexed), signed by such trader, and attested by an attorney or solicitor, that he is unable to meet his engagements, every such trader shall be deemed thereby to have committed an act of bankruptcy at the time of filing such declaration;" and then follows the proviso, "provided a fiat in bankruptcy shall issue against such trader within two months from the filing of such declaration." The declaration of insolvency in this case was not in itself an act of bankruptcy; it did not become such until the fiat issued, and as the defendants had levied their execution before the issuing of the fiat, notice to them of the declaration of insolvency was not equivalent to notice of an act of bankruptcy. An act of bankruptcy to affect the creditor must be something upon which he can act at the time; but here the defendants could not act upon the declaration of insolvency, because it was not certain at the time of its being filed that a fiat would issue within two months; and unless a fiat issued within that period there could be no act of bankruptcy. Hocking v. Acraman (2) resembles this case; there it was held, that notice of a docket having been struck was not notice of an act of bankruptcy. In Conway v. Nall the notice of the act of bankruptcy was in these terms:—"John Nall has committed an act of bankruptcy. He signed a declaration of insolvency yesterday. He will be declared a bankrupt immediately. I have sent for a fiat." This was held not to be such a notice as would deprive an execution creditor of the protection of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29, as the 6th section of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16, required the declaration of insolvency to be filed, and to be advertised in the London Gazette, before it amounted to a complete act of bankruptcy. It is remarkable that in that case the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22. was not referred to either in the argument or in the judgment, and the case, if correctly reported, appears to have turned upon the construction of the 6th section of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. The language, however, of Tindal, C.J., however, is important: he says, "The meaning of these words appears to me to be, that the party in order to defeat an execution shall have notice of a prior act of bankruptcy, complete in itself, at the time the notice is given to him;" and Cresswell, J. says, "I do not think an execution creditor can be called upon in this way to speculate as to whether or not all the necessary steps will be taken to make the declaration of insolvency an act of bankruptcy."

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Your argument is, that the assignees gave you notice of an incipient act of bankruptcy only.]

Yes; and that the notice to be good ought to have been such as that the party receiving it might safely act upon it. Doe d. Mann v. Walters (3) and Doe d. Lyster v. Goldwin (4) are in point. It is fit, however, to mention, that a case of Follett v. Hoppe (5) was decided yesterday in the Common Pleas, and would seem to govern this case.

[ROLFE, B.—The declaration of insolvency is to be an act of bankruptcy at the time of filing the declaration, provided a fiat issues, but the filing of the declaration is the only act of bankruptcy.]

[PARKE, B.—Under the old law, where the bankrupt's imprisonment was complete, the act of bankruptcy dated from the commencement of it. So in this case, after the fiat issued, the act of bankruptcy is to be considered as complete at the time of filing the declaration.]

Martin (Bramwell with him).—The case of Follett v. Hoppe, which was decided yesterday in the Court of Common Pleas, is precisely in point. After the fiat has been issued the declaration of insolvency becomes an act of bankruptcy from the time of filing it. The defendant, therefore, is not within the protection of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. (He was then stopped by the Court).

POLLOCK, C.B.—This case apparently has been decided by Conway v. Nall, although there the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 22. was not referred to. The case is plain, without reference to the late decision of the Common Pleas in Follett v. Hoppe. The rule must be made absolute.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. In the case of Conway v. Nall the attention of the Court was not called to the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. Here the question turns upon the 22nd section of that act, and the point is as clear as possible. [His Lordship read the section.] In this case the fiat issued within two months from the filing of the declaration of insolvency; the act of bankruptcy, therefore, dates from the time of the filing of the declaration, and consequently the defendants, having had notice of the act of bankruptcy before they levied their execution, are not entitled to the benefit of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29. The rule must, therefore, be made absolute.

ALDERSON, B. and ROLFE, B. concurred.

filing of a declaration of insolvency is a complete act of bankruptcy, without the same being advertised in the London Gazette, as required by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 6, and that a notice of that fact is a sufficient notice of a prior act of bankruptcy to deprive an execution creditor of the protection of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 29.

Statute—Paving Commissioners—Rate—Kent and Essex Yard “within” High Street.

By the act, 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix, for better paving, improving, and regulating the streets of the metropolis, and removing and preventing nuisances and obstructions therein, all rates made after the passing of that act for paving or repairing the streets in any parochial or other district by virtue of any local act, or of the said act, are (by section 24) to be laid on all persons who shall inhabit, hold, occupy, be in possession of or enjoy any messuages, tenements, lands, grounds, &c., situate or being within any of the streets within the said parochial or other district. By section 76. power was given to number the houses, &c. within the streets.

By the act, 11 Geo. 3. c. 15, for the better paving part of the High Street, White-chapel, and for removing obstructions and annoyances therein, commissioners appointed under the act were empowered, for defraying the charges attending the execution of the powers of the act, to rate all and every person and persons who do or shall inhabit, hold, occupy, possess, or enjoy any house, shop, &c., “within the said street.”

To the north side of High Street, White-chapel is Kent and Essex Yard, around and within, and opening into which are several dwelling-houses and other buildings, all of which lie and are situated at the back of other houses and premises which front the High Street. The only entrance into the yard is through carriage gates, and along a covered gateway. The yard is a private place, and the paving commissioners have no jurisdiction over it, and do not pave or cleanse it. The houses on either side of the yard abut on other streets and not on High Street, and neither the houses in the yard nor the gateway are numbered:—Held, that the inhabitants of Kent and Essex Yard were liable to be rated in respect of the paving, &c. of High Street, White-chapel, the yard being within that street for such purpose.

This was an action of debt, brought by the plaintiff, as clerk to the commissioners appointed under 11 Geo. 3. c. 15. and 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix, for 10*l.* 14*s.*, with a count on an account stated, to which the defendant pleaded nunquam indebitatus, and issue having been joined, the parties, under the order of Parke, B., stated the following

CASE.

By the 11 Geo. 3. c. 15. (after reciting that that part of High Street, Whitechapel, was extremely ill paved, and the passage through the same greatly obstructed by posts and projections, and annoyed by signs, spouts, and gutters, projecting into and over the same, whereby and by the deep channels across many parts of the said street, the same was rendered incommodious and dangerous to persons passing through the same, and that the methods then prescribed by law were ineffectual for removing such obstructions and annoyances, and for the proper paving of the said street, and keeping such pavement in sufficient repair), certain persons therein named were appointed commissioners for putting the act in execution, and provisions are contained in the act for the electing of commissioners from time to time in the room of those dying or refusing to act; and the said commissioners are empowered by the act to appoint one or more clerk or clerks and such other officers as they shall think proper; and they are empowered and authorized from time to time to cause and order the said street to be new paved, repaired, raised, sunk, or altered, when and as often and in such manner, &c. as they shall think fit. The Commissioners are also authorized to order and direct the houses within the said street to be numbered with figures placed or painted on the doors thereof, or on such other part of the said houses respectively, as the said commissioners should think proper. For defraying the charges and expenses attending the execution of the several powers granted by the act, it is enacted that a rate shall once in every year, or oftener if it shall be thought needful by the commissioners, be made, laid and assessed by them upon all and every person and persons who do or shall inhabit, hold, occupy, possess, or enjoy any house, shop, warehouse, cellar, vault, or other tenement within the said street, for raising such competent sum and sums of money as the commissioners shall from time to time judge needful and direct.

By the 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix. intituled "An Act for better paving, improving, and regulating the streets of the metropolis, and removing and preventing nuisances and obstructions therein," it is enacted, that the said act and the provisions therein contained, shall extend to all streets and public places which then were or thereafter might be paved within the cities of London and Westminster and borough of Southwark, and any other parts of the metropolis which are included within the weekly bills of mortality, and to all streets and public places which then were or thereafter might be paved within the parishes of St. Pancras and St. Marylebone, in the county of Middlesex, (except only any parts thereof which might in that act be particularly excepted). By the 24th section of the last-mentioned act it is enacted, that it may be lawful to and for the persons who, under any local act or acts for any parochial or other district within the jurisdiction of that act, are empowered to make rates for the expenses of paving or keeping in repair the pavements of any streets or public places within such parochial or other districts, either separately or jointly with other purposes, from time to time, after the making and passing of the said act, for and notwithstanding any provisions or restrictions, matters or things in such local act or acts contained, to make and sign all and every or any such rates or assessments as shall be from time to time necessary or expedient for paving or repairing the pavements of the streets and public places, within such parochial or other district, pursuant to the directions of the local act for such district, or of the said act of the 57 Geo. 3. and for the payment of all debts and charges theretofore incurred in and about the execution of such local act and of the said act or either of them as to the paving and repairing the pavements of and in such district, and for the payment of interest, &c. And that such rates may be either substituted for the rates directed by such local act, or may be additional thereto, as the persons making the said rates from time to time at the making thereof, may determine and direct. And all such rates made and signed after the passing of the said act (of the 57th Geo. 3.) for paving or repairing the pavements of the said streets or public places in any parochial or other district by virtue of any local act, or of the said act, and either separately or jointly, with or towards any other object or purposes by virtue of any local act or acts of parliament, or of the said act, shall be laid upon all persons who shall inhabit, hold, occupy, be in possession of, or enjoy any messuages, tenements, lands, grounds, coach-houses, stables, cellars, vaults, houses, shops, warehouses, or other buildings or hereditaments, situate or being within any of the streets or places within the said parochial or other district, and should be just and equal pound rates. It is, by section 76, further enacted, that the commissioners, &c. may order and direct all and every the houses, and other tenements, &c. within the streets and other public places within their respective districts to be numbered with figures placed or painted upon or over the doors thereof, or such other part of the said houses, &c. as they should think proper. By the 120th section it is further enacted, that the said commissioners may sue and be sued in the name of their clerk for the time being, and that all actions to be brought for the recovery of any rate, may be brought in the name of such clerk by action of debt in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster.

That part of High Street which is mentioned in the first of the said acts, is and at the time of the passing of the second of the said acts was situate and included within the weekly bills of mortality, and then was and still is, paved, and then was and is under the jurisdiction of the commissioners for the said district as aforesaid, and is not excepted from or out of the operation of the last-mentioned act. After the passing of the first of such acts, the commissioners therein named and appointed new paved, repaired, raised, sunk, and altered the said part of the High Street, as by the same act they were empowered, and they and the commissioners for the time being for putting that act in execution, have thence continually hitherto from time to time repaved, repaired, raised, sunk, and amended the same, and have removed, taken, carried away, and deposited as in the said act mentioned, and still do repave, repair, and amend and remove, take, carry away, and deposit all carts, &c., making or occasioning annoyance, nuisance, or obstructions in the said street, as by that act they are empowered to do.

To the north of that part of the said High Street which lies in the county of Middlesex, and communicating with the said street by means of the covered gateway hereinafter mentioned, there was long before the making of the rate hereinafter mentioned, and continually thence hitherto hath been and now is a large yard, called the "Kent and Essex Yard," around and within, and opening into which, long before the making of the said rate there had been erected, and at the time of the making of the said rate there were and still are standing several dwelling-houses, warehouses, stables, sheds, a booking-office, and other buildings. The said yard (with the exception of the width of the gateway, which is about ten feet two inches), and all the said dwelling-houses, warehouses, stables, sheds, booking-office, and other buildings round the same, lie and are situate at the back of several houses and premises which front the said High Street; these houses are entirely unconnected in every way with the said yard, dwelling-houses, &c. standing round it, and every of them; and all the said houses which front the High Street are duly rated in and by the said rate. The defendant, for upwards of twelve months before and at the time of the making of that rate, and thence continually hitherto inhabited, held, occupied, possessed, and enjoyed certain of the said houses, warehouses, stables, and lofts, and the booking-office within the said yard, being the houses, warehouses, stables, lofts, and booking-office in the said rate, and hereinafter particularly mentioned and set forth, and certain other persons whose names it is unnecessary to specify, inhabited, held, occupied, possessed, and enjoyed other of the said houses, warehouses, and buildings around and within the said yard.

The entrance into the Kent and Essex Yard is through carriage gates, and along a covered gateway of the length of twenty-two feet or thereabouts. The said gates open internally into such yard, and the gate-posts thereof abut upon the foot pavement of High Street. The gates are left open in the day time, but are usually closed at night by the defendant or his servants, (the defendant keeping the key thereof).

The gateway into the yard is entirely covered over by a portion of the house, No. 115, in High Street aforesaid, which house stands in the straight and direct line of, and abuts and fronts upon that street to the west of, and over the said gates and gateway, and is duly rated in and by the said rate, and the house adjoining to No. 115, on the east of the said gates and gateway is numbered No. 114, in the High Street, and such last-mentioned house also stands in the straight and direct line of and abuts and fronts upon the High Street, and is also duly rated in and by the said rate. The said gates and gateway are not distinguished by any number at all.

That part of the footpath of the said street which is opposite to and between the said gates and the general carriageway of the said High Street, is not laid down with flag stones, but with ordinary carriageway pavement, as is usual in similar cases in the metropolis, where a party is entitled to an entrance across the footway, and the carts and other carriages, and the horses and cattle of the defendant, in passing through the said gateway to or from the said yard, houses, &c., have at all times during his occupation and possession as aforesaid, necessarily traversed and passed over, and do necessarily traverse and pass over a large portion of the said street so paved and repaired by such commissioners, and the pavement thereof.

No part of the said yard has ever been paved, repaired, raised, sunk, or altered by the said commissioners, nor have they within the said yard at any time exercised any of the powers conferred upon them by the said acts or either of them, and none of the said houses or other buildings round the said yard ever fronted or were differently placed with respect to or more open to the High Street than they are now.

[The case then stated the making of a rate on the 22nd of November 1844, of one shilling in the pound of the yearly rent or

yearly value of such houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, vaults, or other tenements respectively, (so far as the same can be known,) except only such houses, &c. as are situate on the south side of the said High Street, &c.]

The other occupiers of the houses, warehouses, and buildings in the said yard as above mentioned, were and are also rated in the said rate in respect of such last-mentioned houses, &c.

The sum of 10*l.* 14*s.*, being the sum total and aggregate of the several sums at and in which the defendant is rated, in and by the said rate as aforesaid was, and the several sums of which the said sum of 10*l.* 14*s.* is such aggregate, were duly demanded of him before the commencement of this action, but he upon such demand refused and continually hitherto hath refused to pay the same, and each of such several sums, and every part thereof. And it is agreed that all steps, matters, and things necessary to be taken and done by the commissioners, the plaintiff, and all other parties to entitle the plaintiff as such clerk to maintain this action, (if the defendant is liable to be rated in respect of the premises occupied by him as aforesaid, and comprised in the said rate, and therein rated at the aggregate sum of 10*l.* 14*s.* as aforesaid, or any part thereof,) were by them and him taken and done previously to the commencement of the action.

Copies of the said acts and of the pleadings in this action accompany this case, and are to be deemed and taken to be part thereof for all purposes.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, under the aforesaid acts or either of them, the defendant is liable to be rated for or in respect of the premises occupied by him as aforesaid, and mentioned in the said rate, or any part thereof, and in respect of which he was rated or assessed in the said rate as aforesaid. If the Court should be of opinion that the defendant is not liable under the said acts or either of them to be so rated, then judgment of nolle prosequi is to be entered; but if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then the plea of the defendant is to be withdrawn, and judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff, for the sum of 10*l.* 14*s.*, or for such other and less sum as the Court should fix and direct, in the event of the Court being of opinion, that he is liable to be rated for and in respect of some portion only of such premises.

Sir F. Thesiger (Manisty with him), for the plaintiff.—Although the commissioners have no power over this yard to enter and pave it, and so far have no jurisdiction over it, yet they clearly have power to assess and collect this rate. If that be not so, there will be a large number of inn yards and other places which will be exempt, notwithstanding they derive benefit from the paving. The commissioners have power to assess the whole of the street; and although a house may not be quite in the range, it is still “within the street” for that purpose. There would be great difficulty in a different construction. Here, the direct and only communication with the houses in the yard is to the street, and in the popular meaning they are within the street; and that is the true meaning of this statute.

[ROLFE, B.—Nobody resides in the street, but in some house abutting on the street.]

The rating of public buildings “within the said street,” is expressly provided for; and that shews the meaning of these words, because public buildings often stand back out of the ordinary range of buildings in the street. The act of parliament uses the words “lands, grounds,” &c. “within the street,” i. e. which solely communicate with the street. Suppose this yard not built upon, would it not be clearly within the street? and what difference in principle can it make that the land has been used for the purpose of building on it? The reason of the assessment is, that the property assessed derives a benefit under the act.

[PARKE, B.—Yes; we must look to the intention of the act of parliament, which is to make those pay who are benefited.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—It cannot depend on the size of the building.]

The case of Paul v. James (1) only decided that Ely Place was a private place, and not within the jurisdiction of certain commissioners for the purpose of paving under a local act.

Butt (Hawkins with him), contra.—The facts of this case shew that the houses rated never were connected with, or the owner in any way interested in the High Street. They are in truth in Commercial Street, and, if there were a similar act for that street, would be liable to be rated under it.

[ALDERSON, B.—The case of Doe d. Humphreys v. Roberts (2) was a devise by will of all the testator’s messuage or dwelling-house in High Street in the town of H, and all and every his buildings and hereditaments in the same street. The testator had only one house in High Street, but behind that house he had two cottages fronting a lane called Backhouse Lane. There was no thoroughfare through that lane, the only entrance into it being from the High Street. In that case it was held that the two cottages passed under the will; and Holroyd, J. said, “The only way to these cottages was through the High Street, and there was no thoroughfare through Backhouse Lane. If there had been an opening from the High Street to these two cottages alone they would clearly be in the street, and I can see no difference from the circumstance of there being other houses in the court.”]

If that be so, and the sole access be the criterion, then the making of an entrance into this yard from Commercial Street would take it out of the High Street. It will be found that all the powers of the commissioners are confined to the street strictly so called; for instance, they have power to number the houses within the street, but it is not pretended that they can, nor have they ever attempted to number the houses in this yard. Again they have power to remove carts within the street, but they cannot remove anything from this yard.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Probably you cannot give the word “within” any meaning which shall be commensurate with the use of it in this act of parliament.]

This rate is not made on, nor is this, vacant ground; it is a yard behind the street; it is a private yard; and this case is governed by Paul v. James, where it was held that Ely Place, which had but one entrance, was not part of the public street. Then is this yard part of or within High Street? The houses have never fronted the street. As to the question of benefit, the defendant has no more benefit from this act than any stranger who casually passes along the High Street, and up Castle or Commercial Street. He is behind the houses abutting on the street, and does not get the benefit which the act contemplates. The object of the act is to remove nuisances, and keep the street in proper repair; and for that purpose the commissioners have power to rate the inhabitants within the street. The commissioners do not pave or cleanse this yard, and, therefore, the dwellers in the yard are not benefited within the meaning of this act.

[PARKE, B.—Possibly a small court like this may have escaped attention; but suppose it were a large public building?]

The commissioners have no jurisdiction for benefit, and why should they have for charge?

[PARKE, B.—The defendant may not have all the benefit that others have; but he must surely derive some benefit.]

Such a benefit would not render him liable to this rate.

Sir F. Thesiger, in reply.—Benefit or no benefit is hardly a test of the power to assess this property; but still it is clear the yard must be benefited by what is done under the act. Paul v. James did not raise any question of liability to a rate, but only whether "places" in that act of parliament meant public places. Here it is not contended that the commissioners have power to enter the yard. The question is, what is the meaning of the act of parliament in each particular case, and not what the words literally mean? It is said the defendant might be liable to be rated for two different streets; but here the defendant is contending against his liability to be rated at all.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think the defendant is liable to this rate. The case resolves itself into a short point, not however so clear as it is short. The case turns on whether the property rated is "within" the High Street within the meaning of the act of parliament. The intention of the legislature might have been more clearly expressed, but I think the meaning is ascertained by viewing the question in this light—Was it the intention of the framers of this act, that a person in the position of the defendant should wholly escape the rate? It is impossible not to see that he derives some benefit under the act of parliament; that as one of the public in the immediate neighbourhood he shares in the public benefit; and it is but reasonable to suppose he should bear his proportion of the public burthen. If he derives any advantage from the act of parliament he ought to pay accordingly, upon the value or the rent of the tenements; and the degree of benefit has nothing to do with the question before the court. It appears to me difficult to give any meaning to the word "within" which would be applicable to all the sections of this act. It may be that this property is not within the street for the purpose of numbering the tenements under the 76th section, though for the purpose of being rated it is within the street. If this were the case of a large establishment like an hotel it would be clearly liable. I have come to the conclusion that the act of parliament intended to make this property liable, because it is within the street in a fair and reasonable sense. If upon the construction of this act it be doubtful whether this tax was intended to be imposed on the defendant, we ought so to construe it as to admit of an equitable arrangement. The same rule does not apply to public taxes, for there you must shew a clear public liability. That is not a correct principle to apply to a case like this, where the benefit intended is confined to a particular neighbourhood, the inhabitants of which are to divide the burthen amongst them. I think for many popular purposes this property is within the street. This is not an independent place like a square. If it had been I should have more doubt, as I think it must then be named in the act. If this were one tenement, it is clear that it would be rateable. How is it less so because the owner has divided it?

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. We cannot understand the word "within" in its strict sense, for it will not bear a strict interpretation. I think that for the purpose of this rate a house is within the street where the sole communication is in the street. I also think this property is within the street.

because it is fronting on the street, for the gateway comes up to the street, and that is the property of the defendant or others within the yard. It abuts on the street, and the defendant cannot be exempt because different houses and buildings have been constructed around it. The sole communication being out of the High Street, I think the property is liable on that account. The rate is for the purpose of keeping the street in repair and free from nuisances, and the inhabitants of the yard must derive some benefit from that. I think, therefore, that this yard is within some parts of the act of parliament "within" the High Street. Other cases might be put in which there would be some difficulty. In so well-known a place as Warwick Square it would not be included, because it is reasonable to suppose that it would have been mentioned. If there were only one occupation these premises would clearly have a frontage towards the street, and on that ground I think it is "within" the High Street for the purpose of this rate. I also think that it is "within" the High Street, because the only communication is with that street.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that you cannot say that any house is literally within the street, and we must therefore come to the consideration of what is intended by the expression "within" the High Street. It seems to me that the legislature meant to impose the rate on those to whom there was some immediate benefit from the improvement. Here there was some benefit, and so it is within the street. If this were one house it would be clear. The houses are in this street, because they communicate with it and there is no other into which they have access. Holroyd, J. in Doe v. Roberts shews that that is the principle on which to go. It is true you cannot number them, but that is because they are out of the line of the street.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion.—Even if the commissioners had no power to rate anything but houses I should think these houses were within the street. It might not be so in every case, but prima facie if houses are accessible only from the street by a gateway they are within the street. If you build upon a space before a house so as to leave it with only a narrow entrance from the street, and it has no other access it still remains in the street, though it has become a back tenement.

The 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 52. s. 33. imposes a penalty on any maltster treading or forcing together corn in a couch-frame. The 1 Vict. c. 49. s. 5. empowers officers of Excise to throw the corn out of the couch-frame, and return it; and if any increase be found in the gauge of the corn after its being returned and laid level in the couch-frame (in any greater proportion, &c.), the increase so found is to be deemed conclusive evidence of such corn having been trodden and forced together; and the maltster is to be convicted in the said penalty. Upon an information, and conviction, before Justices, for the above penalty, it appeared that the uniform mode recently adopted by the Excise of returning the corn was by piling it up in the centre of the couch, in the form of a cone, and then levelling it, instead of by casting the corn equally all over the floor of the couch-frame as formerly usual:—Held, by the Court of Exchequer, upon the construction of the above statutes, that the officer of Excise had some discretion—and it might be, that he had an absolute discretion—as to the mode of returning the grain, and that the above mode not appearing to be improper, an increase so found in the gauge of the corn (beyond the allowed increase) was conclusive evidence of the offence in the 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 52. s. 33, and that the conviction was right.

Demurrer, assigning for cause that the plea amounts to a denial of having accepted the said bill of exchange as in the declaration alleged, and is an informal and argumentative traverse of that allegation, and amounts to the general issue. Joinder in demurrer.

Butt, in support of the demurrer.—This plea is clearly bad upon special demurrer on the authority of Jones v. Corbett (1). In that case a plea by A, one of two defendants sued as acceptors of a bill of exchange, stated, that before and at the time, &c. defendants were partners, and as such had accepted bills in the partnership name; that B, the other defendant, accepted the bill in question, using the said name in fraud of A. for his own private purposes, and not those of the partnership, and without the authority of A; and that A. never had any consideration or value for the acceptance and never adopted it: of all which premises the plaintiff, at the times of the drawing and accepting, had notice. That was held on special demurrer a bad plea, as amounting to an argumentative denial of the acceptance. Patten, J. there said, "There is not in this plea any confession of an acceptance in fact; if there had been it would have been proper to plead specially anything that gave it the character of illegality. But when it is said that the person who appears as acceptor was not an authorized agent for the purpose,

H, being joint owner with the defendant of estates in Berbice, advanced to the latter large sums on account of the defendant's share of the liabilities in respect of those estates, and received on account thereof the defendant's acceptance for 3,000*l.* on the following terms, contained in a letter written by the defendant to him:—"Should the crops (of the estates) not come forward in time to provide for these notes, I shall expect to have them renewed for such period as may be found necessary from the condition of the properties." The crops being and still continuing unproductive, the bills were renewed on three several occasions; but ultimately H. refused to renew further, and the plaintiffs, who were indorsees of H, with notice of the agreement, brought the present action:—Held, that they were entitled to recover, as the agreement stipulated for one renewal only.

Assumpsit on a bill of exchange, drawn, on the 10th of November 1846, by L. L. Hodge, upon and accepted by the defendant, for 3,000*l.*, payable at six months, by L. L. Hodge, and indorsed to the plaintiffs.

Plea.—That the defendant accepted the said bill on certain terms contained in a written agreement of the 13th of November 1843, made between L. L. Hodge and the defendant, that if crops to the value of the amount of the said bill, being the produce of certain estates in the West Indies, should not, before the said bill should become due, have come to England, the said bill should not be paid by the defendant when due, but should then be renewed by L. L. Hodge drawing on the defendant, and by the defendant accepting another bill of exchange for 3,000*l.*, payable to the order of L. L. Hodge, at such a time as should be reasonably necessary to allow of the net produce of crops to the aforesaid value of the produce of the said estates coming to England, by such last-mentioned time, and by the said L. L. Hodge and the defendant drawing and accepting the said other bill, in renewal of the bill in the first count mentioned, to which last-mentioned time the payment of the amount of the bill in the first count mentioned should be postponed; that no net produce of the said estates came to England before the bill became due; that the defendant was ready to renew the bill by accepting another bill for 3,000*l.*, drawn by L. L. Hodge, but that L. L. Hodge would not draw on the defendant any such other bill; and that the plaintiffs at the time of renewing the bill had full knowledge of the same having been accepted on the said terms and conditions. Verification.

Replication de injuriâ. At the trial, before Parke, B., at the last Kent Summer Assizes, the facts appeared to be as follows:—Mr. Langford Lovell Hodge and the defendant were, in 1843, and still are, joint owners of estates in Berbice. These estates having been mortgaged, Hodge had from time to time made advances to the defendant to enable him to pay off his share of the mortgage debt, and received the produce of the estates, which he applied in part liquidation of his claim against the defendant. In November 1843, the advances made by Hodge, on account of the joint estates, amounting to 14,000*l.*, of which the defendant was liable for one-half, it was agreed that, for the future, the entire advances should not exceed 8,000*l.*, and that one-half of the difference between that sum and 14,000*l.*, namely, 3,000*l.*, being the defendant's share of the joint liability, should be paid by him to Hodge. Two bills, one for 2,000*l.* and the other for

1,000*l.*, were accordingly drawn by Hodge, and accepted by the defendant; and at the same time the following letter was written by the defendant, and sent to Hodge.—

"London, 13th Nov. 1843.

"Dear Sir,—According to our calculations this morning there will be 14,000*l.* owing to you by the Berbice estates, after deducting the proceeds of the crops of this year. As the said 14,000*l.* are 6,000*l.* more than the standing balance of 8,000*l.*, I beg to inclose my note for 2,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* together 3,000*l.*, as the one-half of the excess. Should the crops not come forward in time to provide for these notes, I shall expect to have them renewed for such period as may be found necessary, from the condition of the properties.

"I am, &c., Wm. Munro."

On this letter Mr. Hodge indorsed a memorandum of assent to the within terms, as follows:—

"Dr. Munro.

"Dear Sir,—What is stated on the other side is fully understood between us.

"Langford Lovell Hodge.

"London, 13th Nov. 1843."

The crops in 1844 not being sufficient to discharge the sum of 3,000*l.*, due upon the two bills, the defendant, in consequence of an application from Hodge, forwarded him an acceptance for 3,000*l.*, payable on the 16th of November 1845. On this latter bill becoming due, the crops being in like manner insufficient, it was renewed by another bill of the defendant's, payable in November 1846. On this bill also becoming due, the defendant applied for a further renewal, when it was agreed that the bill, for which the present action was brought, should be given, payable at six months. The produce of the estates had not been sufficient to pay the amount of the bill in question. Under these circumstances, it was contended that the defendant was entitled to the verdict, inasmuch as Hodge the drawer, and the plaintiffs, who were the holders, with notice of the agreement, were bound to renew the bill until such time as the produce of the estates should be sufficient to discharge the amount of the bill. The learned Judge was of opinion, that by the terms of the agreement, Hodge was not bound to renew the bill more than once; and the jury having accordingly found a verdict for the plaintiffs, he gave the defendant leave to move to enter a verdict for him, if the Court should be of opinion that Hodge was bound to renew the bill in question.

Lush now moved accordingly.—The plea was proved, and the defendant was entitled to the verdict. The bill in question was in the nature of a bill payable out of a particular fund, and was not to be paid, but to be renewed successively until the crops from the estate should come in.

[ALDERSON, B.—Your argument is, that if the crops came to nothing the bill was not to be paid at all.]

Certainly.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The meaning of the agreement is, that if the crops failed, the bill was to be renewed once.]

At the time of giving the bill the estates were a losing concern, and no one could tell when the crops would be productive; they were to be the primary fund out of which the bill was to be paid.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The agreement speaks of such "period," not periods.]

[PARKE, B.—And does not contain the words "from time to time."]

The parties were connected in interest, and were not acting hostilely towards each other.

POLLOCK, C.B.—There can be no rule in this case. The defendant as acceptor is primarily liable to pay this bill; then, if he seeks to get rid of his obligation, he must make out a clear case of exemption. This he has not done. The meaning of the agreement is, that there was to be one renewal only.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. If the defendant intended the contract to bear the construction now contended for by him, he ought to have stipulated that the bill should be renewed "from time to time."

PARKE, B.—The true construction of this agreement is, that there was to be one renewal only.

At the trial of an action by an execution creditor against the sheriff, for not levying a debt of 60l. under a fi. fa. the landlord of the debtor was called as a witness, and stated, that 46l. was due from the debtor for rent, and it appeared that the sheriff had withdrawn the execution upon notice thereof from the landlord, who had subsequently distrained and realized less than the rent due. The landlord having admitted that the debtor held under a lease, but which was not produced,—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the sheriff the amount realized under the distress.

Case against the sheriffs of London, for negligence, in not levying upon the goods of one Leger, under a writ of fi. fa. issued upon a judgment recovered by the plaintiff, and indorsed to levy 60l. 15s. 10d.

Pleas—Not guilty: and that Leger had not any goods in the defendant's bailiwick, whereof the defendants could have levied the monies indorsed on the writ. Issues thereon.

The cause was tried, before Platt, B., at the Middlesex Sittings, in this term. It was proved that the sheriff had seized under the writ certain goods in Leger's house, but had withdrawn the execution upon notice from the landlord that rent was due. 18l. was afterwards realized under a subsequent distress for rent. It appeared upon the evidence of the landlord, who was called by the defendants, that 46l. rent was due, but that Leger held under a lease which (though the objection was taken) was not produced. The jury found that the rent was due, and that the sheriff knew it. Under his Lordship's direction, the plaintiff had a verdict for 18l., with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them.

Watson now moved accordingly.—The verdict ought to be entered for the defendants, on the finding of the jury, otherwise the sheriff is at the mercy of the landlord, who may refuse to produce the lease.

[PARKE, B.—Rent due is the fact in dispute in the cause, and as soon as it appeared there was a lease, that fact could not be proved without producing the lease. It may be an invalid lease.]

[ALDERSON, B.—Rent is one of the terms of the lease, and you must see it before you can know that any rent is due.]

This is an action for negligence, and the existence and validity of a lease is not a matter about which the sheriff need inquire. He must either withdraw the execution or sell under it, and the notice from the landlord that rent was due justified him in withdrawing.]

[ROLFE, B.—The statement of the landlord that rent was due must be struck out, when it appears there was a lease.]

The jury have found the fact, and upon proper evidence. In Whitfield v. Brand (1) it was held that the fact that a party has agreed to sell goods on commission, may be proved by oral evidence, though the terms as to its payment have been reduced into writing.

[PARKE, B.—When it appears there is a lease, you cannot talk about the contents of it without producing it. The sheriff must acquit himself of negligence.]

How has the sheriff been guilty of negligence?

[PARKE, B.—In not selling; because you must shew that the landlord was entitled to distrain.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The sheriff is bound to ascertain whose goods he is taking. He has a right to say there may be a lease.]

That would be extremely hard on the sheriff.

[ROLFE, B.—Suppose a stranger comes to the door and says, "Take these goods at your peril; they are mine." How is the sheriff better off?]

[PARKE, B.—There would be plenty of nominal landlords, if we were to hold the sheriff not responsible.]

If the sheriff is to be responsible to that extent, he ought to have time to ascertain the fact.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—He made no application to the Court for time.]

[ALDERSON, B.—The duty of the sheriff was to sell, because there was no proof of rent; he does not sell, and that is negligence.]

(1) 16 Mes. & Wels. 282; a. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 103.

It was proved at the trial, that a distress for rent was put in by the landlord, and there was no dispute about the right to distress.

[ALDERSON, B.—That is only evidence of rent due at the time of the distress, which was subsequent to the withdrawal of the sheriff.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—What can the execution creditor do but bring an action against the sheriff?]

He does so, and the jury negative negligence.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion, that there was no evidence of any real claim for rent, and that the verdict is right.

To debt for goods sold and delivered, the defendant pleaded, first, as to all but 15s., parcel, &c., nunquam indebitatus; second, as to that sum, payment into court of 15s. The plaintiff replied by adding the similitur to the first plea; and as to the second, that the plaintiff accepts the 15s. in full satisfaction and discharge of the cause of action in the introductory part of that plea mentioned, with prayer of judgment for his costs sustained in that behalf. The jury found that the defendants never had been indebted to the plaintiff to a greater amount than 15s.:—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to costs on the replication to the second plea.

This was an action of debt for goods sold and delivered to the female defendant while sole, with the common counts. The defendants pleaded except as to 15s., parcel of the monies in the declaration mentioned, never indebted; second, as to the sum of 15s., payment into court of that sum, with an averment that the defendants were never indebted to the plaintiff to a greater amount. Verification.

Replication, similiter to the first plea; to the last plea, that the plaintiff accepted and took out of court the 15s. in full satisfaction and discharge of the causes of action in the introductory part of the last plea mentioned; therefore, as to such causes of action, the plaintiff is satisfied, and prays judgment for his costs and charges by him sustained in that behalf.

The cause was tried, before the undersheriff of Durham, who returned, that on the issue of never indebted, the jury found that the female defendant, except as to the said sum of 15s., was never indebted in manner and form as alleged in the declaration. Upon taxation, the Master allowed the defendants the whole costs of the cause, including those of the plea of payment into court, and disallowed the plaintiff any costs under Reg. Gen. Trin. 1 Vict.

ROLFE, B. had made an order for reviewing the Master's taxation, and taxing the plaintiff his costs on the replication on taking the money out of court in full satisfaction of the causes of action in respect of which it had been paid in.

A rule had been obtained to rescind that order; against which

Bovill now shewed cause.—The defendants, instead of pleading payment into court of 15s. to the whole causes of action, have divided their pleas, pleading that payment as to part, and leaving a defence as to the rest.

[PARKE, B.—Quoad the 15s. the plaintiff says he is satisfied. No difficulty would have arisen on the old mode of paying money into court. The 15s. would have been struck out, and the plaintiff would have gone on for the rest. Here the defendants insulate one part of the declaration from the rest, pay money into court on it, and the plaintiff says he is satisfied.]

The rule of Trin. term, 1 Vict., is as follows:—"The plaintiff, after the delivery of a plea of a payment into court, shall be at liberty to reply to the same by accepting the sum so paid into court in full satisfaction and discharge of the cause of action in respect of which it has been paid in, and he shall be at liberty, in that case, to tax his costs of suit, and, in case of non-payment thereof within forty-eight hours, to sign judgment for his costs of suit so taxed."

[PARKE, B.—The plaintiff had a right to tax costs quoad the 15s., and end the cause so far. He accepted that sum in full satisfaction of 15s., part of the debt and cause of action on which it was paid in. But the plaintiff could not accept it out, if the plea is thus divided : for if he does, he must accept it on the plea of payment of money into court, and enter a nolle prosequi upon the issue on never indebted, and so become liable to pay all costs.]

[ALDERSON, B.—Had he replied that he had sustained damages ultra, the defendants no doubt would have been entitled to costs.]

As to the quantum of costs, it is not only the costs of the plea and replication to which the plaintiff is entitled, though no specific portion of the declaration is recovered on, and no additional costs incurred by him; for he is entitled to the general costs up to the point to which he was right in pursuing his action, viz. the time of paying the money into court. He was obliged to issue a writ, and to declare in order to support the judgment he sought ultimately to recover.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—It will be said, that if the payment into court had been general the plaintiff might have taken the money out, and would then have got his costs; but instead of that the defendants plead a payment into court of 15*s.*, as to 15*s.*, and never indebted as to the rest; so that the plaintiff was driven to join issue and go on to trial, or enter a nolle prosequi and become conclusively liable to pay costs.]

[ALDERSON, B.—On the plea of payment into court of 15*s.*, as to 15*s.*, the plaintiff could not say the defendants were indebted to a larger amount. That made the plea of never indebted to the residue necessary.]

S. Temple, contra.—Cauty v. Gyll (1) is in favour of the defendants. There were five counts in debt, and six pleas; the last being a plea of payment of 30*l.* into court. Issues were joined on the other pleas; and as to the sixth, the plaintiff took the 30*l.* out of court in full satisfaction of all the causes of action as to the 30*l.*, parcel, &c. The plaintiff was held not entitled to tax his costs under Reg. Gen. Trin. term, 1 Vict.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—That case does not alter the plaintiff's argument. It was there attempted to tax the costs before the issues were disposed of; but the Court thought the attempt premature.]

In Cauty v. Gyll, Tindal, C.J. says, "I think the meaning of the rule must be, that the plaintiff shall be entitled to tax his costs only where the money is accepted in satisfaction of the whole demand, and not where there are other issues, upon which the parties are proceeding to trial."

(1) 4 Man. & Gr. 907.

[PARKE, B.—There the plaintiff sought to recover the costs of all the replications to five different special pleas, but was held not entitled to any of them.]

That decision resulted from the form of the pleadings.

[PARKE, B.—All the plaintiff was there entitled to, under the new rule, was the costs of suit for the cause of action in respect of which the money was paid into court; but not to the costs of the replications on special pleas, so that the taxation was properly set aside. The Lord Chief Justice's opinion was quite right, for the plaintiff had taxed the costs to that time, but does not hold where there are other issues, &c.]

[PLATT, B.—The principle on which costs are dispensed under this rule is settled in Goodee v. Goldsmith (2). That was an action of assumpsit for 28*l.* 5*s.*, money had and received, to which the defendant, as to all except 3*l.* 5*s.*, pleaded non assumpsit; as to all except 3*l.* 5*s.*, a set-off of 25*l.*; and as to the 3*l.* 5*s.*, payment of that sum into court. The plaintiff, by his replication, admitted the set-off, and replied that he would not further prosecute the suit against the defendant, except as to the sum of 3*l.* 5*s.*, and took that sum out of court on the last plea. The Master having allowed the plaintiff, on taxation, his whole costs, the Court reviewed the taxation, giving the defendant the costs on the general issue and set-off, as to which the plaintiff had in fact entered a nolle prosequi, and allowing the plaintiff costs as to that part of the cause of action, in respect of which the 3*l.* 5*s.* was paid into court. For, as the replication amounted in effect to a nolle prosequi, as to a count or part of count, the costs followed by stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 33.]

The practice hitherto has been never to tax any costs to plaintiffs in such cases.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This rule must be discharged, and with costs, for the reasons I have already stated. We all agree in the decision of my Brother Alderson, which he has stated to us in a similar case.

(2) 2 Mee. & Wels. 202; a. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 70.

PARKE, B.—If the plaintiff goes on to try, and fails, he must pay the costs of the trial.

ALDERSON, B.—The case of Goodee v. Goldsmith, cited by my Brother Platt, puts the present out of court. That authority supports my decision in a case which came before me some terms ago, and in which I drew up my opinion in writing, and delivered it to the Masters. It was as follows:—"In this case, application has been made to review the Master's taxation. It was an action of assumpsit, to which four pleas have been pleaded. First, non assumpsit, except as to a sum afterwards paid into court; second, payment; third, set-off; and fourth, payment of the excepted sum into court. The plaintiff takes that sum out of court, and the result of a reference as to the remainder of the case is, that the arbitrator finds that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff in respect of a certain additional sum to that paid into court; but also finds that, in respect of the sum paid and set off, more is due to the defendant than the amount for which he was originally liable. It is clear, therefore, that on this state of facts, the defendant is entitled to have the issue on the second and third pleas entered for him, and to have the general costs of the trial. But it is clear, on the other side, that the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the first issue, which must be deducted from the defendant's costs. As to the costs of the last plea, I am also of opinion that the plaintiff is also entitled to them, to be deducted in like manner. The plaintiff was right in bringing his action for this part of his demand, and till the defendant paid the money into court, would have been entitled to recover it. The policy of the new rule was to make each party pay costs in respect of all parts of the case in which he was wrong. Then the defendant was wrong as to this part of the plaintiff's demand, and ought to pay the costs occasioned to the plaintiff by the not having paid it before action brought. The words of the rule embrace this case, and the reason of the rule goes with it. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to so much costs as have been incurred, owing to this being included in his declaration and in the replication, and also to the expense of taking the money out of court. If, indeed, the money had been paid in generally, it would have been otherwise; but then it would have become the result of the plea, and would have been different, viz., in favour of the defendant. This taxation must be reviewed."

PLATT, B. concurred.

Arrest—Privilege of Parliament—Prorogation and Dissolution.

Members of the House of Commons are privileged from arrest on a ca. sa. for forty days before and forty days after the meeting of Parliament; and the rule is the same in the case of a dissolution as in that of a prorogation of Parliament.

This was an application for a rule, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Williams, J., for discharging him out of the custody of the sheriff should not be rescinded. The defendant, having been taken in execution by the sheriff of Yorkshire, on the 2nd of September 1847, for default in payment of the principal money and interest, secured under a Judge's order, obtained, on the 3rd of September, a summons for his discharge, on the ground that, on the 28th of the July preceding, he had been elected a member of the House of Commons for the borough of Finsbury; that the return of such election had been made to the Crown Office; and that, at the time of such arrest, he was entitled to the privileges of a member of the Commons House of Parliament. It appeared that the Commons House of Parliament was dissolved on the 23rd of July last; and that writs were issued for a fresh election, returnable on the 21st of September last. On the 13th of August there appeared in the London Gazette an order of the Queen in Council, proroguing the parliament to the 21st of September. On the 7th of September, Williams, J., made the order, directing the defendant to be discharged out of custody on his consenting to bring no action.

Willes, in support of the application.—The order of Williams, J. for discharging the defendant out of custody ought to be rescinded, as the defendant was not privileged from arrest. In Jenkins's Centuries, 3rd Cent. case 35, p. 118, it is said, "If a member of parliament be in execution before the parliament, he shall not be discharged of it by privilege of parliament;" but no mention is there made of the alleged privilege of forty days. In the case of Martin, as stated in Bac. Abr. tit. 'Privilege,' C, 4, and in D'Ewes's Journal, 410, and which arose in the year 1586, the House of Commons did not claim forty days as the duration of a member's privilege from arrest, but limited a "convenient time" only for that purpose. All the cases on this subject are collected by Mr. May in his book on the law of parliament. In p. 95, he says, "But as the Commons are the judges of their own privileges, some precedents are required to shew that they really claim so long a duration of this immunity; and no such precedents are to be found. By the original law of parliament privileges extended to the protection of members and their servants 'eundo, morando, et exinde redeundo:' but Parliament has never yet determined what time shall be considered convenient for this purpose; and Prynne expresses an opinion that no such definite extent of privilege is claimable by the law of parliament (1). It has, however, always been the general belief that privilege extended to forty days, and several acts of the Irish Parliament have defined that time (2); but the following precedents by no means establish the extent of privilege to be within the law or the practice in England, and leave the matter altogether in doubt." In Colonel Pitt's case (3), the parliament was prorogued on the 16th of April 1734, dissolved on the 17th; the new writs bore teste on the 18th, and Pitt, who was a member of the House of Commons, was arrested on the 20th. The Court of King's Bench held the defendant to be entitled to his privilege, but did not determine the exact duration of the privilege. It would seem, therefore, on principle, and on the authorities, that the privilege of Parliament ought not to last for a longer time than is necessary for the member to go to and return from parliament. The privilege of the House of Lords lasts twenty days only. Modern improvements in travelling have enabled a member of parliament to come from the furthest extremity of the kingdom in a much shorter period than forty days.

[PARKE, B.—The teste of an original writ is fifteen days: ought it to be altered to a shorter period by reason of railway travelling being more expeditious than formerly?]

Mr. Sheridan was arrested by order of Bayley, J., under circumstances similar to the present; but instead of asserting his privilege, he paid the amount for which he was arrested. But at all events, the privilege does not apply when the arrest takes place after the dissolution of one parliament and before the assembling of another. In Sir Richard Temple's case (4) the defendant moved to put off the trial, on the ground of his having been elected a Burgess to serve in parliament, which was to meet in eight days; and the Court, in the course of their judgment, said, that if he were taken in execution, it was proper for the Parliament when they should meet to discharge him, for the Court doubted whether they had any power to do so. The privilege is to last for a reasonable time only. Here the defendant was not on his road to or from parliament. In the analogous case of a witness being privileged from arrest, he is entitled to the privilege only whilst he is going to or from court. Again, the rule is, that a party applying to be discharged from arrest, on the ground of privilege may apply for his discharge to that Court to which the privilege belongs. But in this case if the defendant were to apply to the House of Commons, they would allow him no more than a reasonable time; so that, if this order is upheld, the decision of the Court will be at variance with what would have been the decision of Parliament itself.

POLLOCK, C.B. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—This was a motion to set aside an order of my Brother Williams, discharging the defendant (who had been taken in execution on a cap. ad sat.) out of custody on the ground of the privilege of Parliament. We took time to consider whether we should grant a rule to shew cause, in order to have an opportunity of referring to the authorities and to my Brother Williams. We are of opinion that the order was right; and, consequently, there ought to be no rule. The date of the order was the 7th of September. The summons on which it was made having issued on the 3rd, and the prorogation of parliament being to the 21st, the interval was less than twenty days. It was contended by Mr. Willes, that the privilege of a member to be free from arrest exists not for any certain time before or after the meeting of Parliament, but for a convenient time; and that at the present day, the time in question was more than a convenient time. It was further contended that the privilege was not applicable to the meeting of a new parliament after a dissolution. In the first place, we think there is no foundation for the latter point; whatever privilege necessary to secure their attendance may belong to members of parliament between a prorogation and the next meeting of Parliament, we think, must belong to them before they assemble upon a summons after a dissolution; whatever reasons apply to the one case equally apply to the other; and we think the law or rule of privilege must be the same in both. The question then is, what is the privilege of Parliament with reference to freedom from arrest? In Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 1, p. 165, it is said, that, in the case of a commoner, this privilege from arrest extends to forty days after every prorogation, and forty days before the next appointed meeting. In Bac. Abr. tit. 'Privilege,' (C), the authorities are collected. It appears, that in an old Irish statute, 3 Edw. 4. c. 1, the privilege is expressly limited to forty days before, and forty days after, the meeting of Parliament. In the case of The Earl of Athol v. the Earl of Derby (5), (cited by Blackstone), and which occurred in the 24 Car. 2. (1672), it is stated that the Commons claimed forty days before, and forty days after, each session. In Jenkins, (3rd Cent., case 35) p. 118, it is said that the "privilege extends to forty days before the Parliament and forty days after."

Mr. Willes contended that the period was not a definite but a convenient period. It may be that the rule was originally during a convenient period, and the case cited from

D'Ewes's Journal (which is given at large in Bac. Abr.) has some tendency to support this view; but it is consistent with this, that for some centuries the period of forty days has been deemed a convenient period. The House of Commons (as might be expected) determined only the question before them, and did not define the limit of convenience, but held twenty days to be within it. The 12 & 13 Will. 3. c. 3. more than once mentions "the time of privilege," but does not mention the duration of it; but the 4 Geo. 3. c. 24. s. 1, which first regulated the privilege of franking, limits that privilege to the session of Parliament, and forty days before and forty days after any summons or prorogation; the same provision is to be found in the 24 Geo. 3. c. 37. s. 7, and the privilege so limited was continued by several statutes (one of which passed since the Union), till the privilege of franking was abolished. We think that the conclusion to be drawn from all that is to be found in the books on the subject is this: that whether the rule was originally for a convenient time or for a time certain, the period of forty days before and after the meeting of Parliament has for about two centuries at least been considered either a convenient time or the actual time to be allowed. Such has been the usage, and the universally prevailing opinion on the subject, and such we think is the law. If any change is necessary or desirable, we are not competent to make it.

Railway Scrip, Sale of—Usage of Place.

The defendant having employed the plaintiff, a sharebroker, at Liverpool, to sell twenty railway scrip for him, the plaintiff sold them to F, another Liverpool sharebroker. The defendant not having delivered the shares to the purchaser at the time when they ought to have been delivered, the latter bought twenty other scrip in the market, at an advanced rate, and applied to the plaintiff for the difference between the contract price and that at which he bought them. The plaintiff paid the difference, and brought an action against the defendant for money paid, to recover the amount. By the usage of the Liverpool share market, brokers are responsible to each other for the fulfilment of contracts relating to the sale and purchase of scrip:—Held, that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff; and, semble, per Parke, B. and Rolfe, B., that the defendant would have been liable even if he had not been cognizant of such usage.

Assumpsit for work done, money paid, and on an account stated.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Rolfe, B., at the last Liverpool Spring Assizes, the following facts were proved:—The plaintiff was a sharebroker at Liverpool, and the defendant a linen-draper residing near Oldham, and the action was brought to recover the sum of 97*l.* 10*s.*, in respect of money alleged to have been paid by the plaintiff, on account of the defendant, and 2*l.* 10*s.* for commission, under the following circumstances:—The defendant, on the 3rd of July 1845, directed the plaintiff to sell for him twenty shares or scrip in the Huddersfield and Manchester Railway, at 6*l.* 15*s.* per share; and the plaintiff, accordingly, on that day, sold the same to Messrs. J. Finlay & Son, sharebrokers at Liverpool. On the arrival of the day for the delivery of the scrip to the purchaser, the defendant not being ready to deliver them, the latter, on the 20th of July, bought twenty scrip in the market, at the price of 11*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* per share, and called upon the plaintiff to pay them the difference between the contract price and the price at which he had bought them. There being a usage in the Liverpool share market that brokers are responsible to each other for the fulfilment of contracts relating to the sale and purchase of scrip, the plaintiff paid to the Messrs. Finlay the difference in question, and sought, in this action, to recover it from the defendant. The existence of the custom was proved, and some evidence was given of the defendant's knowledge of the custom; but no question having been made as to the latter point, it was not submitted to the jury. It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that he was not bound to pay the amount of 97*l.* 10*s.*, and that it could not be recovered, in an action for money paid. The learned Judge was of opinion that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the amount of the commission only, and he directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of 2*l.* 10*s.*, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to increase the damages, by the amount of 97*l.* 10*s.*, if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover that amount.

Knowles having, in Easter term, obtained a rule nisi, accordingly,

Martin and C. Saunders shewed cause.—The ruling of the learned Judge was correct, for the plaintiff cannot recover the money paid by him to Messrs. Finlay & Son, the same having been paid without any authority from the defendant. The defendant was not a sharebroker, and is not to be bound by rules of the Liverpool share market, to which he is a stranger.

[PARKE, B.—In Sutton v. Tatham (1), it was held by Lord Denman, C.J. and Littledale, J., that a person who employs a broker on the Stock Exchange, impliedly gives him authority to act in accordance with the rules there established, though such principal may himself be ignorant of such rules.]

Child v. Morley (2) is directly in point. There it was held that the broker who had sold stock, his principal having refused to make good the bargain, could not by paying the difference to the purchaser make his principal liable for the amount.

[PARKE, B.—In that case there was on proof of such a usage on the Stock Exchange as existed in this case. With respect to the defendant's knowledge of the custom, there are cases in which a party has been held bound by a usage of which he knows nothing, as for instance, the usage of Lloyd's. Besides, if knowledge of the custom were necessary to make the defendant liable, there was ample evidence of such knowledge; and if the point had been made at the trial, and had been submitted to the jury, they would have so found it.]

The cases of Brittain v. Lloyd (4), Bowlby v. Bell (4), and Lightfoot v. Creed (5) are in point.

PARKE, B.—This rule must be made absolute.—If the plaintiff is to be considered as a surety for the defendant, then he became liable to pay the purchaser the amount of the shares or scrip certificates, as the transaction did not relate to registered shares, but merely to a sale of scrip. The only question is, whether the plaintiff can be considered a surety for the defendant. Evidence was given at the trial of its being the usage on the Stock Exchange for the brokers to be responsible to each other for their principals, and if any question was to be raised as to the proof of that fact, it ought to have been raised at the trial. No such question, however, was made. It is clear law that if any usage exists in a particular place, and a party expressly employs another to make a contract for him, he employs him to make a contract in the usual way; and if the usage be for the broker to make a contract in his own name, there is an implied authority for him so to make it in the particular case. If it were necessary in order to make the defendant liable to shew his knowledge of that usage, there was evidence for the jury of his having had that knowledge. It is not necessary, however, to decide whether the defendant was bound by a usage of which he was not cognisant. It seems to me, that if a party authorizes a contract to be made for him, he authorizes it to be made in the usual way. There are indeed cases which apparently look the other way. Bartlett v. Pentland (6) was a case of insurance. There, the assured had employed an insurance broker to recover a loss from the underwriters, which was adjusted by the latter setting off in account against it a debt due from them to the broker for premiums. By the custom of Lloyd's Coffee House such set-off was considered as payment between the broker and the underwriter. This set-off was held not to be payment to the assured, and that the custom of Lloyd's Coffee House was not binding on the assured, as he was not shewn to be cognizant of it, or to have assented to it. That, however, was a different case from the present, which is that of a contract. Gabay

v. Lloyd (7) was a case of a policy, and it was found by the special verdict that a certain usage with respect to such policies existed amongst the underwriters at Lloyd's, that the policy in question was effected there, but that the plaintiff was not in the habit of effecting policies at Lloyd's. It was held that the plaintiff was not bound by the usage. That case, however, differs from the present, because here, the question is as to the authority that was given to the plaintiff. I therefore concur in the opinion of Lord Denman and Littledale, J. as expressed in Sutton v. Tatham; although it is not necessary to decide the same point here, because if knowledge be necessary in this case to make the defendant liable, there is evidence of such knowledge on his part.

ALDERSON, B.—If the plaintiff was a guarantor for the defendant, and paid the money for him, the defendant is liable. When a man deals at a market in a particular place, he deals with reference to the custom of that place. In the present case, the custom is for the brokers at Liverpool to be the guarantors.

ROLFE, B.—At the trial of this case I took a different view from that which I now entertain, for it was stated to me that the case was governed by a cause that was tried before my Brother Alderson at York; but I rather think that in that case no evidence was given of any knowledge of the existence of the usage; and it may make some difference whether such usage is known to exist or not. In that case the broker was not authorized to make a payment, and to charge for money paid. Here, the course of dealing at the particular place was known to the parties. Probably, however, it is immaterial to the case, whether the existence of the usage is known to the party or not. I fully concur in the law as laid down by Lord Denman, C.J. and Mr. Justice Littledale in Sutton v. Tatham.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I have abstained from giving any opinion in this case, because I have not heard the arguments. But I may state that I concur in the general principles laid down by the Court.

The following CASE was sent by Vice Chancellor Wigram for the opinion of this Court.

James Monypenny, late of Maythorn Hall, in the parish of Rolvenden, in the county of Kent, was, at the time of the making of his last will and testament hereinafter mentioned, and thenceforth up to and at the time of his death, seised in fee simple or otherwise well entitled to the manors or reputed manors of Maythorn, Nether Forsham, and Kensham, in the said count of Kent, and also to the mansion-house, called Maythorn Hall, in the said parish of Rolvenden, and to divers messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments situate respectively in the several parishes of Rolvenden, Tenterden, Benendon, Landhurst, Newenham, St. Mary in Wittersham, and Stone in the Isle of Oxney, in the county of Kent, all which said hereditaments and premises were of gavelkind tenure.

The said James Monypenny, being so seised or entitled as aforesaid, and being of sound and disposing mind, on the 11th of February 1804 duly made and published his last will and testament in writing, dated the 11th of February 1804, and duly executed and attested as by law was then required for passing real estates by devise, and thereby (after devising certain lands, not comprising any of the hereditaments hereinbefore specified, in manner therein appearing), he devised the residue of his said real estates as follows:—"I give and devise my said house, called Maythorn Hall, with all and every the appurtenances, and also all the rest, residue, and remainder of my manors, messuages, farms, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and real estate whatsoever, in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy (except as hereinbefore devised), to the uses, intents, and purposes following (that is to say), to the use, intent, and purpose that my brother Phillips Monypenny shall receive and take the rents, issues, and profits thereof, for and during the term of his natural life, without impeachment of waste; and from and immediately after his decease, to the use of the first son of the body of the said Phillips Monypenny for and during the term of his natural life; and from and immediately after his decease, to the use of the first son of the said first son, and the heirs male of his body; and in default of such issue, to the use of all and every other the son and sons of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny, severally and successively, according to seniority of age, for the like interests and limitations as I have before directed respecting the first son, and his issue of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny; and in default of issue of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, to the use of my said brother Thomas Monypenny, for and during the term of his natural life, without impeachment of waste; and from and immediately after his decease, to the use of Thomas Monypenny, eldest son of my said brother Thomas Monypenny, for and during the term of his natural life, without impeachment of waste; and from and immediately after his decease, to the use of the first son of the body of the said Thomas Monypenny, son of my said brother Thomas Monypenny, and the heirs male of his body; and in default of issue of the body of the said Thomas Monypenny the son, to the use of all and every other the son and sons of the

PARKE, B.—This rule must be made absolute.—If the plaintiff is to be considered as a surety for the defendant, then he became liable to pay the purchaser the amount of the shares or scrip certificates, as the transaction did not relate to registered shares, but merely to a sale of scrip. The only question is, whether the plaintiff can be considered a surety for the defendant. Evidence was given at the trial of its being the usage on the Stock Exchange for the brokers to be responsible to each other for their principals, and if any question was to be raised as to the proof of that fact, it ought to have been raised at the trial. No such question, however, was made. It is clear law that if any usage exists in a particular place, and a party expressly employs another to make a contract for him, he employs him to make a contract in the usual way; and if the usage be for the broker to make a contract in his own name, there is an implied authority for him so to make it in the particular case. If it were necessary in order to make the defendant liable to shew his knowledge of that usage, there was evidence for the jury of his having had that knowledge. It is not necessary, however, to decide whether the defendant was bound by a usage of which he was not cognisant. It seems to me, that if a party authorizes a contract to be made for him, he authorizes it to be made in the usual way. There are indeed cases which apparently look the other way. Bartlett v. Penland (6) was a case of insurance. There, the assured had employed an insurance broker to recover a loss from the underwriters, which was adjusted by the latter setting off in account against it a debt due from them to the broker for premiums. By the custom of Lloyd's Coffee House such set-off was considered as payment between the broker and the underwriter. This set-off was held not to be payment to the assured, and that the custom of Lloyd's Coffee House was not binding on the assured, as he was not shewn to be cognizant of it, or to have assented to it. That, however, was a different case from the present, which is that of a contract. Gabay

v. Lloyd (7) was a case of a policy, and it was found by the special verdict that a certain usage with respect to such policies existed amongst the underwriters at Lloyd's, that the policy in question was effected there, but that the plaintiff was not in the habit of effecting policies at Lloyd's. It was held that the plaintiff was not bound by the usage. That case, however, differs from the present, because here, the question is as to the authority that was given to the plaintiff. I therefore concur in the opinion of Lord Denman and Littledale, J. as expressed in Sutton v. Tatham; although it is not necessary to decide the same point here, because if knowledge be necessary in this case to make the defendant liable, there is evidence of such knowledge on his part.

ALDERSON, B.—If the plaintiff was a guarantor for the defendant, and paid the money for him, the defendant is liable. When a man deals at a market in a particular place, he deals with reference to the custom of that place. In the present case, the custom is for the brokers at Liverpool to be the guarantors.

ROLFE, B.—At the trial of this case I took a different view from that which I now entertain, for it was stated to me that the case was governed by a cause that was tried before my Brother Alderson at York; but I rather think that in that case no evidence was given of any knowledge of the existence of the usage; and it may make some difference whether such usage is known to exist or not. In that case the broker was not authorized to make a payment, and to charge for money paid. Here, the course of dealing at the particular place was known to the parties. Probably, however, it is immaterial to the case, whether the existence of the usage is known to the party or not. I fully concur in the law as laid down by Lord Denman, C.J. and Mr. Justice Littledale in Sutton v. Tatham.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I have abstained from giving any opinion in this case, because I have not heard the arguments. But I may state that I concur in the general principles laid down by the Court.

In Michaelmas term, 1827, P. Monypenny duly suffered a common recovery of the devised estates, in which he was vouched, and vouched over the common vouchee, and such recovery was declared to enure to the use of the said P. Monypenny in fee. By a settlement, executed on the marriage of Robert Joseph Monypenny, the nephew of the said P. Monypenny, with the defendant Susannah Monypenny, dated the 10th of June 1835, the said P. Monypenny charged the said Maythorn Hall estate with the payment of a jointure of 300*l.* per annum to the said S. Monypenny, in the event of her surviving the said P. Monypenny and R. J. Monypenny.

In January 1841, P. Monypenny died, without ever having had any issue, but having made a will, by which he devised the Maythorn Hall estate to certain uses in favour of his nephew, the said R. J. Monypenny for life, with remainder to his eldest son R. P. D. Monypenny for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, with divers remainders over. On the death of the said P. Monypenny, the said R. J. Monypenny entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said Maythorn Hall estate, by virtue of the said devise to him in the will of the said P. Monypenny, and continued in such receipt till the time of his death. In September 1842, the said R. J. Monypenny died, leaving the said defendant S. Monypenny his widow, and R. P. D. Monypenny his only son, then an infant of the age of six years, him surviving; and the said R. P. D. Monypenny thereupon, by two of his guardians, (being the defendants S. Monypenny and P. R. Dearden,) entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the Maythorn Hall estate, subject to the jointure of his mother, the said S. Monypenny, and is still in possession of the said estates by virtue of the devise to him in the said will of the said P. Monypenny.

The said T. G. Monypenny has become entitled to, and is now in the possession of, the estates of the said E. Joddrell. The said T. G. Monypenny is married, and the plaintiff R. T. G. Monypenny is his first son. The defendants T. G. Monypenny, R. P. D. Monypenny, J. T. Monypenny,

P. Monypenny, and W. B. Monypenny, are the co-heirs or representative co-heirs of the testator J. Monypenny, at the time of his own death and of the death of the testator P. Monypenny.

The plaintiff, the said R. T. G. Monypenny, claims the said Maythorn Hall estate, as tenant in tail male thereof, by virtue of the devise to him as the first son of the said T. G. Monypenny, in the will of the said testator J. Monypenny. The defendant, the said R. P. D. Monypenny, claims to retain the possession of the said Maythorn Hall estate as devisee for life under the will of the said P. Monypenny, subject to his mother's jointure, on the ground that the said P. Monypenny acquired the fee simple of the said estate, by the said common recovery suffered by him in 1827; and he also claims as representing two of the co-heirs in gavelkind of the testator J. Monypenny, in case the limitation in the will of J. Monypenny, succeeding the limitations to the first son of P. Monypenny for life, should be held to be void. The defendant T. G. Monypenny claims the Maythorn Hall estate, as tenant for life thereof, by virtue of the devise to him in the will of the said testator J. Monypenny, on the ground that it did not shift from him on his accession to the estates of E. Joddrell, and also he claims by descent as one of the co-heirs in gavelkind of the testator J. Monypenny, in case the limitations in the will of J. Monypenny, succeeding the limitation to the first son of P. Monypenny for life, should be held to be void. The said S. Monypenny claims her said jointure of 300*l.* under the said settlement of 1835, on the same grounds upon which her said son, the said R. P. D. Monypenny, claims his life estate.

The other defendants, representing co-heirs in gavelkind of the said J. Monypenny, claim the said Maythorn Hall estate on the ground that the limitations in the will and codicil of the said J. Monypenny, after the devise to the first son of the said P. Monypenny, were void. The questions in this case have reference to these conflicting claims. The questions for the opinion of the Court were:—first, what estate or estates in possession or in remainder did P. Monypenny take under the will and codicil of the testator J. Monypenny, in the devised pro-body of my said brother Thomas Monypenny, for the like estates and interests, severally and successively according to the seniority of age; and in failure of all such issue of my said brother Thomas Monypenny, to the use of him, his heirs and assigns for ever. But I do hereby declare, that if it shall happen at any time hereafter that my said brothers, or either of them, their or either of their issue, shall become entitled to the real or copyhold estate, or any part thereof, late of Elizabeth Joddrell, widow, daughter of the late Phillips Gybbon, situate in the said parish of Rolvenden, or in the parishes of Benendon, Tenterden, or either of them, or elsewhere, then and in that case, and immediately upon such an event taking place, the said estates hereinbefore devised for the benefit of my said brothers and their issue, shall be and remain to the use of the next person entitled thereto under and by virtue of this my will, in the same manner as they would have done if the person so succeeding to the said estates late of the said Elizabeth Joddrell were actually dead. And I declare that my said devisees, as they may hereafter respectively become entitled to my said estates, shall be at full liberty to fell and cut all such timber and underwood as will not improve by standing, and shall not be impeached or impeachable for such waste; and shall and may, as they respectively become entitled, grant leases of my said estates, or any part or parts thereof, not exceeding seven years, so that such lease and leases be granted for the best and most improved rent that can be procured for the same, and so that no sum or sums of money be paid by any lessee or lessees in consideration for such lease or leases."

After the date of the will, and before the date of the codicil afterwards stated, the testator's brother, Thomas Monypenny, died, leaving his son Thomas, named in the will, him surviving, and such son afterwards took the name of Thomas Gybbon Monypenny.

On the 26th of July 1818, the said testator, James Monypenny, being of sound and disposing mind, duly made and published a codicil to his said will, dated the 25th of June 1818, and executed and attested as by law was then required for passing real estate by devise, and therein recited that his brother Thomas had died; and after reciting that by his said will he gave and devised his said house, called Maythorn Hall, with all and every the appurtenances, and also all the rest, residue, and remainder of his manors, &c., hereditaments, and real estate whatsoever, in possession, &c. (except as thereinbefore devised), unto and to the uses in the said will expressed, he revoked the said last-recited devise, and did thereby give and devise his house, called Maythorn Hall, with all and every the appurtenances, and all and every other his said manors, &c., hereditaments, and real estate whatsoever, to the uses, intents, and purposes thereinafter expressed and referred to (that is to say), to the uses, intents, and purposes that his wife should receive and take the issues and profits thereof from the time of his decease, for and during the term of her natural life, without impeachment of waste, but subject to the keeping up, supporting, and maintaining the buildings and fences belonging thereto; and from and immediately after her decease, to such and the same uses as were declared of the said house, manors, &c., hereditaments, and real estate, by his said will, and subject to the declaration contained in his said will, in case his said brothers, or either of them, their or either of their issue, should become entitled to the said estate of E. Joddrell, widow. And the said testator ratified and confirmed his will in all other respects.

The said testator, J. Monypenny, afterwards made two other codicils to his said will, neither of which in any manner affected the disposition of his real estate made by his said will and first codicil.

The said testator, J. Monypenny, died in June 1822, without having in any manner revoked or altered the disposition of the said Maythorn Hall estate, made by his will and first codicil, and leaving him surviving his wife Mary Monypenny, and his brother, the said P. Monypenny, and the said T. G. Monypenny, son of his deceased brother T. Monypenny. On his death, his widow, M. Monypenny, entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said Maythorn Hall estate, and continued to receive and enjoy the same until her death, in the year 1826. After the widow's death, the said P. Monypenny, the brother of the testator, entered into the receipt of the rents penny took an estate for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to T. G. Monypenny for life, with remainder to him R. T. G. Monypenny in tail male; and so that P. Monypenny, having died without issue, and T. G. Monypenny having succeeded to the Joddrell estate, R. T. G. Monypenny has become entitled as tenant in tail male in possession. Second, T. G. Monypenny adopts the same construction of the will as that contended for by the son, except that he contends that the shifting clause did not take effect, and so that he is entitled to a life estate, prior to the estate tail of his son. Third, the parties claiming under the recovery and the will of P. Monypenny, argue that he took an estate tail, and so, by the recovery, acquired an absolute estate in fee simple. Fourth, the co-heirs of the testator contend, that P. Monypenny took an estate for life only, with remainder to his eldest son for life, and that all the subsequent remainders were void for remoteness; and so that, on the decease of P. Monypenny in 1841, without issue, the co-heirs of the testator became entitled.

The claim, as well of R. T. G. Monypenny as of his father T. G. Monypenny, is founded on the hypothesis that the sons of P. Monypenny, the first tenants for life, if any such there had been, would have taken in succession as tenants in tail male. Now there is certainly no express gifts to them as tenants in tail; but it is contended that, in order to effectuate the testator's general or leading intention, they must be held so to take, according to what has been called the doctrine of approximation, or cy-pres; and as much turns in this case on the question whether that doctrine does or does not apply, it will be right to consider, in the first place, what the doctrine is.

The doctrine of cy-pres, in reference to questions of perpetuity, arises where a testator gives real estate to an unborn person for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of such persons in tail male, or with remainder to the first and other sons of such persons in tail general, with remainder to the daughters as tenants in common in tail, with cross remainders amongst them. In such a case, the course of succession designated by the testator is one allowed by law, but the direction that the first taker should take for life only, with remainder to his children as purchasers, is illegal, as tending to a perpetuity. In such cases the law, in order to prevent the testator's intention from being entirely defeated, has treated his expressed intention as divisible into two parts: first, the intention that the first taker and his issue male or issue general, as the case may be, shall all take in succession, according to the legal course of descent; and, secondly, the intention that the first taker shall take an estate for life only, and that his children shall take as purchasers; and the two intentions being thus ascertained, the Courts have treated them as independent of each other, and have said that the inability to carry into effect the second or subordinate intention, shall not defeat the primary or general intention; and such a devise has therefore been held to give an estate in tail male or in tail, as the case may be, to the first taker. By these means, the estate, if left, as it were, to itself, will go in the precise course marked out by the testator, though it will be (contrary to what he intended) liable to be diverted from that course by the act of the first taker. Whether, in such a simple case as that which we have stated for the purpose of explaining the doctrine, it might not have been better originally to act on a different principle—to have said that the two intentions were blended together, and so that the language of the will afforded no guide to shew what the testator intended, in a case where his will in its integrity could not be carried into effect, is a matter on which it would be vain to speculate. The doctrine has been long recognized; and we should be unsettling land-marks if we were to call it in question. The doctrine is nowhere more clearly stated than in a note of the late Mr. Butler, at the end of Fearne's chapter on the rule in Shelley's case (1). "The cases," says Mr. Butler, "in which this doctrine has been received, have arisen on devises in which the testator has expressed himself in terms which have been thought by the Courts to contain a clear indication that the devisee and his issue should take the lands, and an intimation of the mode in which he intended the issue should take them; and his language, in respect to the mode of the issue taking them, has been thought by the Courts to be such as, construed literally, imported limitations contrary to law. In construing these devises, the Courts have considered that the testator's primary object was that the issue of the devisee should take the land, and that the mode in which the issue should take it was the testator's secondary object, or, as it has been usually expressed, that the former was his general, the latter his particular intention. Then, in conformity to their uniform practice of effecting the testator's intention as far as possible, they have thought themselves required to adopt that construction of the devise which, by including the devisee, satisfied the testator's general intention that the issue should take, but which, at the same time, by raising in the issue estates different from those which the testator appeared to have intended them, sacrificed to that extent his particular intention. Thus, where the testator has devised lands to a person and his issue, and has appeared to intend to devise estates by purchase to the children of unborn children of the devisee, the Courts have considered such limitations contrary to law; but as the will has appeared to them to shew an intention that the issue should take, and this intention could be effected by the issue taking derivatively through the ancestor, the Courts, rather than the testator's intention should absolutely fail of effect, have put such a construction on the devise as vested the inheritance in the ancestor himself. Such a construction brings all the parties intended to be benefited by the testator within the operation of the devise, and thus satisfies the testator's general intention; but in respect of the mode in which the testator would be thought by the literal meaning of his language to intend they should take, this is materially varied; and thus his particular intention is sacrificed."

Such being the general doctrine, we have only to see whether it is applicable to the will now before us, so as to give estates in tail male to the sons of P. Monypenny. The devise is to P. Monypenny for life, and after his death to the first son of P. Monypenny for his life, and after his decease to the use of the first son of such first son and the heirs male of his body, and in default of such issue, to the use of every other son of P. Monypenny, severally and successively, according to seniority of age, for the like interest and limitation as in respect of the first son of his issue, and in default of issue of P. Monypenny, then over. Here, it will be observed, no estate is given to any other grandson of P. Monypenny except the eldest son of each of his sons; so that if P. Monypenny had left two sons, and the eldest of those two sons had had two sons, on the death of P. Monypenny and his eldest son and grandson, and failure of issue male of the eldest grandson, the estate would, according to the testator's express intention, have gone, not to the second grandson, but to the second son of P. Monypenny, and so through the whole line of P. Monypenny's sons. In this case, therefore, it was no part of the testator's intention that the male descendants generally of P. Monypenny should take the estate, but only a very small part of those descendants, viz. the eldest direct line tracing from each of his sons, and that eldest line only.

To hold, therefore, that the sons took estates in tail male, would be, not to effectuate a general at the sacrifice of a particular intention, but arbitrarily to force on the testator an intention different from that which he has expressed; to conjecture what the testator would have done if he had been aware of the impossibility of carrying the estate in the course of the descent which he has designated, and then to hold that he has done what the Court supposes he would in such circumstances have wished to do. The doctrine of cy-près, if it be such as we have described it, and such as it is stated to be by Mr. Butler, clearly does not warrant any such decision; and what we have to do, therefore, is to see whether the decided cases, which have carried the doctrine the farthest, warrant the construction contended for.

The case which is generally represented as having pushed the doctrine farther than any other, is Pitt v. Jackson (2). There, Pinckney Wilkinson, having, under an antenuptial settlement, a power of appointing amongst the children of the marriage, lands to be purchased with certain trust monies comprised in the settlement, made his will pursuant to the power, and thereby directed a part of the trust funds to be applied in the purchase of real estate, to be settled to the use of his daughter Mary, for her life, for her separate use, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and after her decease, to the use of all her children as tenants in common in tail, with remainder over. Inasmuch as Mary, the daughter, was of course not in esse at the time of the settlement, the attempt to give her a life estate, with remainder to her children as tenants in common in tail, was an attempt to do what the law would not allow, as tending to a perpetuity. But Lord Kenyon held that the appointment was not void, but might be carried into effect cy-pres, i. e. by holding that Mary, the daughter, took an estate tail. The only ground on which this case can be explained is, that the Court divided the expressed intention into several parts, holding the words of the will to express the intention, first, that the daughter, and all who should be heirs of her body, should take before the estate should go over; secondly, that the daughter should have a life estate only; and thirdly, that her children, and the heirs of their bodies, should take in succession, not according to the ordinary rules of law, but that all the children of the daughter should take as tenants in common in tail; and the two latter intentions being illegal, the Court executed, or professed to execute, the testator's intentions as nearly as the rules of law would permit, by giving the estate to the daughter and the heirs of her body. It is very difficult really to treat this as carrying into effect any part of the testator's expressed intention; but the ground of the decision must have been that it did so. In truth, the case can hardly be relied on as an authority; for, as is pointed out by Sir E. Sugden (3), the case afterwards came before Lord Loughborough, on two bills of review, and he, though in words he assented to the doctrine of Lord Kenyon, yet, in truth, acted beside or even against it. It appears from the report of the case on the bills of review—Smith v. Lord Camelford (4), that the daughter under the settlement, took an estate tail in default of appointment, and Lord Loughborough held that the appointment to her for life united with her estate tail under the settlement, the estates appointed after her life being void for remoteness, so that ultimately the daughter took an estate tail, without aid from or application to the doctrine of cy-pres. In a late case, however, before Vice Chancellor Wigram, Vanderplank v. King (5), that learned Judge, though evidently not approving the doctrine of Pitt v. Jackson, yet seemed to think it a subsisting authority, and in fact acted on it as binding him in a case where the devise was in terms precisely similar. In considering how far these two cases are in point with reference to that now before us, it must be observed, that, both in Pitt v. Jackson and Vanderplank v. King, the persons who would from time to time take under the cy-pres doctrine, would never include any one who was not an object of the testator's bounty. In both those cases the intention was, at all times and in all possible states of the family, to benefit heirs of the body, who were the parties taking under the cy-pres doctrine. The persons who should from time to time be heirs of the body, were intended to take in common with other lines, if other lines there were; alone, if there were no other lines. Moreover, the estate was not to go over so long as there was any one who would answer the description of heir of the body of the first taker, and in failure of all such persons it was to go over. This intention was effectuated by the cy-pres doctrine. In these particulars the present case, it will be observed, differs entirely from the two we have referred to. Here it never was the testator's intention, collecting that intention from the words he has used, to benefit any heir male of the body of any son of P. Monypenny, except those who should derive title through an eldest son; and the doctrine, therefore, which should give the estate to an heir male claiming through any other line, through a second son of P. Monypenny's eldest son for instance, would obviously give it to a line of persons whom the testator did not intend to benefit.

(5) 3 Hare, 1; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 497.

And again, on failure of the eldest line of male descendants claiming through P. Monypenny's eldest son, the intention was that the estate should go over to the next son of P. Monypenny; whereas the doctrine of cy-pres would carry it to the heirs male of the body of P. Monypenny's eldest son, i. e. to his second son and his male descendants. These are certainly important distinctions between this case and Pitt v. Jackson and Vanderplank v. King; and without, therefore, meaning to say that the doctrine on which Lord Kenyon proceeded, and which Wigram, V.C. felt himself bound to follow, is satisfactory to our minds, it is sufficient for us to say that those authorities are not precisely in point, and we do not feel inclined to carry the doctrine on which they rest one step further, which we should be doing, if we held that they governed the case now before us.

There is, however, another reported case of an earlier date, in which this same ground of distinction certainly does not exist. We allude to the case of Nicholl v. Nicholl (6). There, the testator devised his real estates to the second son (unborn) of William Nicholl for his life, and after his death, or in case he should inherit the paternal estate, then to his second son and his heirs male, and for default of such issue to the third, fourth, and other sons of W. Nicholl successively in tail male, and for default of such issue, to the first and other sons successively of J. Nicholl (who was unmarried) in tail male, with remainders over. There were two questions: first, whether, until there should be a second son of W. Nicholl, the estate went to the heir-at-law or to the remainderman; and secondly, what estate the second son of W. Nicholl would take. The Court of Common Pleas, on a case sent by the Lord Chancellor, certified their opinion, first, that the heir-at-law, and not the remainderman, took the estate till there should be a second son of W. Nicholl; and, secondly, that such second son, in order to effectuate the general intention, would take an estate in tail male determinable on the accession of the paternal estate. It is certainly very difficult to see how this construction had any tendency to carry into effect any general intention of the testator, collecting the intention from the words he had used. That intention would clearly never include under any possible circumstances any descendants of the second son of W. Nicholl, except the second son of such second son, and the heirs male of his body, i. e. the heirs male of the body of the second son of the second son, not the heirs male of the body of the second son himself. Perhaps the Court, seeing that, as to the third and all subsequent sons, there was a clear expressed intention to give successive estates in tail male, might have felt itself warranted in inferring that, in spite of the language used by the testator, his intention must have been to secure the estate to all the male descendants of the second son, though with a superadded impossible intent, that the line of the second son should take in priority to the first, supposing the paternal estate to have descended on the second son of W. Nicholl. However that may be, the case is certainly one which it is very difficult to explain on any principle of construction, which does not leave it to the Courts (where the testator has expressed an illegal intention) to reject what he has said, and make the estate to devolve, not in the course pointed out in the will, but in some other course, which, under the circumstances, may appear convenient and easy to be carried into effect.

We cannot agree with the observations of Mr. Butler, in the subsequent part of the same note we have already referred to, where, in speaking of this case of Nicholl v. Nicholl, together with the other cases prior to Pitt v. Jackson, he says, that in all these cases the ancestor taking an estate tail so far quadrated with the estate intended by the testator for the issue, that though the quality of the estate taken under the cy-pres doctrine would be different from the quality of the estate they would have taken under the will, still it would not vary the course or order of the devolution of the land. That observation is applicable to all the cases except Nicholl v. Nicholl, but certainly not to that case. The decision there appears to us so unintelligible, that we cannot think ourselves bound by it, except in a case precisely similar, which the case now before us is not.

Taking, then, the doctrine of cy-pres to be such as it is from the passage we quoted from Mr. Butler's note, we do not think it can in any case properly be applied, so as to carry the estate in a line of succession different from that which the testator has directed. Whether we should, in a case precisely similar to Nicholl v. Nicholl or Pitt v. Jackson (followed, as the latter has been, by Wigram, V.C.), feel ourselves bound to follow those decisions, is a matter which we are not now called on to decide. It is enough at present to say, that they do not seem to us in terms to apply to this case, in which, therefore, our certificate will be in conformity to what we consider to be the true doctrine, as stated by Mr. Butler.

To hold that the sons of P. Monypenny took estates in tail male, would be to hold that they took estates which would carry the property in a different course of succession from that indicated by the testator. This would be to go against the will, and not to carry its provisions or any part of its provisions into effect. The consequence is, that in our opinion the eldest son of P. Monypenny, if he had had a son, would have taken an estate for life only, and all the subsequent estates are void for remoteness. Some stress was laid in the argument on the words giving the property over to J. Monypenny in default of issue of my brother Phillips, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease. It was contended that these latter words, whatever the construction of the limitation to the children of P. Monypenny, made the devise to Thomas and his issue good, inasmuch as it was to take effect on an event which must happen within the allowed period of time, viz., at the death of P. Monypenny, if he should then leave no issue, which event happened. But, looking at the whole context, we think the real meaning of the words was only this, on the death and failure of issue of my brother P. Monypenny, whether that failure shall occur at his own death or afterwards, I devise to Thomas; and therefore, whether the word "issue," there used, is to be construed to mean issue general, or such issue as had been previously designated, in either case the limitation over will be void, as being an attempt to create estates which were to commence at too remote a period, viz., the general failure of issue of P. Monypenny, or the failure of the particular issue mentioned by the testator.

The limitation would not be set up by holding it to have given an estate tail by implication to P. Monypenny, for such an estate tail would be bad, as not being to commence till after the failure of the particular previous estates, which we have already stated are void for remoteness. The consequence will be, that the gavel-kind heirs are the parties entitled, and we shall send our certificate accordingly.

CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED

IN THE

Court of Exchequer of Pleas.

HILARY TERM, 11 VICTORIÆ.

1848. } GOODCHILD v. LEADHAM AND
Jan. 25. } FERNYHOUGH.

Practice—Process—Amendment, to save the Statute of Limitations—Adding Defendant.

Where in an action against A. and B. as executors of C, the plaintiff, after declaration and plea, discovered that C.'s widow was co-executrix with A. and B, and the Statute of Limitations had become a bar since the commencement of the suit, this Court refused to allow the writ of summons to be amended, by adding the name of the co-executrix as a defendant, considering that such amendment would not have been made before the Uniformity of Process Act.

Quære—If the application to amend had been made before declaration or plea.

In this case a writ of summons in an action on promises was sued out on the 27th of September 1847, against the defendants, as executors of George Allen, who died on the 28th of June. An appearance was entered for the defendants, and the plaintiff declared on the 15th of November. On the 26th the defendants pleaded ne unques executors, and plene administravit, as to part of the declaration, and non assumpsit to the residue. The plaintiff then discovered that the widow of the testator, G. Allen, was co-executrix with the defendants; and that, on the 21st of October, she had obtained probate of his will, with power reserved to the defendants to prove afterwards. The action was for goods sold and delivered; and the last item in the account being dated the 29th of September 1841, a fresh action would have been barred by the Statute of Limitations. Under these circumstances, Alderson, B. had made an order at chambers, on the 23rd of December, that on payment of costs the plaintiff should be at liberty to amend the writ of summons and all subsequent proceedings, by adding the name of the co-executrix as a defendant, the defendants to have till the 4th day of Hilary term to plead de novo, with liberty to the parties to apply to the Court. A rule was obtained to rescind the order, on the ground that the Judge had no power to make it, against which

Martin now shewed cause.—There was no plea in abatement here; and as the plaintiff will otherwise be barred from bringing a fresh action, the Court will amend the writ of summons—Brown v. Fullerton (1), and the cases there referred to. This question was definitively settled in the case of Christie v. Bell (2). He also referred to Roberts v. Bate (3). The amendment will work no hardship here; and is one which might have been made before the Uniformity of Process Act—Carr v. Shaw (4), and Rutherford v. Mein (5).

Petersdorff, contrà.—Neither a Judge nor the Court have power to compel a mere stranger, who has not been served with process, to become a party to an existing suit.

[PARKE, B.—The doubt I entertain is, whether under the old system such an amendment could have been made so late in the suit. In the case cited, Rutherford v. Mein, a special capias was amended by filling up a blank which had been left for the defendant's christian name; but the report of that case does not shew whether it was before or after declaration. When the Uniformity of Process Act passed there was a meeting of the Judges for the purpose of considering whether amendments ought to be allowed in the new process. My Brother Alderson and myself could not see how that act made any difference with respect to amendments, and we thought that the same rules should prevail as under the old system. There was, however, a large majority against us. In Roberts v. Bate, my Brother Paterson says, the Judges resolved not to amend under the new process; and refers to what I said in Lakin v. Massie (6). The resolution of the Judges is also correctly stated in Hodgkinson v. Hodgkinson (7). We soon found the inconvenience of the rule, and in this court we determined to allow of amendment, by adding a plaintiff where the action would otherwise be barred by the Statute of Limitations; and that is the rule by which we go, though in the case of Roberts v. Bate, the Court of Queen's Bench did not agree with us. The question is, could this amendment have been made before the Uniformity of Process Act? Now there is a great difference between adding a plaintiff, which is done by his own consent, and adding a defendant against his consent? in the latter case you undo all that has been done; you must serve the process de novo and proceed as in a fresh action.]

[ALDERSON, B.—Is not this an action rather against the estate of the deceased than any particular person? If so, it would be only ante-dating a writ with which the estate had been already served.]

There would be great inconvenience in so considering it. Executors must satisfy the claims of creditors in the order in which they come; and if service of process in this case is notice to the executrix of the plaintiff's demand, she might be rendered liable for payments made between the time of action brought and service of the amended writ. The name of a plaintiff even will not be added except where the Statute of Limitations would otherwise bar the remedy.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think this rule should be made absolute. It is proposed to amend the writ of summons by adding another defendant to those already sued, and that after declaration and plea—an amendment which, as it seems to me, could not have been made before the Uniformity of Process Act; and I am not aware of any instance in which we have gone further since the alteration of the old practice by that statute. I have myself always considered that the practice of the Court, as to amendments, remained the same, and that whatever would have been done before the Uniformity of Process Act would be done now. I think the proposed amendment would not have been allowed under the old system, and ought not to be allowed now. It is unnecessary to go farther, or to say under what circumstances such an amendment might possibly be allowed. It is proposed to make a person a defendant who is not before the Court, and over whom we have no power, which makes a very great difference between this case and that of adding a plaintiff who appears before the Court and consents to what is done.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The cases of Brown v. Fullerton and Christie v. Bell may be said to have finally settled the practice of this court on this subject. The question was one of considerable importance, and several of the Judges were consulted on the subject prior to those decisions; but it must not be taken that all the Judges were consulted. After much deliberation on the rule come to after the passing of the Uniformity of Process Act, it was agreed that we would abide by that rule, and would not amend process, except when the Statute of Limitations would otherwise be a bar; and also where the writ varied from the præcipe. With these two exceptions we have adhered to the general rule. The question, therefore, in this case is, whether this amendment can be made within the scope of the authority we have reserved to ourselves to amend the new process. In such a case as the present, I agree that we ought to have the power of doing whatever would have been done under the old system; but, to say the least of it, I feel very great doubt whether such an alteration as this would have been made under the old system. There is certainly the case of Rutherford v. Mein, where under the old practice an amendment in the name of a defendant was allowed in meane process, but at what stage of the proceedings does not appear. When matters have gone to the extent they have here, an amendment by adding a new defendant would be very inconvenient.

ALDERSON, B.—I am glad I raised this question for the opinion of the Court, as the effect will be that we shall now be able to come to some definite rule on the subject. I quite agree that where the Statute of Limitations applies, we ought to amend the new process in the same way as the Courts would have done under the old. That is now the rule in this court, and I believe in all the courts. If the application had been made at an earlier stage, it might have been different. We should, probably, exercise the same discretion that our predecessors did, as in the case of Rutherford v. Mein. But we will not make this amendment; for it would not have been allowed under the old practice. It creates too great a disturbance in the proceedings. In the case of adding a plaintiff the disturbance is but slight.

PLATT, B.—I agree that this amendment ought not to be allowed: it, in fact, is asking the Court to repeal the Statute of Limitations as regards the executrix.

Rule absolute.

1848. { THE GOVERNOR AND COMPANY
Jan. 31. { OF THE BANK OF SCOTLAND
          { v. FENWICK.

Banking Co-partnership—Scire Facias against Member of—7 Geo. 4. c. 46. s. 13.

The Court quashed a writ of scire facias on a judgment recovered against the public officer of a banking co-partnership, which alleged that A. B., "at the time of the commencement of the said action in which," &c.,

"and at the time of the recovery and giving of the said judgment, was, and from thence continually has been, and still is, a member of the said co-partnership," &c.

This was a rule, calling on the plaintiffs to shew cause why a writ of scire fac. in the following form should not be quashed:—
"Victoria, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, defender of the faith, to the sheriffs of London, greeting. Whereas the Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland, lately, on the 21st day of September, in the year of our Lord 1847, in our court, before the Barons of our Exchequer at Westminster, under and by virtue of the statute in such case made and provided, by the judgment of the same Court, recovered against George Burdis,—as and being one of the public registered officers, for the time being, of certain persons united in co-partnership, and carrying on the trade or business of bankers in England, by and under the name and style of and called the North of England Joint-Stock Banking Company, for the purpose of carrying on the business of bankers in England, under the provisions of a certain act of parliament, passed in the 7th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, for, amongst other things, the better regulating co-partnerships of certain bankers in England, and which said G. Burdis had been duly nominated, appointed, and registered one of the public officers of the said co-partnership to be sued, and was then sued as the nominal defendant, for and on behalf of the said co-partnership, according to the form and effect of the said act of parliament,—£6,536*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.*, for their damages, which they had sustained as well on occasion of their not performing certain promises before then made by the said co-partnership, to the said Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland, as for their costs and charges by them about their suit in that behalf expended, whereof the said G. Burdis, as such public officer as aforesaid, is convicted, as by inspecting the rolls of the said Exchequer appears of record; and whereas, by and according to the provisions and the form and effect of the said statute execution upon any judgment in any action obtained against any public officer for the time being of any such co-partnership as in the said act mentioned, carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of the said act, whether as plaintiff or defendant, may be issued against any member or members for the time being of such co-partnership, and now on behalf of the said Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland, in the same court, we have been informed and given to understand that although judgment be thereupon given, yet execution of the said damages still remains to be made to the said Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland; and that Cuthbert Smith Fenwick, at the time of the commencement of the said action, in which the said judgment was so obtained as aforesaid, and at the time of the recovery and giving of the said judgment, was, and from thence continually has been, and still is, a member of the said co-partnership called "The North of England Joint-Stock Banking Company," then and still being such a co-partnership as in the said statute mentioned, and then and still carrying on the business of banking, under the provisions of the said statute, wherefore the said Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland have humbly besought us to provide them a proper remedy in this behalf; and we being willing that what is just in this behalf should be done, command you that, by honest and lawful men of your bailiwick, you make known to the said Cuthbert Smith Fenwick that he come before the Barons of our said Exchequer at Westminster, on the 18th day of November A.D. 1847, to shew if he has or knows of anything to say for himself, why the said Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland ought not to have execution against him, the said Cuthbert Smith Fenwick, for the damages aforesaid, together with interest thereon, at the rate of 4l. per centum per annum, from the said 21st day of September 1847, on which day the judgment aforesaid was entered up, according to the force, form, and effect of the said recovery and of the statute in such case made and provided, if it shall seem expedient for them so to do; and in what manner you shall execute this our writ, make appear to the Barons of our said Exchequer at Westminster on the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1847, and have you there the names of those by whom you shall so make known to him and this writ. Witness, Sir Frederick Pollock, Knight, at Westminster, the 11th day of November in the eleventh year of our reign."

Sir John Bayley shewed cause. — The case of Edaile v. Trustwell (1) is relied on by the other side; but there the Court came to no decision on the point, the plaintiff's counsel having consented to amend. The objection in truth is, not that the writ gives the defendant insufficient notice, but that it gives him too much.

[ROLFE, B.—If the words "member for the time being," in the 13th section of the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46, mean a member at the time the writ of sci. fa. issued, then the writ states two grounds of liability.]

In no case is the leave of the Court necessary, except where the party has ceased to be a member. The 12th section of the statute declares that a judgment against the public officer shall have the like effect and operation upon and against the property of the co-partnership, and the property of every member thereof, as if such judgment had been recovered against such co-partnership. If the writ had shewn upon the face of it that the defendant had ceased to be a member of the co-partnership, then it would have appeared that the leave of the Court was necessary. In the absence of any affidavit to shew that the defendant had ceased to be a member, this is the true description.

Willes, in support of the rule. — In Bradley v. Warburg (2), it was held that the issuing a scire facias without leave of the Court could not be pleaded as a defence in bar of the action, but was an irregularity merely, for which an application might be made to the Court to set aside the writ. If the defendant was a member at the time of the judgment, and had ceased to be so, the writ could not issue without leave of the Court. Whatever construction is put upon the words "member for the time being,"—whether it means "member at the time the scire facias issued," or "at the time of the commencement of the suit," the present writ is irregular. Suppose the defendant was in fact a member at the time of the judgment, and not a member "for the time being," and a declaration is delivered following the form of the writ, the defendant by his plea must deny that he was a member at the time of the judgment, and also "for the time being." The plaintiff would prove that the defendant was a member at the time of the judgment, though not for the time being; and the result would be, that the plaintiff would have the benefit of a writ issued without the leave of the Court in a case in which the leave of the Court is required. It was on that ground that the writ was quashed in the case referred to by Parke, B., in Esdaile v. Trustwell.

ROLFE, B.—The rule must be absolute. The principle of the case of Esdaile v. Trustwell governs this. The statute enables a plaintiff without leave of the Court to issue a scire facias against a member for the time being,—and for the purpose of disposing of this question, I will assume that the words "time being" mean at the time the writ issues, for I think it makes no difference whether it mean at the time of the commencement of the suit. The statute also enables a plaintiff to have execution against some person who was a member of the co-partnership at the time of the judgment recovered; but in that case the leave of the Court is necessary before issuing the writ. Here, the scire facias describes the defendant as a member for the time being, and also at the time of judgment recovered. The declaration would be in the same form, but no advantage could be taken by demurrer to such a declaration, therefore the defendant must take issue on it, and plead that he was not a member "at the time of judgment recovered," or "for the time being." If it should turn out at the trial that the defendant was a member at the time of judgment recovered, though not for the time being, the plaintiff would be entitled to execution though the writ had issued without leave of the Court.

wards obtained by L, in 1844, for a mandamus to the Justices to enter continuances and hear the appeal. A copy of the rule was served upon two of the defendants, R. D. and R. T, who, at that time, and at the commencement of the suit, were the churchwardens of C. R. T. afterwards signed a retainer to the plaintiff, to act as attorney for the parish of C, but subsequently countermanded it. R. D. did not interfere. Before the rule was argued, J. D. and W. E, the other defendants, were elected overseers, and R. D. and R. T. churchwardens. Before the argument on the rule (which was discharged) the plaintiff's clerk saw J. D. repeatedly about the rule, and was asked by him how the matter was going on; he also saw the other defendant W. E. repeatedly about it, but he was not so active. The plaintiff's bill of costs having been delivered to one of the defendants, they all expressed readiness to pay, but said there was a grudge in the parish:—Held, that the defendants were not liable.

This was an action of debt for work and labour by the plaintiff, as an attorney, and for money paid and money found to be due on an account stated. The defendants pleaded, first, that they were never indebted; and, secondly, that the plaintiff did not, one month before the commencement of the action, deliver or send a bill of charges subscribed according to the statute. Upon these pleas issue was joined.

The case was tried, before Lord Denman, C.J., at the Summer Assizes for Montgomeryshire, 1846, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, for the amount of the debt, 109*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* and 40*s.* costs, subject to the opinion of the Court of Exchequer on the following CASE.

On the 18th of December 1843 an order was duly made by two Justices, for the removal of one Hugh Hughes and family from the parish of Carno, in the county of Montgomery, to the parish of Llanycil, in the county of Merioneth. The paupers were removed to Llanycil, under this order, on the 13th of January following, no notice of appeal having been given. The overseers of the poor of Llanycil then entered and respited an appeal at the ensuing Montgomeryshire Sessions in April 1844; and this appeal came on to be heard at the following Midsummer Sessions, July 4, 1844. A preliminary objection was taken by the respondents to the appellants being heard; that they had not given twenty-eight days' notice of their intention to try, in compliance with a rule of that court. The Justices held this objection to be fatal, and, without entering into the merits, confirmed the order, with costs. In Michaelmas term, 1844, the appellants obtained a rule nisi from the Court of Queen's Bench, calling upon the Justices of Montgomeryshire to shew cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, commanding them to enter continuances and hear the appeal. Copies of this rule were served upon Richard Davies, who then, and from thence until and at the time of commencing this action, was one of the churchwardens of the parish of Carno, and upon Griffith Gittins, then one of the overseers of the poor of the said parish. One Enoch Morgan was then the other overseer of the poor, and the defendant, Robert Tebbott, the other churchwarden. After Gittins had been served with a copy of the rule nisi, he called on the plaintiff at his office, to consult him upon the subject, and signed a written retainer, of which the following is a copy:—

"Parish Officers of Llanycil, appellants.
 "Parish Officers of Carno, respondents.
 "Mr. John Marsh, solicitor, Carno.

"We do hereby retain you as our attorney to shew cause, on our behalf, against a rule obtained by the appellant parish for directing continuances to be entered for trying this cause on the merits, and we hereby instruct you to take such steps in the matter as you may think proper. Dated this 18th day of December 1844.

(Signed)

"Griffith Gittins,
 "The mark + of Enoch } Overseers.
 Morgan,

"Robert Tebbott, churchwarden.
 "Witness, W. J. Edwards."

The defendant, Robert Tebbott, one of the churchwardens, shortly afterwards signed the retainer, and Enoch Morgan, the other overseer, put his mark thereto. On the 10th of January 1845, the defendant, Robert Tebbott, gave the plaintiff notice in writing, countermanding such retainer. The following is a copy:—"Sir, on December 18th, 1844, I requested you not to proceed against Mr. Lloyd Williams's mandamus. I again declare that I will not be responsible for any expense you may incur contrary to my direction, as well as contrary to the wishes of all the parishioners.

"I am, &c., Robert Tebbott."

The defendant, Richard Davies, was never asked to sign the retainer, and did not interfere. The plaintiff obtained copies of the affidavits upon which the rule nisi had been obtained from the agents in London, and caused affidavits to be prepared, and drew up a brief for counsel to shew cause against the rule. Before this rule was argued there occurred a change in the parish officers. In the month of March 1845, the defendants, James Davies and William Evans, were duly elected overseers of the poor in the room of Griffith Gittins and Enoch Morgan. The other two defendants, Richard Davies and Robert Tebbott, were re-elected to the office of churchwardens. The plaintiff's clerk saw James Davies repeatedly about the rule, who asked how the matter was going on. He also saw William Evans repeatedly about it, but he was not so active, James Davies being the manager. James Davies often inquired of Griffith Gittins how the affair was going on in London.

The rule came on for argument in Trinity term, 1845, on the 11th of January, in the Bail Court of the Queen's Bench, and after consideration Wightman, J. discharged the rule, without costs. At the latter end of June 1845, the plaintiff communicated the result to the defendant, James Davies, and to other parishioners. On the 28th of January 1846, the plaintiff delivered to the said James Davies a bill of his costs and charges, duly signed, headed, and directed.

All the defendants expressed readiness to pay, but said there was a grudge in the parish. No bill was delivered by the plaintiff to any of the other defendants. James Davies afterwards caused a parish vestry to be summoned, at which it was determined to resist payment of the bill; and this action was commenced in the following March.

Upon this state of facts, it was contended, at the trial, for the defendants, that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited; first, on the ground that the four defendants were not the proper parties to be sued; secondly, that the delivery of the plaintiff's bill of costs to James Davies alone was not a sufficient delivery thereof within the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

If the Court should be of opinion that the action was properly brought against the present defendants, and that the plaintiff's bill of costs was duly delivered in compliance with the statute, the verdict on both issues for the plaintiff is to stand as entered. If the Court should be of a contrary opinion on either of the above points, then a nonsuit is to be entered, or a verdict for the defendants, as the Court may direct.

Townsend, for the plaintiff.—All the defendants are liable, as one parish officer can bind the other parish officers. The King v. Beeston (1) shews that under an act of parliament which enables the churchwardens and overseers both to contract for the providing for the poor, the contract of the majority of the churchwardens and overseers will bind the rest, and it is not necessary that all should concur.

[ALDERSON, B.—That was not the case of a personal liability on the part of the overseers.]

In Kirby v. Banister (2) an action was brought against the five defendants, who were parish officers, and who had given to paupers orders for goods upon the plaintiff, who was a shopkeeper: it was held that the plaintiff might recover against the five, although the orders had been signed by three only.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—That case was put upon the ground that the five were not liable, unless the jury were of opinion that they all jointly contracted.]

[ALDERSON, B.—The plaintiff, in that case, might reasonably contend that although all five did not sign the orders, yet that they authorized the delivery of the goods.]

Welby v. Brown (3) is in point.

[PARKE, B.—The defendants had no intention of making themselves personally liable. An attorney will often go on with parish business without any contract at all, on the faith of being paid out of the parish funds.]

An overseer is bound by the contract of his co-overseer—Malkin v. Vickerstaff (4).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—That decision is directly against the plaintiff's view of the case.]

Secondly, there was evidence of the adoption of the contract by the defendants; for, James Davies, one of the defendants, in speaking of the rule for the mandamus, repeatedly asked how it was going on; and they all expressed readiness to pay, but said that there was a grudge in the parish.

[PARKE, B.—Tebbutt signed the retainer to the plaintiff, and therefore prima facie would be liable; but two days afterwards he stated to the plaintiff in writing that he would not be bound. It is true, he afterwards expressed his readiness to pay, but said there was a grudge in the parish. How is that an adoption of the retainer which he had countermanded? He did not express his readiness to pay out of his own funds, but out of those of the parish, and he was prevented from doing the latter by the grudge that existed in the parish.]

The work was for the benefit of the parish; and the defendants' allowing it to go on, and making inquiries as to its progress are evidence of their assent to the plaintiff's being retained.

[PARKE, B.—That is no evidence of assent.]

Admitting, however, that overseers cannot bind their successors, still if a party acts without the authority of his principal, and the latter afterwards adopts his acts, he is bound by them—Story on Agency, 206, M'Lean v. Dunn (5). Ex-overseers, however, may be considered as the agents of their successors in office.

[PARKE, B.—If your argument is correct; overseers may be considered as partners in trade.]

Welby, contra, was not called on.

PARKE, B.—The defendants are entitled to judgment of nonsuit. If there was no contract at all, and the plaintiff looked to the funds of the parish for re-payment, it follows that he cannot sue anybody. If the retainer is looked at, it appears that one party is not bound, as he disclaimed his retainer; and there is no evidence whatever of his having revoked that disclaimer. The truth is, the defendants would have been willing to pay the plaintiff's debt out of the parish funds, but were prevented by a feud existing in the parish.

Railway Company—Deposits—Money had and received—Subscribers' Agreement—Fraud.

In 1845 a railway company, provisionally registered, issued a prospectus, which stated the capital to be 1,500,000*l.*, in 60,000 shares of 25*l.* each. The plaintiff having applied for shares, and having received a letter of allotment for forty shares, requiring him to pay the sum of 105*l.* as a deposit thereon, on or before the 16th of October, paid the amount on that day. On the 4th of November, the plaintiff signed the subscribers' agreement, containing the usual terms as to the disposition of the deposits. Of the whole amount of shares, about 35,000 were allotted, and out of this number deposits were paid up on 18,160 only. These facts were not communicated to the plaintiff before signing the deed:—Held, in an action by the plaintiff to recover from a member of the managing committee the whole amount of his deposits, that the withholding of the above facts did not amount to fraud, so as to avoid the subscribers' agreement.

Indebitatus assumpsit, for money paid, money had and received, and on an account stated.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Pollock, C.B., at the London sittings after Michaelmas term last, the following facts were proved:—The plaintiff is a solicitor, residing in Westminster; and the defendant was one of the managing committee of the Midland and Eastern Counties Railway Company. In the year 1845 a committee was formed for carrying into effect a railway from Cambridge to Worcester, to be called the Midland and Eastern Counties Railway. The prospectus of the company, which was provisionally registered, stated the capital to be 1,500,000*l.*, in 60,000 shares of 25*l.* each; deposit, 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* per share. The plaintiff having, on the 2nd of September, applied for fifty shares in the undertaking, received on the 1st of October, a letter of allotment, stating that the committee had allotted him forty shares in the company, requiring him to pay the sum of 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* per share, amounting to 105*l.*, on or before the 16th inst., and adding, that in default of payment the allotment would be cancelled. On the 16th of October the plaintiff paid the deposit, and received the scrip. On the 4th of November, the subscribers' agreement, containing the usual terms as to the disposition of the deposits, was sent to London, and was on that day executed by the plaintiff. About 35,000 shares in the whole were allotted, but of this number, in consequence of the sudden depreciation of railway shares, deposits were paid on 18,160 only. The bill of the company was read a third time in the House of Commons, but failed to pass the House of Lords, the committee deciding that the preamble was not proved. Under these circumstances, it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the permitting the plaintiff to sign the deed without informing him that a portion only of the deposits had been paid, amounted to such a fraud as avoided the subscribers' agreement, and entitled the plaintiff to recover his deposits.

The learned Judge was of opinion that no case of fraud had been established, and he directed a nonsuit.

Martin now moved to set aside the nonsuit, and for a new trial.—In this case there was evidence of fraud: the officer of the company, at the time of sending the deed to the plaintiff for signature, was aware that 18,160 shares only had been paid for; and under those circumstances it was fraudulent in him to send the subscribers' agreement to the plaintiff for signature. There was a fraudulent concealment of a material fact; and, in a case like this, a suppressio veri and allegatio falsi are the same. The effect of the conduct of the officer of the company was to represent that a sufficient number of shares had been allotted to entitle the company to go on. It is not contended by the plaintiff that the reservation of a few shares, for the purpose of giving a boon to landowners, or for enabling the company to make advantageous arrangements with other companies, is fraudulent; but, in the present case, 18,160 shares only had been paid for out of 60,000—*Nockells v. Assumpsit. The declaration stated that the plaintiff agreed with the defendants to act as their salesman for one year, to devote the whole of his time to them as their traveller, and not to be connected in any way with any other house, in disposing of their goods; and the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff 200*l.* per annum for such servitude. Wilkes, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is bad in omitting to aver that the defendant had no reasonable and probable cause for arresting the plaintiff—De Medina v. Grove (1). He was then stopped by the Court.

Lush, for the plaintiff.—The declaration is good. De Medina v. Grove is not in point, as the judgment in that case was not regular. There it was necessary to aver that the arrest took place without reasonable and probable cause, because it did not appear that there were not other debts, and the defendant was justified in issuing the writ. But here the defendant was not warranted in issuing execution, for the final order for protection had been made previously and still continued in force.

[PARKE, B.—It may have issued from an improper Court, or have been surreptitiously obtained.]

That supposition is not consistent with the averments in the declaration.

[PARKE, B. — Suppose the defendant considers the document a forgery, in what manner is he to contest it?]

By making an application to the Court. The defendant issued the writ wilfully and maliciously.

PARKE, B.—The defendant is entitled to judgment. He is not liable unless he arrests the plaintiff without reasonable and probable cause. The declaration does indeed contain an averment of the writ having been sued out maliciously, but does not contain an averment of a want of reasonable and probable cause. The defendant may have supposed bona fide that the protection was void.

Averment, that the tenancy was determined by the defendant; that the plaintiff had made improvements for which he had not been compensated; that although the plaintiff, after the determination of the tenancy, appointed J. D. to determine the compensation, and J. D. was ready to act, of which the defendant had notice, and was then requested by the plaintiff to appoint some person on his behalf, yet the defendant did not nor would appoint some person in that behalf:—Held, on special demurrer, that the declaration was ill in omitting to state that the plaintiff had requested the defendant to appoint a valuer before the commencement of the suit.*

The declaration stated, that in consideration that the plaintiff had become tenant to the defendant of a certain farm, at a certain yearly rent, upon the terms that if the plaintiff should receive from the defendant notice to quit, and should have made expensive improvements upon the said farm, for which the subsequent crops should not have sufficiently compensated the plaintiff, the farm should, upon the determination of the said tenancy, be looked over by two men of business, one to be appointed by each party, and that the persons so appointed should determine to what further compensation the plaintiff should be entitled, the defendant promised the plaintiff that if the said tenancy should be determined, and the plaintiff should have made improvements for which he should not have been compensated, he, the defendant, would, at the request of the plaintiff, appoint one of such persons for such purposes. Averment, that the tenancy was determined by the defendant; that the plaintiff had made expensive improvements, for which he had not been sufficiently compensated by the subsequent crops; that although the plaintiff, after the determination of the tenancy, appointed one J. D. to determine to what further compensation the plaintiff was entitled, and the said J. D. was, and from thence hitherto, hath been ready and willing to act in that behalf, of which the defendant had notice, and was then requested by the plaintiff to appoint, on his behalf, some proper person in that behalf; yet the defendant did not nor would appoint on his, the defendant's, part some proper person in that behalf.

Demurrer, assigning for causes that it did not appear that the appointment of J. D. was made before the commencement of the suit, or such a reasonable time before that period as would have enabled the defendant to appoint another person to meet him; nor did it appear that the defendant had notice of such appointment, or that he was requested to appoint any other person before the commencement of this suit.

Ogle, in support of the demurrer, contended that the declaration was bad for the reasons alleged in the body of the demurrer.

[PARKE, B.—Does not the obligation to appoint an arbitrator arise at the end of the term? If so, the declaration is bad. The defendant will contend that the legal result of the contract is, that no request to the defendant to appoint an arbitrator was necessary.]

He was stopped by the Court.

Cowling, contra.

PARKE, B.—The expensive improvements were to be paid for by the subsequent crops. The fact, whether such crops had or had not remunerated the plaintiff would be known to the plaintiff alone, the declaration, therefore, should have contained an allegation that the plaintiff had given the defendant notice of that fact, and had before the commencement of the suit requested him to appoint a valuer. Until such notice, the duty of the defendant to appoint a valuer did not arise. The plaintiff may have leave to amend, otherwise there will be judgment for the defendant.

County Courts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129.—Costs.

An action for a matter for which a plaintiff might have issued under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, was commenced in one of the superior courts, after the passing of that act, but before the Order in Council establishing the County Court of the district in which the cause of action arose and the parties resided:—Held, that the 129th section, which deprives parties of costs who, after the passing of that act, sue in the superior courts for causes "for which a plaintiff might have been entered in any court holden under that act," did not apply.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause "why, on payment of 5*l.*, the amount of the verdict recovered in this case, all further proceedings should not be stayed; or why the judgment should not be entered up for the said sum of 5*l.* only, without costs; or why the plaintiff should not bring the postea into court, and file the plea roll, so that the defendant might enter a suggestion thereon to deprive the plaintiff of costs, pursuant to the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129, for the more easy recovery of small debts and demands in England."

It appeared on affidavit, that this was an action brought in this court for the recovery of 14*l.* for breach of covenant in not repairing a house. The house was situated within the jurisdiction of the Middlesex County Court, established under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and both the plaintiff and defendant resided within that jurisdiction. The action was commenced after the passing of that statute, but before the Middlesex County Court was constituted, under its provisions, by the order of the Queen in Council. The cause had been tried, before Pollock, C.B., and a verdict found for the plaintiff, damages 5*l.*

Crowder now shewed cause.—This rule cannot be supported. The true construction of the 129th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. is manifestly contrary to that which must be contended for on the other side. That section enacts, "That if any action shall be commenced after the passing of this act in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record, for any cause other than those lastly hereinbefore specified, for which a plaint might have been entered in any court holden under this act, and a verdict shall be found for the plaintiff for a sum less than 20*l.*, if the said action is founded on contract, or less than 5*l.*, if it be founded on tort, the said plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only, and no costs." It is quite clear that when this action was commenced, there was not "any court holden under that act," in which a plaint could have been entered; and the rule will be discharged, with costs.

Charnock, contra.—The words of the 129th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. are express, that the plaintiff is to lose his costs in a case like the present "if the action shall be commenced after the passing of that act." This act of parliament took effect from the day on which it received the royal assent, which was before the writ issued. The plaintiff ought not to have issued his writ after the act; he would have had his remedy as soon as the county court was established.

Per Curiam.—It is quite clear that this rule must be discharged, and with costs. At the time when this action was commenced there was not "any court holden under this act," in which the plaintiff could have sued.

Rule discharged, with costs.

1848. } THE NEWRY AND ENNISKILLEN
Feb. 5. } RAILWAY COMPANY v. EDMUNDS.

Railway Company—Calls, Liability to—Sealed Register—8 & 9 Vict. c. 16.

In an action for calls upon certain shares in a railway company, under the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16. s. 26, it appeared that the defendant was not an original subscriber, but had purchased scrip certificates of the shares in question, and before the call was made sent them in to the company, with a claim to be entered in their books as the holder thereof. His name was entered in a draft register of shares, and a receipt for the scrip sent to him; but his name was not entered in the sealed register until after the call was made:—Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover; and, semble, that in this respect there is no difference between the case of an original subscriber and that of a transferee.

This was an action of debt under the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, to recover the amount of two calls on fifty shares in the Newry and Enniskillen Railway Company.

Pleas—Nunquam indebitatus, and traverses of the defendant's being the holder of the shares, and of the making of the calls. Issues thereon.

The cause was tried, before Lord Denman, C.J., when the following facts appeared:—The company was incorporated by an act of parliament passed subsequently to the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16; and the first general meeting was on the 30th of August 1845. The defendant had purchased, in the market, the scrip certificates of the fifty shares in question, which he sent in to the company in September 1845, before either of the calls had been made, and claimed to be registered in their books as the holder of that number of shares. His name was thereupon entered in a draft register of shares, and a receipt for the scrip sent to his agent. From this draft "the alphabetical, numerical, and sealed register of the company" was made up, and the corporate seal was affixed to it on the 27th of Feb. 1846, at the second meeting of the company, and after the making of the first of the calls the subject of this action. Upon these facts the plaintiffs obtained a verdict for the amount of both calls, with leave to the defendant to move to reduce it by the amount of the first call. In Easter term a rule was obtained accordingly, against which,

Shree, Serj., Petersdorff and James now shewed cause.—This case depends on the construction of the statute, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, by the 26th section of which railway companies may sue for calls, and need only allege in their declaration that the defendant is a holder of shares in the company, and is indebted for calls; and, by the 27th section, it is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover to prove that the defendant at the time the call was made was the holder of shares in the company, and that the call was duly made. By section 8, "every person who shall have subscribed the prescribed sum, or upwards, to the capital of the company, or shall otherwise have become entitled to a share in the company, and whose name shall have been entered in the register of shareholders hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed a shareholder of the company;" and the 9th section enacts, that "the company shall keep a book, to be called the 'Register of Shareholders,' and in such book shall be fairly and distinctly entered, from time to time, the names of the several corporations, and the names and additions of the several persons entitled to shares in the company, together with the number of shares to which such shareholder shall be respectively entitled, distinguishing each share by its number, and the amount of the subscription paid on such shares, and the surnames or corporate names of the said shareholders shall be placed in alphabetical order; and such book shall be authenticated by the common seal of the company being affixed thereto; and such authentication shall take place at the first ordinary meeting, or the next subsequent meeting, of the company; and so, from time to time, at each ordinary meeting of the company." By section 28. "the production of the register of shareholders shall be prima facie evidence of such defendant being a shareholder, and of the number and amount of his shares." Now, the defendant was not an original subscriber to the capital of the company, and the fact of his name not being entered in the sealed register of shareholders at the time the first call was made, does not prevent the plaintiffs recovering for that call; because the statute does not make the sealed register the only evidence of a party being a shareholder, nor preclude the company from proving that fact by other evidence. The defendant will probably rely on the case of The Cheltenham and Great Western Union Railway Company v. Pries (1). There the Company's act, 6 Will. 4. c. lxxvii., enacted that in actions for calls, the book of shares under the seal of the company should be prima facie evidence that a party named therein was proprietor of shares. A call was made in October 1836; the book of shares containing the defendant's name was made up before the end of September 1836, but the seal was not affixed to it until November. Lord Denman held, that the book was no evidence that the defendant was a proprietor of shares at the time of the call in October 1836. That, however, is a Nisi Prius decision prior to the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, on which this case depends; and there the book was the only evidence produced. Here, the defendant by letter declares himself the owner of the shares, and claims to be entered as such, and is in fact entered on a draft register of the company before the call is made.

[PARKE, B.—Under the 8th section, that person is to be deemed a shareholder of the company who shall have subscribed the prescribed sum or upwards, or shall otherwise have become entitled to a share, "and" (not or) "whose name" shall have been entered on the register of shareholders. Now, whatever may be the case where the party is an original shareholder (and I am disposed to think the words "and whose name" would apply to such parties), certainly in the case of a party purchasing scrip certificates of shares, and so becoming entitled to shares by transfer, it is a condition precedent to his being a shareholder, that he should be on the register of shareholders, and the question is, when does the document become a register; surely not until it is sealed.]

The defendant is not entitled to avail himself of the non-sealing of the register as a defence to an action for calls; the sealing is only a means of authentication for the protection of the company. This is evident from the 18th and 23rd sections. The 18th section enacts, that "If the interest in any share has become transmitted in consequence of the death, or bankruptcy, or insolvency, of any shareholder, or by any other lawful means than by a transfer according to the provisions of this or the special act, such transmission shall be authenticated by a declaration in writing, as hereinafter required, or in such other manner as the directors shall require; and every such declaration shall state the manner in which and the party to whom such share shall have been so transmitted, and shall be made and signed by some credible person before a Justice, or before a Master or Master Extraordinary of the High Court of Chancery, and such declaration shall be left with the secretary, and thereupon he shall enter the name of the person entitled under such transmission in the register of shareholders; and for every such entry the company may demand any sum not exceeding the prescribed amount, and where no amount shall be prescribed then not exceeding 5s.; and, until such transmission has been so authenticated, no person claiming by virtue of any such transmission shall be entitled to receive any share of the profits of the undertaking, nor to vote in respect of any such share as the holder thereof." Then, by the 33rd section, "a declaration in writing, by some credible person not interested in the matter, made before any Justice, or before any Master or Master Extraordinary of the High Court of Chancery, that the call in respect of a share was made, and notice thereof given, and that a default in payment of the call was made, and that the forfeiture of the share was declared and confirmed in manner hereinbefore required, shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated; and such declaration, and the receipt of the treasurer of the company for the price of such share, shall constitute a good title to such share; and a certificate of proprietorship shall be delivered to such purchaser, and thereupon he shall be deemed the holder of such share discharged from all calls due prior to such purchase; and he shall not be bound to see to the application of the purchase-money, nor shall his title to such share be affected by any irregularity in the proceedings in reference to such sale." Now, it would be hard if the privileges or liabilities of the new proprietor of shares should depend upon the affixing of the seal to the register, inasmuch as he has no means of compelling the company to do that act. The 27th section says, that in an action for calls it shall be sufficient to prove that the defendant was a holder of shares, and that, by section 28, may be proved by the register; but if the company prove that fact by other means, it would not be disproved by the defendant's shewing that his name was not in the register.

By section 3, the interpretation clause, it means "shareholder, proprietor, or member of the company."

Montagu Chambers and Bramwell, contra, were stopped by the Court.

PARKE, B.—The rule must be absolute. These companies seem perfectly satisfied as soon as they have obtained their act of parliament, and never trouble themselves to consult the clauses to ascertain what is required to be done by them. Now, by the 8th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, all persons who have subscribed the prescribed sum to the capital of the company, or otherwise become entitled to a share in the company, and whose name has been entered in the register of shareholders, become shareholders, which, by the interpretation clause means "shareholders, proprietors, or members" of the company. Then, by the 9th section, the company are to enter in a book to be called "The Register of Shareholders," the names of all persons entitled to shares, with the number of shares to which each is entitled, which book is to be authenticated by the seal of the company. By the 28th section, this register is made prima facie evidence of a party therein named being a shareholder in the company. It is not conclusive evidence, because it is open to a party to shew that his name has been inserted without his consent. The company, however, by the 27th section must, in actions for calls, prove that the defendant was a shareholder in the company at the time the call was made, which means a shareholder in the sense of the 8th and 9th sections. Consequently, before the company can call upon a party to pay calls, they must give him a title to his shares by putting his name on the sealed register. This certainly is so in the case of a transferee of scrip certificates of shares, and probably is so in the case of an original subscriber. It is, however, unnecessary to say more than that in the case of a transferee he is not liable for calls made before his name is entered in the sealed register. Here the defendant's name was not entered in the sealed register until after the first of the calls on which the company sue him was made, and the rule must, therefore, be absolute.

Jan. 28. } LEY v. BARLOW.

Production and Inspection of Documents—Railway Company—Subscribers' Agreement and Parliamentary Contract.

An action having been brought by an allottee of railway shares against a member of the committee of management, for the recovery of the plaintiff's deposit, it appeared on affidavit that the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract had been signed by both the plaintiff and the defendant, and was in the hands of the solicitors to the defendant and to the company; and the plaintiff's affidavit stated, that an inspection and copy thereof were necessary for the purpose of framing the plaintiff's case, and that he could not safely proceed to trial without them:—The Court thereupon made absolute a rule for liberty to the plaintiff or his attorney to inspect and take copies of those documents.

In this case, which was an action brought by an allottee of railway shares, for recovery of the amount of his deposit, a rule had been obtained calling on the defendant and Mr. Mason, his attorney, to shew cause why the plaintiff or his attorney should not be at liberty to inspect and take copies of the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement of the Grand Junction and Midlands Union Railway Company. The affidavits in support of the application stated, that the defendant had acted as one of the managing committee of the company, and had executed the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement, both as a shareholder and member of the managing committee; that the deponent believed that the deeds in question were in the possession or controul of the defendant jointly with the other directors, or of Messrs. Edwards & Mason, the attorneys for the defendant, and that the said attorneys claimed a lien on the said deeds for their charges to the company; that it would form part of the plaintiff's case that the defendant had signed the said deeds, but that deponent was unacquainted with the particulars of the contents of the said deeds, and that he was advised and believed that an inspection and copy of them were necessary for the purpose of framing the plaintiff's case, and that the plaintiff could not safely proceed in the action without such inspection and copy. The defendant's affidavits stated, that he did not consider himself a party to the deeds in any other manner than the plaintiff was a party to the same, and that up to a certain time he was not concerned in the management of the company, and that the deeds were not in his possession.

Bramwell now shewed cause.—This rule must be discharged. The cases where inspection has been granted by the Court have been where the parties have made agreements inter se.

Where there is a written agreement between two parties, and one copy only exists, the Court infers from both having an interest in it, an agreement that it shall be produced for the inspection of either party; and the Court also interferes where there is a positive stipulation that the document shall be produced. Here, the defendant did not enter into any covenant with the plaintiff, and it is therefore contended that he was not a trustee. Again, the deed does not appear to be in the defendant's possession.

[PARKE, B.—The party who has the deeds in his possession ought to shew them to the subscribers. Whoever has them is supposed to hold them for the benefit of the company. They are not the private property of anybody.]

If the deeds had been assigned, the assignee would not be bound to produce them. Again, the defendant's attorneys claim a lien on the deeds, and therefore they ought not to be compelled to grant inspection.

[ALDERSON, B.—They will still keep the deeds.]

[PARKE, B.—Hunter v. Leathley (1) shews that a broker who has effected a policy, and has a lien on it for his premiums, may be compelled by the assured to produce it on the trial of an action against the underwriters.]

It was ruled, however, by Lord Denman, C.J., that a witness might refuse to produce a document under a subpoena duces tecum, if as against the party asking its production the witness had a lien on the document which was called for—Kemp v. King (2).

[PARKE, B.—Parties who have the custody of a deed derived from the cestui que trust cannot defeat him of his right to see the deed.]

Again, the usual ground of granting an application like the present is, that the plaintiff may be able to declare. Rowe v. Howden (3) is in point. The plaintiff ought not to obtain inspection for the mere purpose of procuring evidence.

[PARKE, B.—The plaintiff wishes to see if he can frame his action correctly.]

Willes, contra, was not called upon.

June 26. } COOKE v. TURNER.*

Will—Conditional Devise—Competency.

A testator made his will duly executed so as to pass real estate, whereby he gave considerable interests in his real estate to his daughter, and, subject thereto, gave his property to her children, and in default of issue to his collateral relations; and the will contained a proviso, that if the testator's said daughter, or her husband, or any person or persons on her, or his, or their behalf, should dispute the will or his competency to make it, or should refuse to confirm the will, as far as he or she lawfully could, when required by the executors to do so, the disposition in favour of the testator's said daughter should be revoked:—Held, that this proviso was good and valid in law.

This was a CASE sent by the Vice Chancellor of England, for the opinion of this Court. It stated, in substance, that Sir G. P. Turner was duly found a lunatic in the year 1823, under a commission of lunacy. The inquisition, and the finding thereon, were traversed; but the lunacy was established by the verdict of a jury in 1826, and the commission was never superseded. In the year 1841, Sir G. P. Turner made a will, duly executed so as to pass real estate, whereby he gave certain considerable interests in his real estate to his daughter, Mrs. Fryer, and, subject thereto, gave his property to her children; and, in default of issue, to his collateral relations; and in the will was contained the following clause: "And my will further is, that if my said daughter, or her husband, or any person or persons in her, his, their, or any or either of their behalf, shall dispute this my will or my competency to make the same, or if my said daughter and her husband, or either of them, shall refuse to confirm this my will as far as he or she lawfully can, when required by my executors or either of them so to do, or if they, or either of them, or any person or persons, in the name or on behalf of them, or either of them, shall lodge any caveat against proving the same; and if my said daughter and husband, or either of them, shall refuse or neglect to withdraw or cause to be withdrawn such caveat, fourteen days after request made by my executors, or either of them, to that effect; or if any proceedings whatsoever shall at any time be had or taken by any person or persons whomsoever, by any possible result of which any estate or interest could be in any way attainable by my said daughter, or her husband, or any person or persons in her right, of this my will ; and in lieu thereof, I devise to the use of my said trustees by and out of the net rents, issues, and profits of my said real estate thenceforth, the yearly sum of 300*l.* only, during the natural life of my said daughter, by equal half-yearly payments, the said yearly sum to be paid into the proper hands of my said daughter, and not into the hands of any other person or persons whomsoever."

Sir G. P. Turner died in 1843, without having revoked or altered his will, leaving Mrs. Fryer his only child and heiress-at-law; and she had no issue. Since the death of Sir G. P. Turner, Mrs. Fryer and her husband have disputed her father's will, and his competency to dispose of his property, and have refused to do any act to confirm the will.

The question submitted for the opinion of the Court was, whether or not Mrs. Fryer had thereby forfeited the devise in her favour contained in the will.

The case was argued in the sittings after Hilary term, 1846, (Feb. 13,) by—

Peacock, for the plaintiff.—The condition which the testator has annexed to this devise, viz. that the devisee shall do nothing to contest his will or his competency to make it, is good and valid in law. There is no authority to shew that it is not; and unless the intention of the testator is clearly contrary to the policy of the law, the courts of law are bound to carry it out. There are many cases in which conditional devises have been held good and valid, which in principle do not differ from the present. In Cleaver v. Spurling (1), a freeman of London by his will gave 3*l.* to his daughter, provided that if she refuse to give a release, or put the executors to any trouble, then her legacy of 35*l.* to go over to her sister's children. The daughter claimed her orphanage part, and did not claim the 35*l.* legacy. This was held to be a forfeiture, and that the 35*l.* vested in the devisee over, the condition being good in law. In Simpson v. Tickers (2) a testatrix devised certain estates to her brother M, on condition that within six months after her decease he should execute to her executor a valid release for a legacy of 1,000*l.* bequeathed to him by her brother J, otherwise the devise to be void, and in that case she devised the said estates to T. M. M. disputed the will, and on that account neglected to give the release, and this was held to be a forfeiture, and that the limitation over took effect. There was no suggestion there that the condition was invalid. There is an anonymous case in 2 Mod. 7. as follows:—"A man devises land to A, his heir-at-law, and devises other land to B. in fee, and saith, if A. molest B. by suit or otherwise, he shall lose what is devised to him, and it shall go to B. The devisor dies; A. enters into the land devised to B, and claims it. The Court were of opinion, that this entry and claim is a sufficient breach to entitle B. to the land of A." A condition against marriage without the consent of a particular person, is valid—Williams v. Fry (3), Fry v. Porter (4), Hervoy v. Aston (5). In Acherley v. Vernon (6), a rent-charge was given to the testator's sister, in lieu and satisfaction of all claim she might have on his real or personal estate, and upon condition that she released all right and claim thereto, to his executors and trustees. The sister having lived several years without executing any release, it was held that she was not entitled to the arrears of the rent-charge. The Court there said that the release was a condition precedent, but that if it were only a condition subsequent, it ought to have been performed in a reasonable time, or, at all events, during her life.

[ROLFE, B.—Suppose, in this case, the testator had imposed an affirmative duty on the performance of which the estate should rest,—for example, if the devisee should, in six months, execute a deed confirming all the uses of the will,—why would that be invalid? Is there any difference in this respect between conditions precedent and subsequent?]

In Boughton v. Boughton (7), it was expressly decided that a legacy to an heir upon the condition that he did not litigate or dispute the will, would put him to an election between the legacy and the lands devised away, the will not being executed so as to pass real estate. In Webb v. Webb (8), a testator bequeathed to his son 40*l.*, on condition that he did not disturb the trustees; and there on the trustees applying for an execution of the trust, the son was ordered either to join in a sale of the trust estates or forfeit his legacy. The principle of these cases governs the present. There is nothing more illegal in this condition than in those which existed in the cases cited. There is nothing contrary to public policy in a man saying that if his child disputes his competency he will not give her his estate.

Martin, for the defendant.—This condition is void. From the earliest authorities to the present time there has been a clear distinction between conditions precedent and subsequent. In this case the question is, whether a condition subsequent, which has a direct tendency to induce parties to abstain from contesting the wills of insane persons, and which, if applied to the case of forgery, has a direct tendency to establish forged wills, is legal and valid. It is, in the words of Shep. Touch., "against the liberty of the law," and therefore void. The establishment of wills made by insane persons is opposed to the policy of the law; and how can an estate given to the heir be diverted from him if he inquire into the competency of the testator to make a will? The law is the same as to a conditional limitation like this, as it is with respect to conditions at common law. The Statute of Wills, 34 & 35 Hen. 8. c. 5. s. 14, declares, that wills made by persons of non-sane mind shall not be good or effectual in law; and it cannot, therefore, be a good condition which deprives the heir-at-law of the benefit the testator intends for him, if he institutes an inquiry, with the view of fulfilling the law. There is no person who has, on behalf of the public, any authority to inquire into the sanity of a testator. The condition against marriage is not the only illegal condition known to the law. A condition of this kind is represented by text-writers as generally considered in terrorem merely. In Williams on Executors, 3rd edit. p. 1099, it is said: "A condition that the legatee shall not dispute the will is in general considered in terrorem merely, and will not operate a forfeiture by reason of the legatee's having disputed the legacy or effect of the will. But where the legacy is given over to another person in case of a breach of such condition, then if the legatee controvert the will, his interest will cease and vest in the other legatee. If indeed the legacy, instead of being given to a stranger, is limited over to the executors in the event of a condition being broken, such condition is still merely regarded as in terrorem, and not obligatory. Yet if the testator direct the legacy to fall into the residue upon a breach of the condition, and dispose of that fund, the residuary legatee will be a particular legatee of the individual legacy, and as such will be entitled to it if the condition is broken. In Jarman on Wills, p. 836, and Powell on Devises, p. 295, the law is stated to the same effect. In no case however has this doctrine been applied to a devise of land. Where upon breach of such a condition, the legacy is limited over to the executors the condition is regarded as in terrorem merely and not obligatory—Cage v. Russel (9), Powell v. Morgan (10) and Morris v. Borroughs (11). In Loyd v. Spillet (12), which is strongly in favour of the same view, the legacy was to sink, on breach of the condition, into the general fund for the benefit of the party entitled to the inheritance. With respect to the cases cited on the other side, they do not bear out the argument for the plaintiff. Cleaver v. Spurling, Boughton v. Boughton, and Webb v. Webb turned entirely on the doctrine of election, which is quite inapplicable to this case. Simpson v. Vickers, and liberty of the law. This case differs from that of a condition precedent, inasmuch as here the estate is on breach of the condition to be divested from the heir-at-law after it has vested in him. An investigation into the testator's competency can do no harm, because, if competent, the will will be established; if not, it will be set aside, which is according to the policy of the law. Indeed, in some sense, it is the duty of an heir-at-law to see that the will of a non-sane testator does not take effect.

Peacock, in reply.—In the cases in equity relating to personal legacies, if there is a gift over on breach of the condition, it operates, though it may have been intended in terrorem only; and the cases cited where such a condition has not operated, are where there has been no limitation over. Then, in deciding whether this condition is void, the Court will regard the question as applicable to all wills, and will not decide with reference merely to the reasonableness of the particular provisions in this will. They will not look to the evidence of insanity of this particular testator.

If this condition be contrary to the policy of the law, a condition precluding the heir-at-law from questioning the competency of the testator to make a marriage settlement, whereby he provided for his wife and younger children, would be so too.

Cur. ado. vult.

The judgment of the Court (1) was now, in the sittings after Trinity term, 1846, delivered by—

ROLFE, B.—This was a case sent by the Vice Chancellor of England for the opinion of this Court, on the effect of a proviso contained in the will of the late Sir Gregory Page Turner. [His Lordship then stated the facts and continued]—There is no doubt that by disputing the will, and refusing to confirm it when required so to do, the devisee, Mrs. Fryer, has brought herself both in letter and in spirit within the proviso, by which her interest is made to determine—so that her interest is clearly forfeited, unless the proviso itself is void; and accordingly the argument on her behalf was that the proviso is bad, as being contrary to the policy of the law. The ground on which the argument against the proviso was made to rest was, that every heir-at-law ought to be left at liberty to contest the validity of his ancestor's will, and that any restraint artificially introduced might tend to set up the wills of insane persons, and would, in the language of the Touchstone, 132, be against the liberty of the law. We cannot, however, adopt this reasoning. There appears no more reason why a person may not be restrained by a condition from disputing sanity than from disputing any other doubtful question of fact or law, on which the title of a devisee or grantee may depend. In Stapilton v. Stapilton (2), a father being entitled to estates for ninety-nine years, if he should so long live, with remainder after his decease to his first and other sons successively in tail, and having two sons, concurred with them in an arrangement to cut off the entail, and settle the estates in equal moieties on his two sons. While the matter was in progress, and before its final completion, the elder son died, and his infant child, having filed a bill to compel a completion of the arrangement, the defendant, the second son, by his answer objected, that his eldest brother was in fact a bastard, and so he insisted that the proposed arrangement was not binding; but Lord Hardwicke held the agreement good, as a provident arrangement to prevent a dispute as to legitimacy, and to save the honour of the family, and compelled the second son to concur in all acts necessary for vesting a moiety of the property in the plaintiff. Now, a provision good by way of contract must also be valid by way of condition, and therefore it seems to us to follow as a necessary corollary from that case that, if A. having succeeded to real property as heir of his father, should devise it partly to a stranger and partly to B. his next brother, subject, as to the gift to B, to a proviso defeating his estate in case he should dispute his (A's) legitimacy, such a proviso would be perfectly good, and yet such a condition would, if we were to adopt the defendant's reasoning in this case, be void, as infringing the liberty of the law. It would prevent or tend to prevent B. from contesting A's. legitimacy, and it is surely as much against the policy of the law, that an heir should be disinherited by an illegitimate child, as by a party claiming under the will of a non compos. The same principle applies also to the case of a proviso restraining a devisee from litigating some doubtful question of law. The truth is, that in none of these cases is there any policy of the law, on the one side or the other. The conditions said to be void, as trenching on the liberty of the law, are those which restrain a party from doing some act which it is supposed the State has or may have an interest to have done. The State, from obvious causes, is interested that its subjects should marry; and therefore it will not in general allow parties, by contract or by condition in a will, to make the continuance of an estate depend on the owner not doing that which it is or may be the interest of the State that he should do. So the State is interested in having its subjects embark in trade or agriculture; and therefore will not allow a condition defeating an estate in case its owner should engage in commerce—or should plough his arable land—or the like. The principle on which such conditions are void is analogous to that on which conditions defeating an estate, unless the owner commits a crime, are void. In the latter case, the condition has a tendency to the violation of a positive duty; in the former, to prevent the performance of what partakes of the character of a duty of imperfect obligation. But in the case of a condition such as that before us, the State has no interest whatever, apart from the interest of the parties themselves. There is no duty on the part of an heir, whether, of perfect or imperfect obligation, to contest his ancestor's sanity. It matters not to the State whether the land is enjoyed by the heir or the devisee; and we conceive, therefore, that the law leaves the parties to make just what contracts and arrangements they may think expedient as to raising or not raising questions of law or fact among one another, the sole result of which is to give the enjoyment of property to one claimant rather than another. The question, whether this proviso is a proviso void, as being contrary to the policy of the law, may be well tested by considering how the case would have stood if, instead of a condition subsequent, it had been made, as in substance it might have been, a condition precedent.

(1) Parke, B., Alderson, B., Rolfe, B., and Platt, B.

Suppose the testator had said, in case my daughter and her husband shall execute all deeds necessary for settling my estates in manner hereinafter mentioned, then I give her, &c. Surely there could be no doubt of the validity of such a condition as a condition precedent, and, if so, it must be good as a condition subsequent; for where a condition is bad on grounds of public policy, it must obviously be bad, whether it be precedent or subsequent. The law will no more allow anything contrary to public policy to be made the means whereby a party shall entitle himself to an estate, than whereby he shall be made to lose that of which he is already in possession.

On these grounds, thinking that there is no question of public policy involved, and considering that the law leaves it to the parties interested in property, and to them alone, to decide for themselves what questions of law or of fact they shall insist on or abandon, we have come to the conclusion, that this proviso is good, and we shall certify accordingly to the Lord Chancellor.

Trespass for breaking and entering a coal mine or vein of coal of the plaintiffs, lying under certain closes, pieces, or parcels of land or ground named, and digging coals there. Second count, for carrying away coals.

The third plea to the first count stated, that one John Sykes, before the making of the indenture thereafter mentioned, and long before the said times when, &c. in the declaration mentioned or any of them, and long before the plaintiffs had anything in the said coal mine, or vein of coals, in which, &c., to wit, on the 27th of September 1804, was seised in his demesne as of fee of and in the said several closes, &c. respectively in the first count mentioned; and of the said coal mine or vein of coals situate, lying, and being under the said several closes, &c. in that count mentioned, and being so thereof seised, before the said times when, &c. or any of them, to wit, on, &c. by a certain indenture then made between the said J. Sykes of the one part, and Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, in the said indenture mentioned, of the other part (proft of the indenture), the said J. Sykes did, for the considerations in the said indenture in that behalf mentioned and set forth, and for settling and barring all future and other payments more than a certain sum, to wit, 420*l.*, for a certain portion of the said coals under the said closes, &c., to wit, six acres of the said coals, after the rate of 70*l.* per acre, to be paid by portions as in the said indenture mentioned, among other things, by the said indenture, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, grant to the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, administrators and assigns, for and notwithstanding anything thereinbefore or thereafter in the said indenture contained to the contrary, from and after the commencing of the digging and sinking of any pit or shaft for the sale of coals, in the said closes in the said indenture mentioned, whereof the said closes, pieces, or parcels of land or ground in the first count of the declaration mentioned are parcel, the liberty and privilege of getting, selling, winning, and working the said coals or mines in the said indenture mentioned, being all the coal mines, veins, and seams of coal of him the said J. Sykes, then lying or being within or under the said closes in the said indenture mentioned, whereof the closes, &c. in the first count mentioned are parcel, in as large, ample, and beneficial a manner to all intents and purposes whatsoever as the said J. Sykes could settle and assure the same, for any term or terms of years, computing the same from such time as they, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, administrators, or assigns should so begin to sink as aforesaid, until the said quantity of six acres of coals should be gotten; and, at the expiration of the term of twelve years, then that the said coals should be fairly measured, at the joint expense of the said parties to the said indenture; and upon such admeasurement being taken, if the full quantity of six acres of coals should not be then gotten, then that the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c. should have liberty to get the remainder of the said six acres of coals, and that when all the said quantity of six acres of the said coals should be gotten in a workmanlike manner, then that the said getting and selling the said coals should be carried on as aforesaid, until such time as all the coals in the said closes, being the said closes in the said indenture mentioned, and whereof the said closes, &c. in the first count mentioned are part and parcel, should be gotten and disposed of, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c. paying or causing to be paid to the said J. Sykes, his heirs and assigns, for every acre of coals to be gotten over and above the aforesaid quantity of six acres, the said sum of 70*l.* per acre, to be paid for by the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c. to the said J. Sykes, his heirs, &c., yearly and every year, in such proportion as the sale and consumption of the said coals should or might happen to amount to, according to admeasurement being taken thereof by the said several parties, their respective executors, &c.

The plea then set forth a covenant by J. Sykes, for quiet enjoyment by Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, of all the said coals, being the said coals lying under the said closes in the said indenture mentioned, and whereof the said closes, &c. in the first count mentioned are parcel, premises, privileges, and appurtenances whatsoever, and also full and free liberty for the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c. to fix all necessary gins or engines, and to build cabins in the said closes, and the same to remove and take away as occasion might require; and also to make roads and ways for horses, carts, and carriages, in and over the closes aforesaid, as by the said indenture, &c. will more fully and at large appear; by virtue of which said hereinbefore partly recited indenture, afterwards and long before the time of committing of any of the said trespasses in the first count mentioned, to wit, on the 1st of January 1805, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger did commence sinking and digging certain pits or shafts, to wit, three pits or shafts, for the sale of coals in the said closes, in the said hereinbefore partly recited indenture mentioned, and became entitled to the said powers, liberties, privileges, licence, and authority aforesaid, for the said term so to them thereof granted as aforesaid, according to the terms, true intent, and meaning of the aforesaid hereinbefore partly recited indenture.

Averment, that afterwards, and after the making of the said indenture, to wit, on the 1st of January 1805, the said Joseph, Matthew and James Jagger, after sinking the aforesaid pit or shafts in the said closes in the said indenture mentioned, for the sale of coals as aforesaid, and for the purpose of getting and vending of coals, did then, from the time of their sinking the said pits or shafts, proceed to get and win in a workmanlike manner the said coals under the said closes in the said indenture mentioned, until the said quantity of six acres of the said coals was won and gotten in a workmanlike manner.

The plea then averred the deaths of Joseph and Matthew Jagger, leaving James Jagger them surviving, whereupon he "became entitled to the powers, liberties, privileges, licence, and authority aforesaid, for the then residue and remainder of the said term for which the said powers, &c. were so granted as aforesaid to him and the said Joseph and Matthew Jagger, their executors, &c., according to the terms, true intent, and meaning of the aforesaid in part recited indenture, and which said term had not expired at the time of the commencement of this suit; and the said James Jagger then became and was entitled to carry on the said getting and selling coals until all the coals under the said closes, &c. in the first count mentioned should be gotten and disposed of."

The plea then alleged, that James Jagger made his will, appointing four executors, and on the 28th of April 1843 died so entitled to the said powers, liberties, privileges, &c., (using the same terms as just stated). It then stated the proving of James Jagger's will by his executors, who thereupon, as such executors, became entitled to the said powers, &c., (using the same terms as just stated,) "whereupon the defendants, as the bailiffs and servants of the said executors (named) of the said James Jagger, deceased, as aforesaid, and by their command, divers, to wit, eighteen acres of coals there then being and remaining unworked and ungotten, under the said closes in the said partly recited indenture mentioned, whereof the said closes, &c., in the first count mentioned, are part and parcel as aforesaid, at the said several times when, &c., in the first count mentioned, and during the said term for which the aforesaid powers, liberties, &c., by the said hereinbefore partly recited indenture, were granted to the said Joseph, Matthew and James Jagger, their executors, &c., and which had not expired at the time of the commencement of this suit, and in pursuance and exercise of the powers, &c., granted as aforesaid, by the said partly recited indenture, broke and entered the said coal mine, &c., in the first count mentioned, being part and parcel of the said coal mines, veins, and seams of coal lying under the said closes in the said indenture mentioned, whereof the said closes, &c. in the first count of the declaration mentioned are part and parcel, and there dug out of the said coal mine or vein of coals the said quantities of coal in the said first count mentioned, and took and carried away the same, and converted and disposed thereof to their the defendants' own use, as it was lawful for them to do for the cause aforesaid, which are the several alleged trespasses," &c. Verification.

To this plea, the plaintiffs, after craving oyer of the indenture, demurred specially, assigning for causes, inter alia, that no title to the locus in quo appeared to be vested in the executors of James Jagger under the deed in question, and that such deed was not pleaded according to its true legal effect.

By the deed, as set out on oyer at the head of the demurrer, it appeared that by indenture, dated the 27th of September 1804, between John Sykes, of the one part, and Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, of the other part, it was witnessed, that for and in consideration of the yearly rent thereafter reserved, and the covenants and agreements therein mentioned and contained on the part of the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, administrators, and assigns, to be paid and performed, he the said J. Sykes granted, bargained, sold, and confirmed unto the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, administrators and assigns, all the coal mines, veins and seams of coal of him the said J. Sykes, lying and being within or under his closes of land, belonging to the farm and tenements at Flockton Moor Head, then in the possession of the said J. Sykes, commonly called or known by the several names of, &c., (stating names of closes), together with all necessary roads and ways for horses, carts and carriages, in and over the said closes or any of them, to and from the pits or shafts to be sunk in the said closes, for the convenience of taking and carrying away the said coal, with full and free liberty to the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, administrators and assigns, at all times during the term thereby granted, to dig for, sink for, and get the same coal in a fair and workmanlike manner, in the said closes, or any of them, together with a sufficient ground-room or bank-room in the said closes, near the said pits, to lay all such coals as should from time to time be gotten, and full and free liberty to sell and dispose of such coals, and for the purchasers thereof to carry away the same with horses, carts, carriages or otherwise, as they the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., should think best, by and along the roads which might be most conveniently made for that purpose, and full and free liberty for the lessees, their executors, &c., for the getting, selling, and carrying away the said coals, and clearing the same of and from all water, gravel, damp, or other inconveniences, which might obstruct or hinder the winning or working of the said colliery, they, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, administrators and assigns, from time to time, doing as little damage as might be to the owner or occupiers of the said lands and premises; and that, by the said indenture, it was further witnessed, that for and in consideration of the sum of 420*l.*, by the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, some or one of them, paid to the said J. Sykes in manner following, that is to say, the sum of 35*l.* on or before the 2nd of February 1805, and the further sum of 35*l.* on or before the 2nd of February thence next following, and so, successively, every 2nd day of February in every year, until the full end and term of twelve years, commencing from the 2nd day in February next ensuing the day of the date thereof, although the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger had thereby covenanted to pay to the said J. Sykes, his heirs or assigns, the sum of 420*l.* by yearly portions, as aforesaid, yet they, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., or any of them, should have liberty or privilege of sinking a pit or pits on the said closes, or any part thereof, for the use and benefit of getting and selling of coals at any time or times thereafter, during the terms thereinbefore granted, for getting and vending of coals as aforesaid, at their will and pleasure, and to suit the convenience of them, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., and for settling and barring all future and other payments more than the said sum of 420*l.*, for six acres of coals, after the said rate of 20*l.* per acre, to be paid by portions as aforesaid, the said J. Sykes did, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, thereby grant, agree, and covenant to and with the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, administrators, and assigns, that for and notwithstanding anything thereinbefore or after contained to the contrary, they, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., from and after the commencing of digging or sinking any pit or shaft, for sale of coal, in the said closes, should have and enjoy the liberty and privilege of getting, selling, winning, and working of the said coals or mines, in as large, ample, and beneficial manner to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as the said John Sykes could settle and assure the same, for any time or term of years, computing the same from such time as the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., should so begin to sink as aforesaid, until the quantity of six acres of coal should be gotten, and at the expiration of the term of twelve years, then to be fairly measured at the joint expense of the said parties, and upon such admeasurement being taken, the full quantity of six acres of coals being not then gotten, to have liberty to get the remainder as aforesaid, and when all the coals were gotten in a workmanlike manner to the quantity of six acres, then the said business of getting and selling coals to be carried on as aforesaid, until such time as all the coals in the said closes be gotten and disposed of by the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., paying or causing to be paid to the said J. Sykes, his heirs and assigns, for every acre of coals, to be gotten over and above the aforesaid quantity of six acres, the said sum of 70*l.* per acre, to be paid for by the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., to the said J. Sykes, his heirs and assigns, yearly and every year, in such proportions as the sale and consumption of the said coals should or might happen to amount to, according to admeasurement being taken thereof by the said several parties, their respective executors, &c.; and that the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., should have full and free liberty and privilege of getting stones in some convenient part of the said closes, at any time or times, of getting and vending of the said coals, for the use of making and repairing roads, for the use and benefit of carrying away the said coals when gotten, making such satisfaction for the same to the said J. Sykes, his heirs or assigns, as they were then sold for per yard; to have and to hold all and singular the before-mentioned to be thereby granted coals, premises, and privileges, unto the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., from the 2nd day of February then next ensuing, for and during the term of twelve years thence next ensuing, and fully to be complete and ended: yielding and paying therefore to the said J. Sykes, his heirs, &c., the said yearly rent of 35*l.*, at the times and in manner thereinbefore specified; provided always, and upon condition, that if the said yearly rent, or any part thereof, should at any time or times be in arrear and unpaid by the space of thirty days next after any day or time whereat or whereon the same ought to be paid as aforesaid, although not demanded, then and from thenceforth those presents should be absolutely void in case the said J. Sykes, his heirs or assigns, should at any time afterwards choose the same to be void, but not otherwise. And the said J. Sykes did for himself, his heirs, &c. thereby grant, agree and covenant to and with the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., that, under payment of the rents and performance of the covenants, conditions, provisoes, and agreements in these presents specified, or mentioned to be by the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c. paid and performed respectively, they, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c. should and lawfully might, peaceably and quietly, without any eviction, ejectment, suit, let, or disturbance, of, from, or by the said J. Sykes, his heirs, &c., have, hold, occupy, and enjoy all the said coals, premises, privileges, and appurtenances whatsoever, and also full and free liberty for the said lessees, their executors, &c., to fix all necessary gins or engines, and build cabins in the said closes, and the same to remove and take away as occasion might require; and also to make roads and ways for horses, carts, and carriages, in and over the said closes aforesaid; and the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger did, and every of them did, jointly and severally for himself and themselves, their respective executors, &c., thereby grant, agree, and covenant to and with the said J. Sykes, his heirs and assigns, that they, the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c., should and would in every year, during the said term of twelve years, well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said J. Sykes, his heirs, &c., the clear yearly rent above thereby reserved, and every part thereof, at the times and in the manner thereinbefore appointed for payment of the same respectively, and should and would pay, bear, and discharge all taxes, lays, assessments, and impositions whatsoever, which should or might be taxed, layed, assessed, or imposed upon, or become due or payable out of, for, or in respect of the said intended colliery, whether parliamentary or otherwise, and should, whenever any of the said intended pits or shafts ceased to be used, other than one pit or shaft, which it was agreed should be from time to time left open for air or vent during the said term, at their respective costs and charges, sufficiently fence about all such pits as should be kept open for air or any other necessary use, to prevent men and cattle from falling therein; and also should and would, at the end or other sooner determination of the term thereby granted, make the ground to be used as and for roads for carrying off the said coals, only levelling the same; and should and would, at the expiration of the getting of the coals aforesaid, yield up and leave or cause to be yielded up and left, the possession of the said granted premises, and every part thereof, peaceably and quietly, in such repair as aforesaid, unto the said J. Sykes, his heirs or assigns; and that the said J. Sykes, his heirs or assigns, or any of them, or any other person or persons whatsoever, by his, their, or any of their order, should or might, at any time or times thereafter during the said term, come and go into, upon, and from the said hereby granted coal mines and premises, or any part thereof, to view the same without let or disturbance; and that the said J. Sykes, his heirs, &c., should not nor would, at any time or times during the term of getting the said coals in the said closes, suffer or cause to be suffered or made, any road or roads, drain, or drains, in the said closes of land, for the use and benefit of any other person or persons other than the said Joseph, Matthew, and James Jagger, their executors, &c. In witness whereof, &c. (executed by all the parties).

The fourth plea (also to the first count) stated, that J. Sykes, being seised in fee, &c. for a pecuniary consideration demised the mines to the former grantees for one year, under which demise those persons entered and became possessed, &c. It then set out (with profert) the indenture of the 27th of September 1804, and on which the former plea was founded; but in this plea the deed was described as a grant and release of the mines to the grantees, their executors, &c., to hold to them, &c. till six acres of coal should be gotten, and after that all the coal should be gotten and disposed of. In other respects the fourth plea resembled the third.

The plaintiffs' replication, after craving oyer and setting out the indenture as before, traversed both the alleged demise for a year and the alleged grant and release, concluding to the country.

The defendants demurred to this replication for duplicity, &c. and the plaintiffs joined in demurrer; but the grounds of demurrer to this replication need not be stated further, as they were not discussed in the argument, the plaintiffs contending that the fourth plea was bad upon general demurrer, and the judgment of the Court proceeded upon the question of the sufficiency of the pleas only.

The case was argued in last Michaelmas term, (Nov. 16th and 18th) by—

Atherton, in support of the demurrer to the third plea.—In the third plea the defendants justify under the executors of James Jagger, who is the survivor of the three lessees in the deed which is set out on oyer; and they set up as the legal effect of the deed a right (after six acres of coal shall be gotten) in the lessees, and their personal representatives, to get coal under particular closes, until such time as all the coals in the said closes should be gotten: this, however, is not the legal effect of the deed. With the exception of one solitary passage, beginning with the words, "And when all the coals are gotten in a workmanlike manner to the quantity of six acres, then the said business of selling and getting coals," &c., the whole deed is framed as a "lease" of the coal under the closes, for twelve years, with "liberty" of getting coal at any time, even after the twelve years, until six acres shall have been gotten. The effect of that particular passage is, that after the getting of the coals to the quantity of six acres, the business of getting and selling coals should be carried on until all the coal under the closes should be gotten and disposed of, the lessees and their executors, &c., paying a proportional yearly rent. The habendum which follows this part of the deed clearly defines a term of twelve years as the limit of the interest conveyed. Now the office of an habendum is to "limit the certainty of the estate"—1 Inst. 6 a; and it is, therefore, not clear that any estate subsisted after that period, or more than a contract for an interest. Assuming the intention to be clear, still no estate could pass to endure after the death of the surviving lessee. Whether there was a grant of the mines, or only of a liberty to dig for coal, in each case words of inheritance were equally necessary. Beyond the twelve years, no more than a liberty to dig for coal could have passed. (Upon this point Lord Mounjoy's case (1), Chetham v. Williamson (2), Doe d. Hanley v. Wood (3), and Jones v. Reynolds (4), were mentioned.) It is true that the one interest would be a corporeal and the other an incorporeal hereditament, yet either would be a tenement—1 Inst. 6 a, and 1 Inst. 19 b, 20 a. To hold till all the coals should be gotten is necessarily for an uncertain period. That makes the interest a freehold, but a freehold interest in lands or tenements without (in a deed) words of inheritance is but an estate for life, though terms indicating perpetuity may be used—Littleton, s. 1. The fourth plea, putting aside the replication, is bad on general demurrer. It describes the deed as a release, which the language of the deed itself as set out on over negatives; it equally fails to set out the true legal effect of the deed, at the utmost a grant for the lives of the grantees.

Cowling, contra.—There is no doubt this deed is a very inartificial instrument. The argument for the plaintiffs goes to shew that, to a great extent, the deed is inoperative, because there could not be a freehold legally conveyed, beginning at the end of the twelve years, nor on the 2nd of February, 1805, inasmuch as there had been no inrolment of the deed; so that it would be reduced to a lease for twelve years. It really amounts to a lease for twelve years certain, and for as much longer as requisite to win the whole of the mines then working in a workmanlike manner; and as it is a deed, and made for a sufficient pecuniary consideration, it operated under the Statute of Uses as a bargain and sale of a chattel interest, and inrolment was unnecessary. That it was intended that all the coals should be got under it, appears from several expressions in it, as, "the said business of getting and selling coals to be carried on as aforesaid, until such time as all the coals in the said closes be gotten and disposed of," &c. The interest which is contended for might be created by will, and is a mere chattel interest—Doe d. White v. Simpson (5), Note 7 by Hargrave & Butler to Co. Litt. 42, a. In Rosse's case (6), it seems to have been taken for granted that a man levying a fine to the use of himself for life, remainder to executors, until they shall have levied 300*l.* for performance of his will, creates an interest lasting until that sum has been duly raised. No technical words are necessary to carry out the intention, provided the Court can see an intention in the mind of the lessor to convey to, that is, to bargain and sell to the use of the lessees, their executors, &c. The reservation of rent is a sufficient pecuniary consideration to support the deed as a bargain and sale—2 Sanders on Uses, pp. 47, 49, 4th edit. Those cases in which uncertain interests have been held not to be chattel interests are distinguishable. If lands be given to a man so long as a tree stands, a freehold interest is conveyed, because a man may have a freehold interest in the tree itself. So, where lands are given until A. makes J. S. bailiff of his manor, as in Co. Litt. 42, a. note 6, Hargrave & Butler's edit.; because A. has all his life in which to appoint. But there seems no more reason for holding the interest in the present case to be freehold, than would apply for holding a conveyance till certain debts are paid to be a freehold. If the mines are duly worked, they must be won within a limited period.

[ALDERSON, B.—Has it not been held that though such a construction may be put on wills, it will not hold with respect to deeds?]

Cordal's case (7) is the only authority to that effect; but the first resolution there appears to point to deeds operating at common law, and not by way of use; and there is no reason why there should in this respect be any difference between deeds operating by way of lease and will.

(5) 5 East, 162.
 (6) Moor, 556.
 (7) Cro. Eliz. 316.

[ROLFE, B.—That explanation of the resolution in Cordal's case certainly receives some confirmation from what is said in Manning's case (8).]

Atherton, in reply.—The defendants cannot contend for the operation of the deed, as a bargain and sale, under the Statute of Uses, for they have not pleaded an election that it should so operate—Miller v. Green (9). The right to get all the unsevered coal is a real and not a chattel interest.

PARKE, B.—[His Lordship stated the pleadings, and continued]—The questions in this case arise upon the special demurrer to the third, and the demurrer to the replication to the fourth plea. The replication being bad for duplicity, the plaintiff contends that the fourth plea is bad on general demurrer. The substantial question on both is as to the legal effect of the deed set out on oyer, and relied upon as a defence in both pleas. This deed is most inartificially drawn. It appears to us, however, to operate as a lease of the mines to the Jagers and their executors, for twelve years, from the 2nd of February 1805, at all events. Whether the deed, as to the subsequent right to get coals, is more than a covenant to grant for a subsequent term, is a question; but we think it operates as a grant of an easement, after the expiration of that lease, to win the remainder of the six acres paid for by the sum of 420*l.*; and whenever that quantity should be got, to win the remainder, paying 70*l.* an acre. The lease for twelve years is good at common law. The limitation for the indefinite term afterwards, of the incorporeal hereditament only, which is to continue for an uncertain period, viz. till all the coals are got, would in a common law conveyance be either an estate for life, in which case it terminated on the death of the survivor of the grantees; or an estate for term of years, and if so, it would be void for want of the certainty of years. As a common law conveyance, therefore, it would afford no defence. But according to the authorities cited by Mr. Cowling, viz. Co. Litt. 42, Hale's MSS., Rosse's case, these words would convey that interest only in a conveyance to uses or a will, and would, therefore, devolve on the executor of the surviving lessee; and so there would be a defence to this action. But the defendants' pleadings are open to the objection, that there is no averment that the lessees elected to take the interest by way of use; and this is necessary, on the authority of Sir Rowland Heyward's case (11), and Miller v. Green; otherwise it must be taken to operate at common law. It appears, indeed, on the pleas, that the lessees entered and got the coals, and this would be an entry under the lease for twelve years; and if so, it would probably be a conclusive election that the whole deed should operate at common law—Sheppard's Touchstone, 83. We think, therefore, that the pleas are bad. Mr. Cowling should amend on the usual terms, and plead the deed as operating by the Statute of Uses, and state its legal effect, which is done in neither of the present pleas; and on that account, the third at least is bad, the objection being pointed out on special demurrer.

1848. } THOMPSON v. THE UNIVERSAL
Jan. 24. } SALVAGE COMPANY.

Joint-Stock Company—Registration Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. s. 45.—Promissory Note—Pleading—Declaration.

A declaration stated that the company was a joint-stock company completely registered; that one S. P. and one C. L., then being two of the directors of the company, made their promissory note, and thereby promised, on behalf of the said company, to pay the plaintiff or his order 32l. 4s. 9d., the balance of his account due from the company, three months after date, which note was signed by the said S. P. and C. L., and made by them, and in their names, and on behalf of the said company, and was expressed by them to be made on behalf of the said company, and countersigned by the secretary of the company; and thereupon the defendants, in consideration of the premises, then promised the plaintiff to pay him the amount of the said promissory note:—Held, on general demurrer, that the declaration was bad.

The declaration stated that the company was a joint-stock company, completely registered by the name of the Universal Salvage Company, and had obtained a certificate of complete registration according to the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; that on the 24th of June 1847, one Samuel Price and Christopher Lund, then being two of the directors of the said company, made their promissory note, and thereby promised, on behalf of the said company, to pay the plaintiff or his order 32l. 4s. 9d., the balance of his, the said plaintiff's, account, due from the said company, three months after date, which said note was then signed by the said S. Price and C. Lund, and was then made by them and in their names, and on behalf of the said company, and then was and is expressed by them to be made on behalf of the said company, and was then countersigned by the secretary of the said company; and thereupon the defendants, to wit, on &c., in consideration of the premises, then promised the plaintiff to pay him the amount of the said promissory note, according to the tenour and effect thereof.

The defendants' points for argument, amongst others, were, that it was not averred that the promise of the company was by virtue of any statute; that it ought to have been averred that the company made their note, and not that Price and Lund made their note which the company promised to pay; that if the note were properly described as the note of Price and Lund, then in order to make the company liable to pay such note, it ought clearly to appear that it was a note made according to the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; that the persons who made it had authority to bind the company by such note; and that it was not shewn that there was a deed of settlement by which the company were authorized to make promissory notes.

M. Smith, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is bad on several grounds. First, it does not appear that the note in question is the note of the company.

[PARKE, B.—It does not appear that the company were authorized by their deed of settlement to make notes. Again, the plaintiff might have said that the company made the note.]

The 45th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.

(1) requires them to set out the terms in pursuance of which the note was made. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

Swann, contra.—The declaration is sufficient. If the note is correct in point of form, it is binding on the company, although the party making it had no authority from them. The 45th section states the mode of making bills of exchange, and requires that they shall be made in the names of two of the directors of the company, and shall be by them expressed to be made on behalf of such company. All these requisites have been complied with.

[PARKE, B.—Your argument is, that although the directors were not authorized by the deed of settlement to issue bills of exchange, yet if they do issue them in the form prescribed by the statute, the company will be bound. Surely that position is untenable.]

This question arises on general demurrer.

[PARKE, B.—The objection is one of substance.]

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The declaration shews no authority, and we cannot infer it.]

Again, admitting the directors had no authority to draw bills of exchange, still a good consideration for making it may appear on the face of the declaration; for the averment is, that two persons were directors and made the note, and that the consideration was the balance due from the company.

PARKE, B.—There is no averment of a balance being due; there is only a promise to pay a balance without an averment of there being one. The plaintiff may have a month's time to amend; and if he do not amend, there will be judgment for the defendants.

POLLOCK, C.B., ALDERSON, B. and PLATT, B. concurred.

This was an action of covenant upon an indenture of lease, to which the defendant pleaded non est factum, and other pleas.

The cause was tried, by Williams, J., at the Somersetshire Summer Assizes, 1847, when it appeared that the action was brought to recover damages in respect of the alleged non-fulfilment of certain covenants in an indenture of lease between the plaintiff and the defendant. The defendant had long resided at Rome, but had considerable estates in this country, which were managed by his directors of the company be authorized by deed of settlement or bye-law to issue or accept bills of exchange or promissory notes, then every such bill of exchange or promissory note shall be made or accepted (as the case may be) by and in the names of two of the directors of the company, on whose behalf or account the same may be so made or accepted, and shall be by such directors expressed to be made or accepted by them on behalf of such company; and that every such bill of exchange and promissory note so made or accepted as aforesaid, shall be countersigned by the secretary or other appointed officer of the company, in whose behalf the same is expressed to be made or accepted."

son, F. W. Knight, under a power of attorney, under seal, granted to him for that purpose by the defendant, and under the authority of which he had signed the lease in question. Notice to produce the power of attorney had been given to the defendant; and a subpœna duces tecum to produce it had been served on the son, who was a witness at the trial, but not in time. The defendant was aware of the lease having been granted and had approved of it; and he had on one occasion authorized a distress for rent under it. Secondary evidence of the power of attorney was admitted by the learned Judge; and a verdict was found by consent for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit if the evidence ought not to have been received.

Crowder, in Michaelmas term, having obtained a rule accordingly,—

Kinglake, Serj. now shewed cause.—No subpœna duces tecum to produce the power of attorney was necessary.

[PLATT, B.—What right had you to read a copy of the document?]

[ROLFE, B.—What was there to let in the secondary evidence?]

It was receivable under the notice to produce, for there was enough to shew it was in the custody of the defendant. That would be the proper custody for it, because it might be necessary for him to prove that he granted the lease, and therefore necessary for him to have the power of attorney in his possession.

[ROLFE, B.—On the contrary, the lessor is the most unlikely party to have it: it would rather be in the hands of the owner.]

[ALDERSON, B.—The proper custody is either the attorney or the lessee.]

The notice is to the party who may be assumed to have it; moreover, there was evidence which amounted to an admission.

[PARKE, B.—There was no admission under seal.]

[ALDERSON, B.—You have consented to a nonsuit if the evidence was improperly received.]

Crowder, in support of the rule, was not called on.

PARKE, B.—This rule must be made absolute. This deed (the power of attorney) is the deed of the attorney to whom it was given, and who is to keep it for his own protection, that he may be able to shew he had authority to do what he had done under it. The witness should have been duly served with the subpœna duces tecum, when, if he had not produced the deed, he might have been punished. The case of Marston v. Downes (1) is often referred to. In that case a witness, who was an attorney, refused to produce a mortgage-deed, because it was the title-deed of his client. He was then asked the contents of it, which he willingly stated. My Brother Ludlow objected to that evidence, not on the ground that the attorney was privileged, and need not state the contents of the deed, nor that the evidence could not be obtained from the attorney, but that secondary evidence of the deed was inadmissible, inasmuch as the deed itself was in existence. My Brother Paterson held, that you might give secondary evidence, because the party was at liberty to withhold his title-deeds; and that if the attorney did not insist on his privilege and disclosed the contents of the deed, his evidence was receivable. Explained in that way, the case is rightly decided. If the document is a title-deed, which a man is not bound to produce upon a subpœna duces tecum, you cannot punish him for not producing it; but inasmuch as you have done all in your power to get the original, you may give secondary evidence of its contents—Ditcher v. Kenrick (2) and Doe d. Gilbert v. Ross (3) are authorities for this.

ALDERSON, B.—There was a case to the same effect in the Court of Common Pleas, when I was in that court. From the report of Marston v. Downes it would seem as if the attorney was compelled against his will to state the contents of his client's deed; whereas the real decision in that case was, that if he willingly does so the Court will receive his evidence, not that he would be punished for refusing.

ROLFE, B. and PLATT, B. concurred.

Jan. 29. }

Pleading—Several Pleas—Auditâ Querelâ—4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. s. 4.

A proceeding by auditâ querelâ is an "action or suit," within 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. s. 4, and a defendant may plead several pleas thereto.

In this case, Rolfe, B. having made an order, allowing the defendants in auditâ querelâ to plead several matters, a rule had been obtained, calling upon the defendants to shew cause why that order should not be rescinded.

Peacock shewed cause.—The order is right. The case of auditâ querelâ is within the statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. s. 4; and the defendants are at liberty, with the leave of the Court, to plead several pleas. That section enacts, that "it shall and may be lawful for any defendant or tenant in any action or suit, or for any plaintiff in replevin in any court of record, with the leave of the same Court, to plead as many several matters thereto as he shall think necessary for his defence." The cases on the subject are collected in Turner v. Davies (1). An auditâ querelâ is an equitable action in the nature of a trespass—2 Hen. 4. 17 b., Bro. Abr. tit. 'Damages,' p. 38, 'Executors,' p. 42. It is in the nature of a bill in equity—3 Black. Com. p. 405. Oguel v. Randol (2) is to the same effect. In Malyns v. Hawkins (3) it was held, that the writ abated by the death of the defendant. If a plaintiff be nonsuited he shall have a new writ—Vin. Abr. tit. 'Auditâ querelâ,' L. Fitz. N.B. 204. All these cases shew that an auditâ querelâ is an "action or suit" within the statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. s. 4. The process of auditâ querelâ is in the nature of a writ of scire facias; and it is to be inferred, from the language of the Judges, in Leake v. Dawes (4), that it is not to be looked upon with so strict an eye as other actions. Auditâ querelâ is, in fact, the converse of the scire facias: the object of the one proceeding is to relieve a party from a judgment; of the other, to give effect to a judgment. A scire facias is considered in law as an original action—Underhill v. Devereux (5). The seventh section of the statute of Anne points out to what cases the statute does not apply. It does not apply, for instance, to a writ of mandamus or quo warranto, because, in those cases, the King is the party. Shaw v. Lord Alvanley (6) was the case of an application to the Court for leave to plead several matters to a scire facias. In Nathan v. Giles (7) several pleas were pleaded in auditâ querelâ.

G. Pollock, in support of the rule.—The case of Nathan v. Giles is not an authority in favour of the defendants, as the question of pleading several pleas was not the subject of discussion in that case. It may be admitted that a proceeding by scire facias is an "action or suit" within the statute of Anne, taking those words in their most extensive sense; but that statute is to have a reasonable construction, and is not to extend to every legal proceeding. A defendant in auditâ querelâ is in reality a plaintiff, and the effect of giving him two pleas would be to give him two replications.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There is much strength in Mr. Peacock's argument that a scire facias and an auditâ querelâ are correlative.]

The judgment of Wightman, J., in Phillipson v. Tempest (8), shews the position to have been too broadly laid down, that several pleas are to be allowed in scire facias. A declaration in auditâ querelâ ought to comprehend only one complaint—Com. Dig. tit. 'Auditâ Querelâ,' E. 6.—He referred to 2 Sell. Pract. p. 257, and Fitzh. Nat. Brev. p. 204.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This rule must be discharged, but without costs. The question turns upon the words of the statute of Anne, which enacts, that the defendant in any "action or suit" may plead several matters; and the point is, whether a proceeding by auditâ querelâ is an "action or suit." I think it is as much an action or suit as a proceeding by scire facias. The language of the learned Judge, in Phillipson v. Tempest, shews that the doubts that he at first entertained were afterwards removed. Many modern cases shew that more pleas than one have frequently been allowed in scire facias. The case of Nathan v. Giles, which was the case of an auditi quereld, was the subject of much consideration in Westminster Hall at the time of its decision, and is a direct authority as to the practice.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The practice of pleading double is extremely convenient; and there is no decision which prevents us from holding that the general rule does not apply to this case.

ALDERSON, B.—The writ shows that it was sued out by the plaintiff against the defendants; that brings the case within the very words of the statute.

PLATT, B.—The words of the statute are exceedingly plain. The proceeding by scire facias has been held, in many cases, to be within the act, although not mentioned nominatim; and the same rule applies to auditi quereld.

Patent; Infringement of—Specification—Hot Boxes—Rollers—Hosiery.

In an action for the infringement of a patent, the plaintiff's specification alleged that the invention was described by a statement and a drawing annexed, and stated that it consisted in submitting hosiery and similar goods to the finishing process of a press heated by steam, hot water, or other fluid in the manner thereafter described. The drawing was then described, from which it appeared that the invention consisted of two cast-iron boxes filled with steam, between the heated surfaces of which hosiery goods were introduced and subjected to pressure produced by hydraulic power. The pressure generally lasted three minutes, and might be produced either by a screw or by hydraulic power. The specification then stated that the patentee was aware that woollen cloths had been pressed by boxes or surfaces heated by steam or water, and that stockings, &c. had been placed between plates of iron heated by fires or ovens; that he did not therefore claim the finishing of such goods by heat generally, but what he did claim was the submitting of hosiery, &c. to the pressure of hot boxes or surfaces heated by steam, water or other fluid as above described. The defendant's machine consisted of rollers heated by steam, between which woollen fabrics similar to those of the plaintiff were introduced and subjected to pressure. The jury found that the defendant's rollers were not a colourable imitation of the plaintiff's patent.—Held, that the defendant had not been guilty of an infringement of the plaintiff's patent.

This was an action on the case brought by the plaintiff as the assignee of a patent against the defendant for the infringement thereof. The action was brought by order of the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce.

The declaration stated that one William Bates was the first inventor of certain improvements in the process of finishing hosiery and other goods manufactured from lambs' wool, angola, and worsted yarn. It then set forth the letters patent and the specification, the latter of which was in these terms:—"Now know ye, that in compliance with the said proviso, I, the said William Bates, do hereby declare that the nature of my said invention and the manner in which the same is to be performed are fully described and ascertained in and by the following statement thereof, reference being had to the drawing hereunto annexed, and to the figures and letters marked thereon; (that is to say), my invention consists in submitting hosiery and similar goods made of elastic stocking fabric, and known by the names of lambs' wool, worsted and angola, to the finishing process of a press heated by steam, hot water, or other fluid in the manner hereinafter mentioned, whereby the surface is laid smooth, and the colour brightened, and has a far superior finish to the ironing or other process to which such goods have heretofore been submitted.

"Description of the drawing:—drawing marked figure 1, is the plan of a cast-iron frame i, through which passes the steam-pipe c, and the rammer of the hydraulic press; ff are iron columns for supporting the steam-box a. Figure 2, plan of the steam-box b, shewing the surface on which the goods are placed, for the purpose of pressing them. Figure 3, a, is the section of a box of cast iron, filled with steam from a pipe c, connected with a boiler; b is a similar box, filled with steam from pipe d, which works into a stuffing-box e, rendered steam-tight by packing, and communicating with a branch pipe from c, thus allowing the lower box b to fall for the introduction of goods between the two heated surfaces; ff are iron columns, firmly fixed to the under side of the steam box a, for the support of the same; n is the rammer of the press, secured to the under side of the steam box b; gg are taps to try the state of the steam. Figure 4, hydraulic pump; a, pipe of communication. Any number of steam boxes may be attached as may be found convenient to be worked by the same pump. The machine may be worked either by hydraulic power or by a screw. Having thus described the description of the press I prefer for the purpose of my invention, I would remark that it will be evident that in place of the pressure being obtained by hydraulic means, the hot boxes may be pressed together, with the goods between them, by a screw or screws, or by other well-known means, and in place of steam, hot water or other fluid may be caused to circulate in such boxes; and it will be desirable further to remark, that I use steam of twelve pounds pressure on the square inch. I will now proceed to describe the process of applying the hot boxes to the purposes of my invention, and I will explain the same as being performed on stockings. The only difference in applying the process to other goods made of a like description of fabric consists in the shape or form put into the goods. Supposing the process is to be performed on lambs' wool, or on worsted stockings, I place each (inside out and in a dry state) on a leg or shape of wood, or other suitable material, about a quarter of an inch thick; a number of stockings thus prepared are placed between the hot boxes in a single layer. I then cause the boxes to press the same between them for some minutes: three minutes will generally be found sufficient. If angola goods are to be submitted to the hot-pressing process, they are to be put on to the legs or shapes in a damp state; in other respects, the process is the same as that above described for lambs' wool and worsted. Having thus described the nature of my invention, and the manner of performing the same, I would remark that I am aware that cloths made of wool, but woven with the warp and weft, have been heretofore pressed by boxes or surfaces heated by steam or water; and I am also aware that stockings and other goods made of a similar elastic or looped fabric have been placed between plates of iron, heated by fires or ovens. I do not, therefore, claim the finishing of such goods by heat generally; but what I do claim is the submitting of hosiery and similar goods, made of elastic stocking fabric, to the pressure of hot boxes, or surfaces heated by steam, water, or other fluid, as above described."

The declaration then stated the assignment of the said letters patent to the plaintiff, the use of the invention by the defendant against the will of the plaintiff, and the imitation of the invention in breach of the said letters patent.

The defendant pleaded, with other pleas, first, not guilty; secondly, that W. Bates was not the first inventor; thirdly, that the invention was not new; fourthly, that it was not a new manufacture.

At the trial, before Pollock, C.B., at the London Sittings, after Hilary term, 1847, the following facts were proved:—The plaintiff's invention consisted of a mode of submitting hosiery and similar goods made of elastic cotton fabric to the finishing process of a press worked either by a screw or hydraulic power. The machine consisted of two cast-iron boxes filled with steam, between the heated surfaces of which the goods were introduced and subjected to pressure. The machine used by the defendant, and which was complained of as being an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, consisted of a set of rollers heated by steam, and furnished with pipes and cocks to allow the circulation of the steam therein. Woollen fabrics similar to those of the plaintiff were subjected to pressure by the action of these rollers. Under these circumstances, it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendant had been guilty of an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, inasmuch as the specification included the rollers used by the defendant. The learned Judge considered that no infringement of the patent had taken place; and the jury, being of opinion that the defendant's rollers were not a colourable imitation of the plaintiff's patent, returned a verdict for the defendant on the issue raised on not guilty, and for the plaintiff on the other issues.

Whitehurst having in Easter term obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection,—

Sir F. Thesiger, Mellor and J. A. Russell shewed cause.—The view taken by the learned Chief Baron was correct, for the plaintiff's specification does not include rollers heated with steam; it applies merely to a dead pressure.

[ALDERSON, B.—The specification states that a number of stockings are placed between hot boxes in a single layer, and that the inventor then causes the boxes to press the same between them for some minutes, generally for three minutes. That describes a pressure applied to every portion of the stocking at the same time. The question then is, whether a roller applying to one part only of the stocking is the same thing as the plaintiff's patent.]

The drawing is to be taken as forming part of the specification—Bloxam v. Elsee (1); and then it appears clearly that the inventor contemplated continuous pressure merely, and that moveable rollers never entered into his consideration. They cited Stead v. Anderson (2), Neilson v. Harford (3), Stead v. Williams (4), and Heath v. Unwin (5).—(They were then stopped by the Court.)

Whitehurst, Humfrey and Mellor, in support of the rule.—The defendant was guilty of infringing the plaintiff's patent. The invention is stated in the specification to consist in submitting hosiery "to the finishing process of a press, heated by steam, hot water, or other fluid, in the manner hereinafter mentioned." The words "hereinafter mentioned" refer to the heating only. The specification does not indicate a press of any particular kind, but a press generally, and these rollers form a press. The intention of the patentee was to submit certain goods to heated surfaces, and the specification says nothing about continuous pressure; neither is any mention made of the exact duration of the pressure.

[ALDERSON, B.—Surely the patent is taken out for a continuous pressure.]

The patent was not intended to apply to boxes merely, but to all surfaces; and the word "box" is used because it will apply to every description of vessel capable of containing a heated fluid.

[ALDERSON, B. mentioned Branton v. Hawkes (6) and Crane v. Price (7).]

They then cited Derosne v. Fairie (8).

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think this rule must be discharged. The real question arises upon the meaning of the specification, whether it includes a pressure by rollers filled with steam. In my opinion cylinders were not dreamt of by the inventor in this case, and certainly were not used by him. There has been a discovery in this case, and the cylinder has been subsequently adopted; but if we were to hold that cylinders were within this patent, the patentee might perhaps enjoy his exclusive right for fourteen years, and the public would remain in ignorance that cylinders could be employed for the same purpose. The question is whether cylinders are included or contemplated in this specification. The specification at first states in general language the effect of the patent, giving but little information; but it afterwards proceeds to a more particular description of the machine, and it then states the invention to consist in placing stockings between hot boxes in a single layer, and then causing the boxes to press the same between them for about three minutes. The patentee then goes on to observe, that there exists an invention not altogether unlike it, but that what he claims is the submitting of hosiery and other articles to the pressure of hot boxes or surfaces, heated by steam, hot water or other fluid, as above described. The meaning of that is, that the surface is the operative part, not that the box produces the effect. The patentee then says, "I do not, therefore, claim the finishing of such goods by heat generally." He mentions various modes, but does not suggest that cylinders are capable of being used. The drawing exhibited shews an hydraulic press pressing upward a box filled with steam or hot water, and the object is to subject the articles placed between these hot boxes to a continuous and not to a variable pressure. I think, therefore, that the word "boxes" in this specification, explained as it is by the print annexed, does not include cylinders. The case might have been that the cylinder was obviously within the description, so that the jury could have said that the patent had been infringed by the defendant; but that was not the case here, for the jury found that the invention was not colourable; and I must say I am satisfied with their verdict.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant's counsel contends that the plaintiff claims every mode of applying heated surfaces to hosiery fabrics: that, however, is not the meaning of the specification. The true construction of the specification is not that the plaintiff claims to apply every species of surface to the pressure of the articles, but that he claims a particular machine only. [His Lordship read the specification.]—That instrument describes a sort of press, consisting of boxes. The inventor then disclaims the finishing of goods by processes that he enumerates, and states that he claims the submitting of hosiery goods "to the pressure of hot boxes, or surfaces heated by steam, water or other fluid, as above described," that is, by the same machine that he had previously described. He claims for that machine only. If, indeed, the infringement had consisted in the mere alteration of the shape of the box, the same results following, that would have been piracy. If, for instance, the boxes had been half globes, then although not exactly the same in shape they would have fallen within the principle of the plaintiff's patent. The word "surfaces" is used to shew that the inventor claims any other similar machine by which goods can be pressed. The principle of the patent is a simultaneous pressure for a continuous period. The defendant's machine is different, as it does not press simultaneously; it therefore does not fall within the terms of the patent, and does not constitute a piracy.

ALDERSON, B.—The patentee describes his invention, both at the beginning and at the end of his specification, and claims for a patent which produces a particular description of pressure. But I admit he would not be bound by an exact description, and a mere colourable variation would amount to a violation of the patent. The plaintiff's press squeezes together substances at the same time equally. A machine may press hosiery goods either for a long or for a short time. The point then is, whether the jury ought to have found that it was no infringement of the plaintiff's patent to place hosiery goods between rollers, which do not press all parts of them at the same time, but successively. Rollers only press on the same part for a single moment. In my opinion, the jury were warranted in saying that there had been no infringement, and they would have formed a wrong conclusion had they said otherwise.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The patentee begins by stating that the nature of his invention and the manner in which the same is to be carried into effect, are fully described and ascertained by the statement thereof, reference being had to the drawing thereunto annexed. Then follows a long description of the drawing. It might perhaps be argued, even irrespectively of the drawing and its description, that no infringement had been committed by the defendant, seeing that his invention did not consist of a press heated by steam. In my opinion, too, rolling cylinders cannot in common parlance be considered a press. The patentee then states that there are various modes of finishing goods by means of heat, and he then describes more particularly his own method. Without doubt, in order to constitute an infringement, the mode adopted need not be precisely the same; but it must be a press heated by steam. I quite agree with the observations that have fallen from my Brother Alderson. The plaintiff's machine is one that might press for three minutes, whereas that of the defendant would press the articles momentarily only. Indeed, I think it can hardly be called a press at all, but a combination of rollers merely, which, in my opinion, does not constitute an infringement of the plaintiff's patent.

AND EDWARD LAWS.

Ordnance Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 94. ss. 19,
26, Construction of—Costs of Inquiry.

The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 94, for the vesting and purchase of lands for the Ordnance services, and for the defence and security of the realm, enacts, in section 19, that in the event of owners of lands refusing, &c. to treat with the Ordnance officers for the purchase of lands, two Justices may put the latter into immediate possession of the lands; and a jury being summoned, shall "find the compensation to be paid, either for the absolute purchase of such lands, or for the possession or use thereof:"—Held, that under this act the jury were not authorized to award the expenses of witnesses, counsel, &c. to a party whose lands had been taken for the purposes of the act.

This was a rule calling upon the principal officers of Her Majesty's Ordnance to shew cause why the proceedings and the verdict of the jury in this case should not be returned into this court, and why a suggestion should not be entered, in the nature of a new writ for a new trial to the sheriff for the county of Pembroke. The question was whether, under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 94, a jury, in assessing compensation, was at liberty to give the party whose lands were taken by the Crown the costs of the inquiry, consisting of expenses of witnesses, counsel, &c. The 19th section enacts, that in the event of owners of lands, &c. refusing, declining, or not treating with the Ordnance officers for the purchase of lands, the latter may require two Justices to put them into immediate possession of the lands; and the sheriff may summon a jury, who, "on hearing any witnesses and evidence that may be produced, shall, on their oaths, find the compensation to be paid, either for the absolute purchase of such lands, buildings, or other hereditaments, or for the possession or use thereof, as the case may be (1)."

(1) The 25th section enacts, that when any money shall have been required by the verdict of a jury to be paid by the principal officers, for the absolute purchase of lands, &c., to persons under disability, &c., or not having the absolute interest therein, the money shall be paid into the hands of the Remem-

Mr. Laws, the claimant in this case, is the trustee of an estate, called the Bush Estate, in the neighbourhood of Pembroke Dock at Milford Haven; and the principal officers of Her Majesty's Ordnance having required a portion of this estate for the purpose of constructing batteries and other national defences, and having made an ineffectual attempt to treat with him, offering a sum of 12,000*l.*, obtained possession of the land by the intervention of two Justices, and caused a jury to be summoned for assessing compensation. On the inquiry, it was contended on behalf of the claimant that the jury were entitled to award him the expenses of witnesses and counsel by way of "compensation." On the part of the Crown, it was insisted that the claimant was entitled to no more than the value of the land taken. The jury, acting upon this latter view of the case, awarded to the plaintiff the sum of 15,269*l.* as compensation for the land taken by the officers of the Ordnance.

Sir J. Jervis (Attorney General) and W. C. Rowe shewed cause.—The jury were right in giving the claimant the mere value of the land and in refusing him the costs of proving his case. He was bound to make out his title at his own expense. Besides,

[ALDERSON, B. mentioned the case of Ex parte Layfield (3).]

Besides, there is a great difference between the case of property taken by the Crown for private purposes and that which is taken for the defence of the realm. The reason of not giving costs in the latter case is, that the Crown in taking lands is exercising a high prerogative for the benefit of the country. In the 20 Geo. 3. c. 38, which is an act for taking lands 'For the better securing his Majesty's Docks, &c. at Plymouth and Sheerness and for the better defending the Passage of the River Thames,' it is enacted that reasonable and just satisfaction shall be made to the parties entitled, but no mention is made of costs or expenses.

The act under which this question arises was framed in accordance with the 44 Geo. 3. c. 95, the 6th section of which resembles the 19th section of the act in question. All the acts above mentioned are silent as to costs, which shews there was no intention that the expenses of the inquiry should be paid by the Crown. Again, the ordinary rule as to the Crown not paying costs applies to this case. They also referred to 43 Geo. 3. c. 120.

Sir F. Kelly and M. Smith, in support of the rule.—Unless the claimant in this case receives his costs, he will suffer the utmost injustice. It is easy to conceive a case in which the whole value of the estate may be exceeded by the expense of proving the amount of injury sustained. The word "compensation" in the 19th section is sufficiently large to include this case: it means all the damages that have been incurred. The sum awarded by the jury in this case will not be sufficient compensation unless the claimant receives his costs of the inquiry also. If a man is to be compensated for the value of a house taken by the Crown, he would be entitled to remuneration for the injury done by the severance. In order to give a party full compensation for land taken, the jury ought to look at the actual expenditure which is rendered necessary by the land having been taken. The expenses occasioned in the present case constitute a resulting damage.

[ROLFE, B.—Your argument is, that after your land has been taken by the Crown, the claimant ought to be as rich as he was before.]

(3) 1 Y. & Coll. 79.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This rule must be discharged. I regret that the act of parliament does not contain any provision, not indeed for costs, but for expenses. With respect to costs, there is an entire omission; and the jury were not at liberty to take account of them at the trial. It is contended that the expenses necessarily incurred to enable a party to make a demand ought to be recovered by him, and this is sometimes the case. If the question had been what a man was entitled to recover, and the act of parliament had said he was to recover damages, he would then be in a situation to make his claim for the value of the land, for the consequential injury, and for the expenses he had incurred in getting compensation. There occurred in this court, some time ago, the case of an injury to a mine, where it became necessary for the party injured to sink a shaft to ascertain the extent of the injury done. An application was then made for the expenses of parties going down to make a report. This Court said that as the party had done no more than was necessary, a jury were bound to ascertain the amount of expense incurred, and that proof of that fact might be given in evidence. The substance of the transaction there was, that it was necessary to employ parties to see the extent of the mischief. Here, however, costs are not mentioned in the act of parliament, and they cannot be recovered under the word "compensation." The Court may, in considering the value of an estate, take into account the compulsory character of the sale, and a sum of perhaps 10l. per cent. is generally allowed on that account. I regret that by the language of this act of parliament the compensation is to be given for the absolute purchase of the land. That would include consequential damage and the true value of the land, but it would not embrace the expenses the claimant has been put to, and which he now attempts to recover, as they are not provided for by the act. Mr. Laws must seek redress by an application to the Crown, or by a petition to the legislature for an amendment of the law.

ALDERSON, B.—The act of parliament directs that the jury shall find the compensation to be paid either for the absolute purchase of the lands, or for the possession or use thereof. And the sum assessed would not amount to the value of the fee simple merely, but may extend also to the reversion. All the parties interested are to have compensation out of the entire fund; and the amount is to be settled by the Court of Exchequer. But how can we conclude that in this case the legislature intended costs to form part of the compensation? What have the other parties mentioned in the act of parliament to do, as persons who are to share the sum awarded, with the costs incurred? Nothing; and it would be unjust to give the reversioner the share of the party who has fought the battle at his own expense. The costs are not to be the subject of compensation. The course then is to ascertain the real value of the land, and when that is done the amount given may be easily apportioned amongst the tenants for life, from year to year or in remainder. The tenant for life incurs the first expense, and the legislature considered it hard that he should not be entitled to a portion of the money paid by way of compensation for the land. The act meant that there should be a substitution of money for land. The legislature ought to have provided for repayment to the party paying the costs of the inquiry; but as that has not been done, I can only express my regret that we have no power to do justice to the claimant.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. I regret that a party should be liable to have his property taken, and should not be entitled to the repayment of the reasonable preliminary expenses incurred by him. The act of parliament, however, gives us no power to award costs. It is said, that the legislature, looking at the fact that the land taken is intended for the defence of the state, have applied the principle of damnum absque injuria. I am inclined, however, to think that the omission has arisen from inadvertence. At all events, this statute gives no compensation for costs, as it enacts that the jury are to find compensation for the absolute purchase of the lands. The question then is, whether, on the jury being assembled, the Judge ought to direct them to allow the claimant the expenses of surveyors and counsel, and of summoning the witnesses and the jury. He ought not; but he ought to direct the jury to give a sum of money which, with the value of the property not taken, would be equivalent to the amount of the whole property. The 26th section enacts, that the compensation money is to be paid by the Court of Exchequer to parties there specified in certain proportions; but, if the costs incurred by the claimant were awarded by the jury, the result would be that parties who had not incurred any expense would obtain a portion of the money given by way of costs. This, I think, was not contemplated by the legislature. The present view is justified by reference to the act relating to the Woods and Forests as well as by other statutes framed in pari materia. In those statutes the words are larger than the present. I think the legislature did not intend, under the word "compensation," that the jury should award costs.

Under the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, the vestry, upon precept from the Justices, are to make out and return a competent number of persons qualified and liable to serve the office of constable; the list is to be published, and notice given of when and where objections will be heard by the Justices, who, at a special session, have power to strike out of the list the names of persons disqualified, and to choose and swear in constables from the list; and the vestry may return a resolution to have paid constables, in which case the Justices are to appoint paid constables.

A vestry made out a list, and returned it with a resolution to have a paid constable, and the plaintiff being named in the list was about to be sworn in as a paid constable by the Justices, when the defendant, a parishioner, made a statement to the Justices, in the presence of a number of persons, affecting the plaintiff's character. In an action for slander it being objected that the statement ought to have been made to the vestry, and not to the Justices, who could only hear objections as to qualification and liability to serve,—Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, if the statement was made bonâ fide in furtherance of the ends of justice.

This was an action for slander. The declaration stated that whereas before the committing of the grievance by the defendant, as thereafter mentioned, to wit, on &c., at a vestry then held in and for the township of Barnsley, in the parish of Silkstone, in the West Riding of the county of York, the plaintiff was duly elected and chosen by the men inhabiting and residing within the said township to be one of the constables of and for the said township, for one year from thence next following, to do and execute all and singular those things which belong to the office of constable; but the plaintiff had not, at the time of the committing of the said grievance by the defendant, taken oath for the execution of his said office; and whereas, on the occasion of the defendant's committing of the grievance, and speaking of the words by him as thereafter mentioned, to wit, on &c., a special petty session of her Majesty's Justices of the Peace, in and for the West Riding of the county of York acting in and for the upper and lower divisions of the wapentake of Staincross in the said West Riding of the said county of York, was had and held at Barnsley, in and for the said divisions, for the appointment of parochial constables; and the plaintiff then appeared, and was present before John Thorneley, Esq., Thomas Taylor, Esq., and the Rev. William Wordsworth, clerk, respectively, then and there being Justices of the Peace of our said Lady the Queen, in and for the West Riding of the said county, and acting in and for the said divisions assembled at that session, as such Justices, in order that they might cause to be administered to him the oath required by law to be taken by the plaintiff for the due execution of his said office as constable, and that the plaintiff might take that oath; and the defendant then and there before the said Justices, before his said speaking and publishing of the words by him, as thereafter mentioned, objected to the plaintiff being sworn, and to the plaintiff being allowed to take the said oath. Yet the defendant, contriving and wilfully and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff in his good name, fame, and credit, and to bring him into public scandal, infamy, and disgrace, and to injure him in his said office, and induce the said Justices not to administer the said oath to him, and prevent him taking the same, theretofore, to wit, on &c., in a certain discourse, which the defendant then had, of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning him in his said office, and of and concerning the said objection so made by the defendant as aforesaid, in the presence and hearing of the said Justices and divers other persons, in the presence and hearing of the said Justices, and those persons falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning him in his said office, and of and concerning the said objection so made by him as aforesaid, the false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory words following, that is to say, "I (meaning the defendant) object to Kershaw (meaning the plaintiff, and meaning that he objected to his being sworn, and to his being allowed to take the oath aforesaid) on account of his (meaning the plaintiff) being a person not to be believed upon his oath. He (meaning the plaintiff) is a person who would say and swear anything. He (meaning the plaintiff) is a perjured fellow, and would do anything to gain his (meaning the plaintiff's) own ends. He (meaning the plaintiff) is an improper person to be a constable, and not worthy of being trusted." By means of which premises the plaintiff hath been and is otherwise greatly injured in his said office and otherwise; to the damage of the plaintiff of 1,000*l.* &c.

Plea—Not guilty; and issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Pollock, C.B., at the Middlesex Sittings, after Michaelmas term, 1847, when the following facts were proved:—On the 11th of February 1847 a vestry meeting was held in the township of Barnsley, for the purpose of nominating and electing a competent number of men qualified and liable to serve as constables for the current year, to be returned to the Justices; at which meeting the plaintiff was duly nominated and elected as a person qualified and liable to serve as a paid constable for the said township of Barnsley. At a petty session, holden at Barnsley, for the purpose of swearing into office the constables returned from the parishes and townships of the West Riding of Yorkshire, upon the plaintiff being called upon to be sworn to the faithful performance of the office of a paid constable, the defendant, who was a pawnbroker in Barnsley, (after objectors, if any, had been called upon to state their objections) in the presence and hearing of a number of persons, stated, &c. [the words in the declaration]; and upon being told by one of the Justices that he should have made his objection at the vestry, he added, "I know this is not the proper time, but I feel it my duty to make this statement that false and malicious. For the plaintiff, it was contended, that the proper time for the defendant to have made his objection was at the vestry, which returned the parties as fit for the office. That the Justices had no authority to hear any other objections than those made by the parties themselves, and that a statement made to the Justices in the presence of a number of people was not a privileged communication.

The Chief Baron was of opinion that the statement might be properly made to the Justices, and directed the jury that if they thought it was honestly made, believing it to be true, he had a right to make it, and they would find their verdict for the defendant: if not, and that the defendant intended to impute an indictable offence, then they would find for the plaintiff. The jury found their verdict for the defendant.

Overend now moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.—The Chief Baron was wrong in the opinion he formed at the trial, and upon which he directed the jury that the defendant had a right to make his objection before the Justices. The Justices are to judge only of qualification, and all objections of character should be made to the vestry. This will appear upon a review of the sections of the act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109. The second section empowers the Justices to issue a precept to overseers to make out a list of a competent number of men qualified and liable to serve as constables. Section 3. requires the vestry to make out such list; which by section 8. is to be published by fixing a copy for three Sundays on the principal door of the church, &c. with a notice that all objections to the list will be heard by the Justices at a time and place mentioned therein; and afterwards the list is to be returned to the Justices. Then, by section 10, the overseers are to attend the special session and verify the sections shew that the Justices are to choose from the list returned, after striking out those who are disqualified or not liable; and they cannot inquire into the fitness of the party if he is qualified. Moreover, this is the case of a paid constable; and by section 18. the vestry may resolve to have paid constables, and the resolution is to be sent to the Justices who, in that case, are by section 19. to "appoint" accordingly. They are to exercise a mere ministerial act; and not, as in the case of an ordinary constable, to "choose" from the list returned.

PARKE, B.—The result is, that the Justices are to select a certain number out of the list so made out. Surely it is very proper for a parishioner to make an objection when the Justices are about to exercise their power of selection.

ALDERSON, B.—If in the case of an ordinary constable the objection would be properly made before the Justices, why not in the case of a paid constable? The only difference is, that the vestry are to return a resolution to have a paid constable, and then the Justices are to appoint one; not however necessarily from the list of names returned by the vestry.

PLATT, B.—I think the defendant chose the most proper occasion for his objection; and certainly it was his duty to make the statement, if he believed it, rather than to stand by and see an improper person appointed as a constable.

Costs—Suggestion on the Roll—County Court Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95.—Order in Council.

The Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. enacts, by sect. 1, that the Queen may order the act to be put in force in such county as to her shall seem fit; and by sect. 129, that if any action shall be commenced in any of the superior courts for any cause for which a plaint might have been entered in any court holden under the act, and a verdict be found for the plaintiff for a less sum than 20l. in contract and 5l. in tort, the plaintiff shall recover no costs. The Queen, by order in Council, directed that the act should be put in force in every county on the 15th of March 1847. On the 25th of March following the present action was commenced in this court, for a cause of action accruing within the jurisdiction of the County Court of Kingston, in Surrey; but there was not then in existence at that place any county court at which a plaint could have been entered:—Held, that the plaintiff, who had recovered a verdict for 40s., was entitled to costs (1).

A rule had been obtained, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why he should not bring the postea into court, and file the plea roll, to enable the defendant to enter a suggestion thereon to deprive the plaintiff of costs, pursuant to the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129, the Small Debts Act. The rule was obtained on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to costs, as he ought to have brought his action in the county court for Surrey. The 1st section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. enacts, "That her Majesty may from time to time order that the act shall be put in force in such counties as to her Majesty, from time to time, shall seem fit." The 129th section enacts, "That if any action shall be commenced after the passing of this act, in any of her Majesty's superior courts of record, for any cause other than those lastly hereinbefore specified, for which a plaint might have been entered in any court holden under this act, and a verdict shall be found for the plaintiff for a sum less than 20l. if the said action is founded on contract, or less than 5l. if it be founded on tort, the said plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only, and no costs; and if a verdict shall not be found for the plaintiff the defendant shall be entitled to his costs as between attorney and client, unless in either case the Judge who shall try the cause shall certify on the back of the record that the action was fit to be brought in such superior court."

By two orders in Council, published in the London Gazette, it was ordered, that on the 15th of March 1847, the act should be put in force in every county throughout England and Wales. The action was brought in this court on the 25th of March 1847, to recover damages for a trespass committed by breaking and entering the

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Maule, J., at the Denbighshire Summer Assizes 1847, it appeared that the defendant was one of the managing directors of a projected company, called the Wrexham, Nantwich and Crewe Junction Railway Company, and that the action was brought to recover 31l. 10s., the amount of a deposit paid in November 1845 on fifteen shares, with interest thereon. After the promoters of the scheme had obtained a provisional committee of management, a prospectus, headed as follows, was issued on the 3rd of October 1845:—"Provisionally registered. Capital, 450,000l., in 22,500 shares of 20l. each. Deposit, 2l. 2s. 6d. per share." On the 6th of October in that year the plaintiff applied for shares.—"To the Provisional Committee of the Wrexham, Nantwich and Crewe Junction Railway Company. Gentlemen,—I hereby request that you will allot me 100 shares of 20l. each in the above proposed railway, and I hereby undertake to pay the deposit of 2l. 2s. 6d. per share thereon, or any lesser number of shares which may be allotted to me; and I also undertake to execute the parliamentary contract and the subscribers' agreement when required." The allotments were made on the 25th of October, and the following letter of allotment was sent to the plaintiff:—"Wrexham, Nantwich and Crewe Junction Railway. (Provisionally registered). Capital, 450,000l., in 22,500 shares of 20l. each. Deposit, 2l. 2s. 6d. per share.

duly made, this allotment will be then cancelled, and the shares appropriated to other applicants." (Then followed the signature of the secretary, and a list of bankers' names, and the letter continued :) "On payment of the deposit to the bankers, this letter will be exchanged for a receipt. Terms and conditions on which the shares in the company are allotted :—The company is formed for the purpose of constructing a railway from Wrexham to Crewe, (by such route, and with such extensions, as the directors may think necessary on the engineers' report). The directors assume the right to carry out their intentions by the adoption of all such measures as they may deem requisite for obtaining the necessary parliamentary powers to form a company for the construction of the entire railway, or any part of it, with such branches, extensions, or alterations, as they may find expedient, and to apply the amount paid for deposits in discharge of any liabilities incurred by them under the general powers vested in them for the prosecution of the undertaking. Powers will be applied for to allow interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum on the amount of calls paid, until the opening of the line. A subscribers' agreement, and a parliamentary contract, in such form and with such provisions as the committee may think necessary, will be prepared, and lie at the company's offices for signature from the to both inclusive. Arrangements will also be made and duly announced for the execution of the deeds by shareholders resident in or near the provincial towns in which shareholders may reside. The shares, with the deposits made thereon, will be liable to forfeiture, without notice, in respect of which the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract are not signed within the specified time." (Signed by the secretary).

On the 1st of November 1845 the plaintiff paid to one of the bankers named in the letter of allotment 81*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of the required deposit, of which the directors returned to him 7*s.* 6*d.*, considering they could not legally take a larger deposit than 2*l.* 2*s.* per share. On the 8th of December 1845 he signed the subscription deed and received scrip certificates for his shares as follows :—"Wrexham, Nantwich and Crewe Junction Railway. (Provisionally registered). Capital, 450,000*l.*, in 22,500 shares of 20*l.* each. On which a deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* per share has been paid. Scrip certificate. Five shares. No. to inclusive. The holder of this certificate having signed the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement, and having agreed to pay all future calls, is the proprietor of five shares in the capital, for the time being of the above undertaking." (Signed by two directors).

All the shares were allotted about the same time as the allotment to the plaintiff; but deposits were not paid on more than 4,000, although the time for payment was extended to the 10th of January 1846. In the course of that year the project was abandoned. The deposits had been exhausted in payments for surveys and plans to be deposited at the Board of Trade, and for other preliminary expenses requisite to the carrying out of the undertaking. On behalf of the defendant, it was contended, that by the terms of the letter of allotment the directors were empowered so to apply the deposits, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The learned Judge left to the jury the question, whether the project was abandoned before the commencement of the action, and they found that it was. He then directed a verdict for the plaintiff, with leave reserved, by consent, to the defendant to enter a nonsuit upon the construction of the letter of allotment.

Townsend, in Michaelmas term, obtained a rule accordingly, and now—

Martin and Welsby shewed cause.—The meaning of the proposal made in this case is, that at least a competent number of the 22,500 shares should be subscribed for. The 1st of November was the day fixed for the payment of the deposits, yet on the 8th of September, when the plaintiff executed the subscription deed, there were not 4,000 shares subscribed for. The plaintiff was allowed to execute the deed in ignorance of that fact, which was a suppression by the directors of a fact material for him to know; and, on the authority of Wontner v. Shairp (1), the execution of the deed was obtained by fraud, and the deed is void as against the plaintiff. There was also evidence of fraud to affect the letter of allotment.

[PARKE, B.—The learned Judge reports that no point at all was made about fraud, at the trial; and the only question is, whether there is to be a nonsuit on the construction of the terms of the letter of allotment. Those terms contain a permission to apply the money, and there was no fraud at the time of the deposit. The plaintiff is bound by that, if not by the deed.]

By the terms of the letter of allotment the directors are "to apply the amount paid for deposits in discharge of any liabilities incurred by them under the general powers vested in them for the prosecution of the undertaking." That is prospective, and means general powers to be afterwards conferred on the directors after the execution of the subscribers' deed. That deed, being fraudulent, must be considered out of the case, and then the condition on which the directors were to expend the deposits was never fulfilled. Certainly the directors had no power to use the money until there was a reasonable prospect of their being able to carry out the scheme. [They cited Nockells v. Crosby (2).] Suppose twenty persons only paid their deposits.

[PARKE, B.—Whether the money had been expended with a reasonable prospect of being able to go on with the project, was a question of fact for the jury; and if the plaintiff meant to rely on that, he should not have consented to a nonsuit being entered on the construction of the letter of allotment. Probably the directors might fairly expect that the allottees would perform their contract.]

[ALDERSON, B.—It may be that part of the money was expended in getting in the deposits.]

[PARKE, B.—It may be that the onus was on the defendant to shew how much was expended for necessary matters.]

The directors proceeded on their own responsibility. The money was not to be applied when paid, but when there was a sufficient amount paid to justify the expectation that the project would be carried out.

Townsend and Foulkes, contra, were not called upon.

PARKE, B.—We are all of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The first question in this case is, whether upon the true construction of the letter of allotment the directors of the projected company were empowered to apply the deposit towards such preliminary expenses as the directors may think proper to incur in carrying out the object of the deed. The second question raised relates to the subscribers' agreement, which was executed by the plaintiff. It is contended, by his counsel, that the plaintiff's signature to that deed was obtained by fraud, and that there were circumstances in this case, which, if they had been left to the jury would, according to the case of Wontner v. Shairp, have justified them in coming to the conclusion that the deed was fraudulent, and therefore that the case must be determined without reference to that deed, and upon the letter of allotment only. It does not appear that the learned Judge was asked at the trial to leave any question to the jury upon the deed or letter of allotment; but the plaintiff's counsel consented to have the question of law upon the letter of allotment reserved for our decision. If there had been any question of fraud, the plaintiff's counsel should have insisted upon having it left to the jury; but he did not, as appears from the learned Judge's note, allege fraud with respect to the letter of allotment; and if he had, it is difficult to perceive how he could have made it out. In Wontner v. Shairp there were circumstances tending to shew that the execution of the subscription deed had been obtained by a misrepresentation as to the number of shares allotted; and as in this case it is said there was no sufficient quantity of deposits made, and so that the deed was fraudulent, we will consider the case upon the letter of allotment only.

Now, the letter of allotment, on the construction of which the whole case turns, was issued upon an allotment to the plaintiff of certain shares about the same time as the other allotments were made; and I think the directors must be understood thereby as saying, we shall apply the money deposited in our hands in such manner as we think fit for the purposes of carrying this undertaking into effect, and in discharge of any liabilities we may incur in doing so. One of the terms of the letter of allotment is: "The directors assume the right to carry out their intentions by the adoption of all such measures as they may deem requisite for obtaining the necessary parliamentary powers to form a company for the construction of," &c. "and to apply the amount paid for deposits in discharge of any liabilities incurred by them under the general powers vested in them for the prosecution of the undertaking." The expression "general powers" means those already vested in them, which they have assumed for the purpose of carrying the undertaking into effect; and therefore upon the true construction of this document they may so apply the deposits. The directors had a right to apply the deposits for advertisements, surveys, and necessary plans to be deposited at the Board of Trade, and all reasonable expenses were properly chargeable on the deposits. If there had been an unreasonable application of the deposits that would have raised a question which ought to have been left to the jury. The terms of this letter of allotment distinguish this case from Walstab v. Spottiswoode (3), where no such power was reserved to the directors of the projected company. The directors would be bound to return any surplus or any sum expended after it was clear that the undertaking could not go on; but if all the deposits had been reasonably expended in furtherance of the undertaking the plaintiff could not recover.

ALDERSON, B.—The plaintiff undertakes that the directors may employ the money deposited in their hands for the legitimate purposes of the projected company. If it has been so expended he can have no right to recover it back.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. "General powers" mean those powers which we are now exercising.—which we assume.

The vessel sailed direct from Liverpool to a port in China, having on board a cargo for that port, and also for Manilla. She afterwards discharged a portion of her cargo at a port in China, and thence proceeded to Manilla, where she discharged the remainder of her outward cargo. At Manilla the captain took on board on freight 230 chests of opium for Tongkoo, and sailed from Manilla (the vessel not being a tenth part laden), intending to seek there a freight back to England, and whilst he was sailing towards Tongkoo the vessel was by the perils of the sea totally lost. Tongkoo is altogether out of the regular course of a voyage from Manilla to England:—Held, by this Court, and also on error in the Exchequer Chamber, that the sailing from Manilla to Tongkoo was not a deviation; the words in the policy meaning not "from Manilla" only, but "from ports or places in China and Manilla, all or any."*

CASE.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. Ashley, Brothers, of Liverpool, ship-brokers, and Mr. John Worrall, of Liverpool, merchant (being owners of the ship Mars, of Liverpool; Gardiner master), by Messrs. Wise, Farbridge & Co. their brokers, effected a policy of insurance, dated the 27th of May 1839, with the General Maritime Insurance Company, London, which was duly subscribed by the defendants, being then directors, with others, of such company, for 1,000*l.*, upon such ship, "lost or not lost, at and from Liverpool to ports and places in China and Manilla, all or any, during the ship's stay there for any purposes, and from thence to her port or ports of calling and discharge in the United Kingdom, with liberty to call and stay at all or any ports or places on either side of and at the Cape of Good Hope." The Mars sailed, on the 5th of July 1839, direct from Liverpool to the port of Lintin, in China, having on board a cargo on account of Messrs. Wise, Holiday & Co. for Lintin aforesaid and Manilla, and some goods for the same place on the owners' account. The master of the Mars was instructed, after discharging such outward cargo, to seek, on the owners' account, for a return cargo for the United Kingdom. The Mars arrived on the coast of China, and on her arrival, on account of the disturbances then existing between the British and Chinese, was immediately ordered, with all other British merchant vessels, by her Majesty's ship Volage, to go to Tongkoo, which is only a few miles from and in sight of Lintin, and in lat. 22° 25' north, long. 113° 40' east. She arrived at Tongkoo on the 23rd of November 1839, and then discharged part of the cargo. The Mars proceeded from Tongkoo on the 9th of December 1839 to Manilla, and arrived there on the 16th of December 1839, and then discharged the remainder of her outward cargo, with the exception of a trifling part, belonging to the owners. Manilla is in lat. 14° 35' north, and long. 121° east. The captain, finding freights low at Manilla, took on board there on freight 230 chests of opium for Tongkoo, and sailed from Manilla, with the intention of going back to Tongkoo, and then seeking a freight direct back to the United Kingdom, and while so sailing from towards and in the direction of Tongkoo, and having got to lat. 21° north, long. 117° east, by the Pratas shoal, the ship Mars was by the perils of the seas wrecked and totally lost, on the 13th of January 1840.

When the Mars sailed from Manilla, with the 250 chests of opium on board, she was not a tenth part laden. Manilla is only seven or eight days' sail from Tongkoo, in favourable weather. Lintin and Tongkoo are both places in China, which lie in the course of a voyage from Liverpool to China and Manilla. The regular and usual course of a voyage from Manilla to the United Kingdom is S.S.W., for the purpose of passing through the Straits of Sunda, and thence round the Cape of Good Hope; and in the course of such voyage the ship would not have gone to the northward of Manilla. The regular and usual course of a voyage from Manilla to Tongkoo, and that pursued by the Mars on the present occasion, is north-westerly; and the point at which she had arrived at the time of the accident is altogether out of the regular and usual course of a voyage from Manilla to the United Kingdom, though in the regular and direct course of a voyage from Manilla to Tongkoo. 110 to 120 days is about the average duration of a voyage from the United Kingdom to China or Manilla, and also of a voyage from China or Manilla to the United Kingdom. The north-east monsoon is not so favourable to a passage from Manilla to Tongkoo as the south-west monsoon. The monsoon always blows from the north-east in December and January, and with the greatest strength. In the months of December, January and February, the voyage from Manilla to Tongkoo can be made during the north-east monsoon without any extraordinary danger; but a vessel must sail a longer distance in making a voyage from Manilla to Tongkoo during the north-east than the south-west monsoon. The due subscription of the policy by the defendants, as Directors of the General Maritime Insurance Company, London, is admitted, as also the sufficiency of the capital, stock and funds of the company, and of the shares of the defendants therein, to pay and satisfy the plaintiffs the amount insured; and the agency of Wise, Farbridge & Co. as alleged in the declaration, and the plaintiffs' interest in the subject-matter of insurance to the amount of all the money by them insured thereon, are admitted. It is agreed that the pleadings and policy annexed may be referred to by either party as part of this case; that the Court shall be at liberty to inspect maps and charts, and draw all conclusions and inferences of fact from the circumstances stated, as a jury might or ought to draw thereupon; and that after judgment should be given upon the case, either party should be at liberty (with the approbation of this Court, and not otherwise) to turn this case into a special verdict, and to bring a writ of error thereupon, such special verdict to be settled by a Judge of this Court, and all inferences of fact which this Court might draw upon the hearing of the special case were to be stated as facts in the special verdict. The question for the opinion of this Court was, whether the plaintiffs were or were not entitled under the circumstances to recover in this action any and what amount. If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were so entitled, their judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs by confession, for such amount as the Court should think that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover; but if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover anything, then a judgment of nolle prosequi should be entered; unless in either case the Court should think fit that the case should be turned into a special verdict, in which case judgment should be entered up on such special verdict, according to the directions of this Court.

The case was argued, in Easter term, 1846, (April 27,) by—

Martin, for the plaintiffs.—The sailing from Manilla to Tongkoo did not amount to such a deviation as to avoid the policy. Assuming that no opium had been taken on board, the loss would have been within the protection of the policy, and the fact of the ship taking in opium at Manilla affords no answer to the action. The voyage contemplated by the policy was “at and from Liverpool to ports and places in China and Manilla, all or any, during the ship’s stay for any purposes, and from thence to her port or ports of calling and discharge in the United Kingdom, with liberty to call and stay at all or any ports or places on either side of and at the Cape of Good Hope.” The words “from thence” are not to be confined to “Manilla,” as will be contended on the other side, but extend to any “ports and places in China and Manilla.” Beatson v. Haworth (1) will be relied on by the other side. That was the case of an insurance at and “from Fisherrow to Gothenburgh and back to Leith and Cockenzie.” The vessel having gone to Cockenzie before Leith, and having been there stranded, this was held to be a deviation, on the ground that unless the general rule was varied by usage or special facts, the assured was bound to go to the places mentioned in the policy in the order in which they were named in it. That case, however, although not overruled, has been the subject of much observation; but, at all events, does not govern this case, because here the vessel did also go to China before proceeding to Manilla. In Beatson v. Haworth the Court relied upon Clason v. Simmonds (2), which is distinguishable from the present case on the same grounds. Maraden v. Reid (3), Gairdner v. Senhouse (4), Metcalf v. Parry (5), and Bragg v. Anderson (6), are authorities in favour of the plaintiffs. Lambert v. Liddard (7) is precisely in point. There, a policy at and from Pernambuco, or any other port or ports on the coast of the Brazils, to London, was held to warrant the assured, if he could not get a cargo at Pernambuco, to go to any other port or ports till he got a cargo, and that he was not restricted to those which lay in the direct course between Pernambuco and London. Hunter v. Leathley (8), Raine v. Bell (9), Cormack v. Gladstone (10), Laroche v. Oswin (11), and Armet v. Innes (12), are in point.

Watson, for the defendants.—The return of the ship from Manilla to China amounted to a deviation. Where the insurance is upon a voyage to two or more places named in the policy, all or any, it amounts to a deviation unless the vessel goes to them in the order mentioned in the policy. In the present case, the vessel might have gone either to China or Manilla, and have taken in a cargo at either place; but she was not at liberty to go to Manilla first and then

By means of which premises the plaintiff hath been and is otherwise greatly injured in his said office and otherwise; to the damage of the plaintiff of 1,000*l.* &c.

Plea—Not guilty; and issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Pollock, C.B., at the Middlesex Sittings, after Michaelmas term, 1847, when the following facts were proved:—On the 11th of February 1847 a vestry meeting was held in the township of Barnsley, for the purpose of nominating and electing a competent number of men qualified and liable to serve as constables for the current year, to be returned to the Justices; at which meeting the plaintiff was duly nominated and elected as a person qualified and liable to serve as a paid constable for the said township of Barnsley. At a petty session, holden at Barnsley, for the purpose of swearing into office the constables returned from the parishes and townships of the West Riding of Yorkshire, upon the plaintiff being called upon to be sworn to the faithful performance of the office of a paid constable, the defendant, who was a pawnbroker in Barnsley, (after objectors, if any, had been called upon to state their objections) in the presence and hearing of a number of persons, stated, &c. [the words in the declaration]; and upon being told by one of the Justices that he should have made his objection at the vestry, he added, "I know this is not the proper time, but I feel it my duty to make this statement that the Justices may be aware of Kershaw's character."

On behalf of the defendant, it was contended, that the statement did not impute an indictable offence; that if it did, it was a statement made after being called upon by a competent authority, bonâ fide and for the purpose of furthering the ends of justice, and therefore a privileged communication, for which the defendant was not liable unless the plaintiff proved the statement to be false and malicious. For the plaintiff, it was contended, that the proper time for the defendant to have made his objection was at the vestry, which returned the parties as fit for the office. That the Justices had no authority to hear any other objections than those made by the parties themselves, and that a statement made to the Justices in the presence of a number of people was not a privileged communication.

The Chief Baron was of opinion that the statement might be properly made to the Justices, and directed the jury that if they thought it was honestly made, believing it to be true, he had a right to make it, and they would find their verdict for the defendant: if not, and that the defendant intended to impute an indictable offence, then they would find for the plaintiff. The jury found their verdict for the defendant.

Overend now moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.—The Chief Baron was wrong in the opinion he formed at the trial, and upon which he directed the jury that the defendant had a right to make his objection before the Justices. The Justices are to judge only of qualification, and all objections of character should be made to the vestry. This will appear upon a review of the sections of the act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109. The second section empowers the Justices to issue a precept to overseers to make out a list of a competent number of men qualified and liable to serve as constables. Section 3. requires the vestry to make out such list; which by section 8. is to be published by fixing a copy for three Sundays on the principal door of the church, &c., with a notice that all objections to the list will be heard by the Justices at a time and place mentioned therein; and afterwards the list is to be returned to the Justices. Then, by section 10, the overseers are to attend the special session and verify the lists; "and if any man not qualified and liable to serve as constable as aforesaid is inserted in any such list, it shall be lawful for the said Justices, upon being satisfied," &c. "to strike his name out of such list." Section 11. enacts, "that whenever any list shall have been allowed, the Justices shall choose from the allowed list the names," &c. It is therefore the vestry who are to judge of and return parties fit, as regards character, to serve the office; and the 10th and 11th sections shew that the Justices are to choose from the list returned, after striking out those who are disqualified or not liable; and they cannot inquire into the fitness of the party if he is qualified. Moreover, this is the case of a paid constable; and by section 18. the vestry may resolve to have paid constables, and the resolution is to be sent to the Justices who, in that case, are by section 19. to "appoint" accordingly. They are to exercise a mere ministerial act; and not, as in the case of an ordinary constable, to "choose" from the list returned.

PARKE, B.—The result is, that the Justices are to select a certain number out of the list so made out. Surely it is very proper for a parishioner to make an objection when the Justices are about to exercise their power of selection.

ALDERSON, B.—If in the case of an ordinary constable the objection would be properly made before the Justices, why not in the case of a paid constable? The only difference is, that the vestry are to return a resolution to have a paid constable, and then the Justices are to appoint one; not however necessarily from the list of names returned by the vestry.

PLATT, B.—I think the defendant chose the most proper occasion for his objection; and certainly it was his duty to make the statement, if he believed it, rather than to stand by and see an improper person appointed as a constable.

Costs—Suggestion on the Roll—County Court Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95.—Order in Council.

*The Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. enacts, by sect. 1, that the Queen may order the act to be put in force in such county as to her shall seem fit; and by sect. 129, that if any action shall be commenced in any of the superior courts for any cause for which a plaint might have been entered in any court holden under the act, and a verdict be found for the plaintiff for a less sum than 20*l.* in contract and 5*l.* in tort, the plaintiff shall recover no costs. The Queen, by order in Council, directed that the act should be put* *in force in every county on the 15th of March 1847. On the 25th of March following the present action was commenced in this court, for a cause of action accruing within the jurisdiction of the County Court of Kingston, in Surrey; but there was not then in existence at that place any county court at which a plaint could have been entered:—Held, that the plaintiff, who had recovered a verdict for 40*s., was entitled to costs (1).

A rule had been obtained, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why he should not bring the postea into court, and file the plea roll, to enable the defendant to enter a suggestion thereon to deprive the plaintiff of costs, pursuant to the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129, the Small Debts Act. The rule was obtained on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to costs, as he ought to have brought his action in the county court for Surrey. The 1st section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. enacts, "That her Majesty may from time to time order that the act shall be put in force in such counties as to her Majesty, from time to time, shall seem fit." The 129th section enacts, "That if any action shall be commenced after the passing of this act, in any of her Majesty's superior courts of record, for any cause other than those lastly hereinbefore specified, for which a plaint might have been entered in any court holden under this act, and a verdict shall be found for the plaintiff for a sum less than 20*l.* if the said action is founded on contract, or less than 5*l.* if it be founded on tort, the said plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only, and no costs; and if a verdict shall not be found for the plaintiff the defendant shall be entitled to his costs as between attorney and client, unless in either case the Judge who shall try the cause shall certify on the back of the record that the action was fit to be brought in such superior court."

By two orders in Council, published in the London Gazette, it was ordered, that on the 15th of March 1847, the act should be put in force in every county throughout England and Wales. The action was brought in this court on the 25th of March 1847, to recover damages for a trespass committed by breaking and entering the

A party to whom shares in a projected railway company had been allotted received a letter of allotment, on which was indorsed, "The directors assume the right to carry out their intentions by the adoption of all such measures as they may deem requisite for obtaining the necessary parliamentary powers to form a company for the construction of," &c. "and to apply the amount paid for deposits in discharge of any liabilities incurred by them, under the general powers vested in them for the prosecution of the undertaking." The allottee paid the deposit on the shares allotted to him, and, the undertaking having failed, sued one of the directors for a return of the deposit money:—Held, that the expression "general powers" meant the general powers which the directors assumed for the purpose of carrying the undertaking into effect; and that if all the deposits had been applied for that purpose in a reasonable and proper manner, and before it was clear that the scheme must fail, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Whether the deposit-money has been reasonably expended is a question for the jury.

Indebitatus assumpsit for money received to the plaintiff's use, for money paid, and on an account stated.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial, before Maule, J., at the Denbighshire Summer Assizes 1847, it appeared that the defendant was one of the managing directors of a projected company, called the Wrexham, Nantwich and Crewe Junction Railway Company, and that the action was brought to recover 31l. 10s., the amount of a deposit paid in November 1845 on fifteen shares, with interest thereon. After the promoters of the scheme had obtained a provisional committee of management, a prospectus, headed as follows, was issued on the 3rd of October 1845:—"Provisionally registered. Capital, 450,000l., in 22,500 shares of 20l. each. Deposit, 2l. 2s. 6d. per share." On the 6th of October in that year the plaintiff applied for shares.—"To the Provisional Committee of the Wrexham, Nantwich and Crewe Junction Railway Company. Gentlemen,—I hereby request that you will allot me 100 shares of 20l. each in the above proposed railway, and I hereby undertake to pay the deposit of 2l. 2s. 6d. per share thereon, or any lesser number of shares which may be allotted to me; and I also undertake to execute the parliamentary contract and the subscribers' agreement when required." The allotments were made on the 25th of October, and the following letter of allotment was sent to the plaintiff:—"Wrexham, Nantwich and Crewe Junction Railway. (Provisionally registered). Capital, 450,000l., in 22,500 shares of 20l. each. Deposit, 2l. 2s. 6d. per share.

"Honblas Street, Wrexham, 25th of October 1845. Allotment No. 64. Deposit, 31l. 17s. 6d.

"Sir,—I am directed to inform you, that the committee of management have, in compliance with your application, allotted to you fifteen shares in this company, on the terms and conditions annexed; and you are therefore required to pay the deposit of 2l. 2s. 6d. per share, amounting to 31l. 17s. 6d., to one of the undermentioned bankers, on or before the 1st day of November next. In default of such payment being duly made, this allotment will be then cancelled, and the shares appropriated to other applicants." (Then followed the signature of the secretary, and a list of bankers' names, and the letter continued :) "On payment of the deposit to the bankers, this letter will be exchanged for a receipt. Terms and conditions on which the shares in the company are allotted :—The company is formed for the purpose of constructing a railway from Wrexham to Crewe, (by such route, and with such extensions, as the directors may think necessary on the engineers' report). The directors assume the right to carry out their intentions by the adoption of all such measures as they may deem requisite for obtaining the necessary parliamentary powers to form a company for the construction of the entire railway, or any part of it, with such branches, extensions, or alterations, as they may find expedient, and to apply the amount paid for deposits in discharge of any liabilities incurred by them under the general powers vested in them for the prosecution of the undertaking. Powers will be applied for to allow interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum on the amount of calls paid, until the opening of the line. A subscribers' agreement, and a parliamentary contract, in such form and with such provisions as the committee may think necessary, will be prepared, and lie at the company's offices for signature from the to both inclusive. Arrangements will also be made and duly announced for the execution of the deeds by shareholders resident in or near the provincial towns in which shareholders may reside. The shares, with the deposits made thereon, will be liable to forfeiture, without notice, in respect of which the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract are not signed within the specified time." (Signed by the secretary).

On the 1st of November 1845 the plaintiff paid to one of the bankers named in the letter of allotment 31*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of the required deposit, of which the directors returned to him 7*s.* 6*d.*, considering they could not legally take a larger deposit than 2*l.* 2*s.* per share. On the 8th of December 1845 he signed the subscription deed and received scrip certificates for his shares as follows :—"Wrexham, Nantwich and Crewe Junction Railway. (Provisionally registered). Capital, 450,000*l.*, in 22,500 shares of 20*l.* each. On which a deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* per share has been paid. Scrip certificate. Five shares. No. to inclusive. The holder of this certificate having signed the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement, and having agreed to pay all future calls, is the proprietor of five shares in the capital, for the time being of the above undertaking." (Signed by two directors).

All the shares were allotted about the same time as the allotment to the plaintiff; but deposits were not paid on more than 4,000, although the time for payment was extended to the 10th of January 1846. In the course of that year the project was abandoned. The deposits had been exhausted in payments for surveys and plans to be deposited at the Board of Trade, and for other preliminary expenses requisite to the carrying out of the undertaking. On behalf of the defendant, it was contended, that by the terms of the letter of allotment the directors were empowered so to apply the deposits, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The learned Judge left to the jury the question, whether the project was abandoned before the commencement of the action, and they found that it was. He then directed a verdict for the plaintiff, with leave reserved, by consent, to the defendant to enter a nonsuit upon the construction of the letter of allotment.

Townsend, in Michaelmas term, obtained a rule accordingly, and now—

Martin and Welsby shewed cause.—The meaning of the proposal made in this case is, that at least a competent number of the 22,500 shares should be subscribed for. The 1st of November was the day fixed for the payment of the deposits, yet on the 8th of September, when the plaintiff executed the subscription deed, there were not 4,000 shares subscribed for. The plaintiff was allowed to execute the deed in ignorance of that fact, which was a suppression by the directors of a fact material for him to know; and, on the authority of Wontner v. Shairp (1), the execution of the deed was obtained by fraud, and the deed is void as against the plaintiff. There was also evidence of fraud to affect the letter of allotment.

[PARKE, B.—The learned Judge reports that no point at all was made about fraud, at the trial; and the only question is, whether there is to be a nonsuit on the construction of the terms of the letter of allotment. Those terms contain a permission to apply the money, and there was no fraud at the time of the deposit. The plaintiff is bound by that, if not by the deed.]

By the terms of the letter of allotment the directors are "to apply the amount paid for deposits in discharge of any liabilities incurred by them under the general powers vested in them for the prosecution of the undertaking." That is prospective, and means general powers to be afterwards conferred on the directors after the execution of the subscribers' deed. That deed, being fraudulent, must be considered out of the case, and then the condition on which the directors were to expend the deposits was never fulfilled. Certainly the directors had no power to use the money until there was a reasonable prospect of their being able to carry out the scheme. [They cited Nockells v. Crosby (2).] Suppose twenty persons only paid their deposits.

[PARKE, B.—Whether the money had been expended with a reasonable prospect of being able to go on with the project, was a question of fact for the jury; and if the plaintiff meant to rely on that, he should not have consented to a nonsuit being entered on the construction of the letter of allotment. Probably the directors might fairly expect that the allottees would perform their contract.]

[ALDERSON, B.—It may be that part of the money was expended in getting in the deposits.]

[PARKE, B.—It may be that the onus was on the defendant to shew how much was expended for necessary matters.]

The directors proceeded on their own responsibility. The money was not to be applied when paid, but when there was a sufficient amount paid to justify the expectation that the project would be carried out.

Townsend and Foulkes, contra, were not called upon.

PARKE, B.—We are all of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The first question in this case is, whether upon the true construction of the letter of allotment the directors of the projected company were empowered to apply the deposit towards such preliminary expenses as the directors may think proper to incur in carrying out the object of the deed. The second question raised relates to the subscribers' agreement, which was executed by the plaintiff. It is contended, by his counsel, that the plaintiff's signature to that deed was obtained by fraud, and that there were circumstances in this case, which, if they had been left to the jury would, according to the case of Wontner v. Shairp, have justified them in coming to the conclusion that the deed was fraudulent, and therefore that the case must be determined without reference to that deed, and upon the letter of allotment only. It does not appear that the learned Judge was asked at the trial to leave any question to the jury upon the deed or letter of allotment; but the plaintiff's counsel consented to have the question of law upon the letter of allotment reserved for our decision. If there had been any question of fraud, the plaintiff's counsel should have insisted upon having it left to the jury; but he did not, as appears from the learned Judge's note, allege fraud with respect to the letter of allotment; and if he had, it is difficult to perceive how he could have made it out. In Wontner v. Shairp there were circumstances tending to shew that the execution of the subscription deed had been obtained by a misrepresentation as to the number of shares allotted; and as in this case it is said there was no sufficient quantity of deposits made, and so that the deed was fraudulent, we will consider the case upon the letter of allotment only.

Now, the letter of allotment, on the construction of which the whole case turns, was issued upon an allotment to the plaintiff of certain shares about the same time as the other allotments were made; and I think the directors must be understood thereby as saying, we shall apply the money deposited in our hands in such manner as we think fit for the purposes of carrying this undertaking into effect, and in discharge of any liabilities we may incur in doing so. One of the terms of the letter of allotment is: "The directors assume the right to carry out their intentions by the adoption of all such measures as they may deem requisite for obtaining the necessary parliamentary powers to form a company for the construction of," &c. "and to apply the amount paid for deposits in discharge of any liabilities incurred by them under the general powers vested in them for the prosecution of the undertaking." The expression "general powers" means those already vested in them, which they have assumed for the purpose of carrying the undertaking into effect; and therefore upon the true construction of this document they may so apply the deposits. The directors had a right to apply the deposits for advertisements, surveys, and necessary plans to be deposited at the Board of Trade, and all reasonable expenses were properly chargeable on the deposits. If there had been an unreasonable application of the deposits that would have raised a question which ought to have been left to the jury. The terms of this letter of allotment distinguish this case from Walstab v. Spottiswoode (3), where no such power was reserved to the directors of the projected company. The directors would be bound to return any surplus or any sum expended after it was clear that the undertaking could not go on; but if all the deposits had been reasonably expended in furtherance of the undertaking the plaintiff could not recover.

ALDERSON, B.—The plaintiff undertakes that the directors may employ the money deposited in their hands for the legitimate purposes of the projected company. If it has been so expended he can have no right to recover it back.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. "General powers" mean those powers which we are now exercising,—which we assume.

places in China and Manilla, all or any, during the ship's stay there for any purposes, and from thence to her port or ports of calling and discharge in the United Kingdom, with liberty to call and stay at all or any parts or places on either side of, and at the Cape of Good Hope. The vessel sailed direct from Liverpool to a port in China, having on board a cargo for that port, and also for Manilla. She afterwards discharged a portion of her cargo at a port in China, and thence proceeded to Manilla, where she discharged the remainder of her outward cargo. At Manilla the captain took on board on freight 230 chests of opium for Tongkoo, and sailed from Manilla (the vessel not being a tenth part laden), intending to seek there a freight back to England, and whilst he was sailing towards Tongkoo the vessel was by the perils of the sea totally lost. Tongkoo is altogether out of the regular course of a voyage from Manilla to England:—Held, by this Court, and also on error in the Exchequer Chamber, that the sailing from Manilla to Tongkoo was not a deviation; the words in the policy meaning not "from Manilla" only, but "from ports or places in China and Manilla, all or any."

Assumpsit upon a policy of insurance for 1,000*l.* upon the ship Mars. The declaration stated a total loss by perils of the seas, and contained counts for money had and received and on an account stated.

Pleas, first, non assumpserunt; secondly, to the first count, a denial of the loss; thirdly, that the loss occurred during a deviation by the consent and direction of the plaintiffs.

Issue was joined on the first two pleas, and to the last the plaintiffs replied de injurid. The facts were afterwards, by a Judge's order and by agreement, stated for the opinion of the Court in the following special case, which was afterwards turned into a special verdict.

CASE.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. Ashley, Brothers, of Liverpool, ship-brokers, and Mr. John Worrall, of Liverpool, merchant (being owners of the ship Mars, of Liverpool; Gardiner master), by Messrs. Wise, Farbridge & Co. their brokers, effected a policy of insurance, dated the 27th of May 1839, with the General Maritime Insurance Com-says that it shall be lawful for the sheriff to take such fees, and no more, as shall from time to time be allowed by any taxing officer of the courts of law, under the sanction and authority of the Judges of such courts. Now it is not shewn here that any scale of fees has been made under the statute of Victoria. If a higher scale of fees than that allowed by the former act has been made, that should have been pleaded; for the Court cannot take judicial notice of it. A court of error could not, if the case were carried there.

As regards the grounds of special demurrer, there can be no doubt that an action on the case, as well as an action of debt, may be founded on the general prohibition in the 28 Eliz.; and in Buckle v. Bewes and Ashby v. Harris the declaration was in the same form as in this case. With respect to the statement of the amount extorted, the declaration was drawn in order to comply with the suggestion thrown out by the Court in Ashby v. Harris, that the amount actually taken should be stated. It is laid under a videlicet, and the sum is not material. Either it is a mere inference of law or a statement of fact for a jury. If the former, the Court, if it be wrong, can see it, and may reject it; if the latter, the Court cannot judicially notice that it is wrong in fact. It is not, therefore, a matter of special demurrer. The plaintiff goes only for the violation of the act, and does not seek to recover treble damages.

Rew, in reply.—If the statement that the defendant took more than is allowed by law be an inference, it is an inconsistent and repugnant statement, of which the Court will take notice. The Court will take judicial notice of the order of the Judges as to the scale of fees under the statute of Victoria, inasmuch as it is the act of the Court done under that statute. The case of Thibault v. Gibson is distinguishable. There the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 37. merely created an exception out of the statute of 12 Anne, st. 2. c. 16: here there are two inconsistent enactments.

[PARKE, B.—There certainly appears to be an inconsistency in the mode of alleging the damage here; but as we should give leave to amend in this respect, we will determine the other point.]

PARKE, B.—This case was argued before my Brothers Alderson, Rolfe, Platt, and myself, at the Sittings after Trinity term, by Mr. Rew, for the plaintiff, and Mr. Cowling, for the defendant, and a question of importance having been raised it stood over for consideration. The declaration was framed upon the statute 29 Eliz. c. 4, and was for the recovery of treble damages against the sheriff of Yorkshire, for taking more than was allowed by that statute for serving and executing a feri facias, and there was a special demurrer assigning several causes, upon which the Court expressed its opinion during the argument, and therefore it is unnecessary to repeat them. The substantial ground of objection to the right of action was, that the remedy given by the statute of Elizabeth is virtually repealed by the 1 Vict. c. 55; or, if it still existed, that it could only be enforced for the receipt of more than was authorized by either statute; and that the declaration should have been framed on both acts, and shewn that the receipt was in violation of both. After much consideration we think that the objection ought not to prevail. The statute of Elizabeth provides, that it shall not be lawful for any sheriff, under-sheriff, &c., or their officers, ministers, servants, bailiffs, or deputies, by reason or colour of their offices, to take of any persons, directly or indirectly, for the serving and executing of any extent or execution, more or other recompense than by that act is limited and appointed, which is thereby made lawful to be had, received, and taken, viz. 1s. in the pound, up to 100l., and 6d. in the pound above that sum, upon pain that the officer offending shall pay treble damages to the party grieved, and forfeit 40l., half to the Crown, half to the informer. The statute 1 Vict. c. 35. was passed to increase and fix the remuneration to be paid to the sheriff and his officers according to the discretion of the Judges. It first recites the statutes 42 Edw. 3. c. 9. and 1 Hen. 5. c. 4, containing prohibitions to under-sheriffs, sheriff's clerks and bailiffs continuing in office beyond certain times, and repeats those prohibitions. It then refers to 23 Hen. 6. c. 9, which limits the fees to be taken to 20d. to the sheriff, and 4d. to the bailiff, for an arrest or attachment, and 4d. to the sheriff for making a return, and repeals that portion of the statute; and then by section 2. provides, that from the passing of the act it should be lawful for the sheriffs or their officers, concerned in the execution of process directed to sheriffs, to demand, take, and receive such fees, and no more, as shall from time to time be allowed by any officer of the several courts of law at Westminster, charged with the duty of taxing costs in such courts under the sanction and authority of the Judges of the said courts respectively; and the 3rd section gives a summary jurisdiction over such officers as shall extort, take, or receive any fee, gratuity, or reward not allowed as aforsaid.

This statute does not recite the 29 Eliz. c. 4, nor expressly repeal it, or any part of it. It leaves the sheriff's right to poundage untouched, as this Court has already decided in the case of Davies v. Griffith. But it is said, that it impliedly repeals the statute of Elizabeth, and the clause inflicting a penalty. If the statute of Victoria had enacted that it should be lawful in all cases to take more for the future than the statute of Elizabeth allows, no difficulty would have arisen in holding the statute of Elizabeth to have been thereby abrogated and rendered inoperative afterwards, upon the well known principle, that leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant. It would not be strictly correct to say, that it was repealed, because a repeal has the effect of annulling the statute, as if it had never been made. But the statute of Victoria provides only that the sheriff, &c. shall take so much as shall be allowed by any officer with the sanction of the Judges of the Court from which the process issues; and some difficulty arises as to the meaning of that clause. By the words of the second section it seems to have contemplated that there should be a taxation in each case before the claim by the sheriff, or other officer, should be lawful; and, consequently, that the third section giving a remedy against officers, would apply only to cases where fees were demanded and received by them after taxation, which construction would render that section almost inoperative. Such can hardly have been the intention of the framer of the act; but if any doubt could be entertained in that respect, it is quite certain that the sanction of the Judges of each Court could not have been intended to be required to each act of allowance by the officer; and the sanction meant by the act must have been by some general order or regulation of the Judges providing for classes of cases; and in that sense it has been understood by them. The effect, therefore, of the statute of Victoria is to legalize the receipt of fees beyond the poundage, only if the Judges should make a regulation, and only in those cases in which the Judges should by such regulation permit it; and it was by no means certain that any would ever be made, or, if made, that it would apply to writs of execution.

The truth is, that the statute gives the power only to the Judges of allowing, and thereby rendering lawful, an additional payment for the executing of a fi. fa.; but it does not absolutely legalize any. The Judges might never exercise their power, in any case; or if they did, might not choose to make any additional allowance for the proceeds of execution. It was wholly contingent whether the statute of Elizabeth would be altered or abrogated in pursuance of the statute of Victoria or not; it depended wholly upon the exercise of the power given to the Judges; and if the Court could take notice that the Judges have exercised that power, as perhaps they ought, (for they are bound to take notice of the course of proceeding of all the superior courts,) still we could not assume that such regulation had been made before the particular sum mentioned in the declaration was received; and, consequently, for anything that appears, (whatever we may suspect from the dates,) the statute of Elizabeth was in full force, unaltered in any respect at the time of the alleged offence; and, therefore, the declaration seems to us to be sufficient. If it had appeared by the declaration or by plea simply stating that fact, that the receipt was since the date of the Judges' regulation, it would have raised a different question.

There is a further reason for which we come to the same conclusion. If the statutes of Victoria had expressly enacted in positive terms, that in all cases in which the sheriff took no more than the additional sums which should be allowed and sanctioned by the Judges, they should be exempt from the penalties of the statute of Elizabeth, there is no doubt that the declaration would have been good; and if the defendant was authorized by the regulation under the statute of Victoria, that regulation and the acting in pursuance of it must have come by way of defence from the defendant, and that upon the principle laid down in the note in 1 Saund. p. 262, b, and acted upon in the case of Thibault v. Gibson, as being an exemption contained in a subsequent act.

The question then is, whether the enactment of the statute of Victoria is not in effect the same thing as a positive contingent exemption from the operation of the statute of Elizabeth, which still continues in force; and we think that it is, and that the operation of the statute of Victoria is to constitute an exemption from the statute in those cases only, in the same way as if it had expressly enacted that such cases should be exempt from the operation of the statute of Elizabeth; and, consequently, that the declaration is sufficient on this ground; and therefore our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

If the defendant will procure an affidavit that no more was taken than the scale of fees allowed, he may be let in to amend on the usual terms.

Pleading — Several Counts—Reg. Gen. Hil. Term, 4 Will. 4. r. 5.—Railway—Sale of Shares—Money paid.

In assumpsit, a count for money paid was pleaded with a special count which stated in substance, that in consideration of the plaintiff having, at the defendant's request, contracted to sell to a third party on his own credit and responsibility certain shares in a railway company, of which the defendant was the registered holder, the defendant promised to deliver to him all new shares allotted in respect of such shares while he continued the registered holder thereof, on payment to him of all payments made by him to the company in respect of such new shares, and to indemnify the plaintiff from all loss which might arise by reason of the non-performance of his said promise; alleging the non-delivery to the plaintiff of certain new shares so allotted to the defendant, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff had necessarily expended a large sum of money in the purchase of other shares, in order to perform his said contract of sale:—Held, not to be in violation of the pleading rules of Hilary term, 4 Will. 4. r. 5, whereby several counts are not to be allowed, unless a distinct subject-matter of complaint is intended to be established in respect of each.

This was a motion for a rule to shew cause why the first or second count of the declaration in this case should not be struck out at the cost of the plaintiff, on the ground that both those counts were founded on the same subject-matter of complaint, unless a Judge at chambers, upon reference had to him, shall allow the counts to stand under the conditions of the rule of Hil. term, 4 Will. 4, rules 6 & 7.

The first count of the declaration stated that theretofore and before the commencement of this suit, and before and at the time of making the promise thereafter mentioned, and thence afterwards, to wit, hitherto, the defendant was lawfully possessed and the registered holder of divers, to wit, fifty shares of and in a certain railway company, that is to say, the Leeds and Bradford Railway Company, being a company mentioned in and incorporated by a certain act of parliament, made and passed in the 8th year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled, "An act for making a railway from Leeds to Bradford, with a branch to the North Midland Railway," and thereupon, before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on &c., in consideration of the premises, and that the plaintiff at the request and on the behalf of the defendant had theretofore, to wit, then, in the name of him, the plaintiff, and on the personal credit and responsibility of him, the plaintiff, contracted to sell fifty shares of and in the said railway company, that is to say, the said fifty shares, to certain persons unknown to the defendant, and to which said persons also the defendant was unknown, at and for certain prices in that behalf, that is to say, twenty of the said shares, to wit, to one Thomas Hemmant, at and for the price of 22*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* for each and every of the said last-mentioned shares, and thirty of the said shares, to wit, to certain persons carrying on business under the name or firm of Messrs. Rhodes & Co., at and for the price of 23*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* for each and every of the said last-mentioned shares, with all advantages which should accrue in respect of or be incident to the said shares respectively, he, the defendant, then promised the plaintiff, amongst other things, to deliver to the plaintiff all the scrip in respect of all new shares in the said company, which should be issued to and received by the defendant in respect of such new shares, which said new shares should be allotted in respect of the said fifty shares respectively, or any of them, to the defendant as the registered holder of the last-mentioned shares, or any of them; that is to say, prior to the defendant ceasing to be the registered holder thereof, under or in consequence of the said contracts of sale, on payment and satisfaction by the plaintiff to the defendant, of all payments made by the defendant as such registered holder to the said company in respect of such new shares and such scrip, and to save harmless and indemnify the plaintiff from all loss, damage, costs, and charges which should or might arise or happen to, or be incurred by the plaintiff for or by reason of the non-performance, non-observance or non-fulfilment by means of the defendant of the said contracts entered into by the plaintiff in manner aforesaid, or either of them, or any part thereof respectively. And the plaintiff, in fact, saith, that afterwards and whilst the defendant continued to be and was lawfully possessed of, and the registered holder of divers of the said fifty shares, and before ceasing to be such, under or in consequence of the said contracts of sale, or otherwise, to wit, twenty thereof, to wit, on &c., the said railway company allotted to the defendant, as and then being such registered holder thereof, divers, to wit, twenty new shares in the said company of 50*l.* each respectively, and twenty other new shares therein of 12*l.* 10*s.* each respectively, under and subject to the payment of, to wit, 5*l.* by the hundred of the said amounts of the said several new shares so allotted, that is to say, the sum of 62*l.* 10*s.*, by the defendant to the said company, on or before the 20th of December in the year last aforesaid; and afterwards, to wit, on &c., he, the defendant, having theretofore, to wit, on &c., paid to the said railway company the said 5*l.* by the hundred of the said amounts, that is to say, the said sum of 62*l.* 10*s.* in respect of the said several new shares so allotted as aforesaid, the said company thereupon then and whilst the defendant continued such registered holder as aforesaid, issued to the defendant, and the defendant then received from the said company twenty scrip, in respect of the said twenty new shares of 50*l.* each, so allotted as aforesaid, and twenty other scrip, in respect of the said twenty other new shares of 12*l.* 10*s.* each so allotted as aforesaid. And the plaintiff further says, that the said sum of 5*l.* by the hundred, so amounting as aforesaid, so paid as aforesaid, was the only payment made by the defendant as such registered holder as aforesaid, to the said company, in respect of such new shares as aforesaid and such scrip, and that he, the plaintiff, has always, from the time of the said allotting of the said new shares, been ready and willing to pay to the said defendant the said sums so amounting as aforesaid, under and subject whereto the said several new shares were so allotted as aforesaid, and afterwards and within a reasonable time after the said shares were so allotted as aforesaid, to wit, on &c., offered to the defendant to pay him the said sums so amounting as aforesaid, and then requested him, the defendant, to deliver to him, the plaintiff, the said scrip, in respect of the several new shares in the said company, of all which the defendant, to wit, then, had notice. Nevertheless the defendant disregarded his said promise in this, to wit, that although a reasonable time from and after the said request, and also from and after the said receipt by the defendant of the said scrip, had elapsed before the commencement of this suit for the delivery of the said scrip by the defendant to the plaintiff, the defendant did not nor would, when he was so requested as aforesaid, or at any other time deliver the said scrip, or any part thereof, to the plaintiff, by means and in consequence whereof the plaintiff was afterwards and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, forced and obliged to expend, and did expend, by reason of the said contract so made by him as aforesaid, and the said neglect of the defendant as aforesaid, divers large sums of money to a large amount, to wit, 710*l.*, in and about the purchase of twenty other of the said new shares of 50*l.* each, and of twenty other thereof at 12*l.* 10*s.* each, in order and for the purpose of performing the said contract so made with the said Thomas Hemmant as aforesaid, and in and about the discharging and satisfying the loss and damages caused by the inability of the plaintiff to perform the said contract as aforesaid, so made by him on behalf of the defendant as aforesaid, and has lost all interests, gains, and profits which he might and otherwise would have made from using the said sum of money so expended as aforesaid. And for assigning a further breach of the said promise of the defendant, the plaintiff says, that although afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant of the last-mentioned premises, and then requested the defendant to save harmless and indemnify him, the said plaintiff, from and against the said sums of money so laid out and expended by the plaintiff for the due performance of the said contract for sale as aforesaid, and from and against all loss and damage in respect thereof, yet the defendant did not nor would when he was so requested as last aforesaid, or at any other time, indemnify and save harmless the plaintiff from the said sums of money or any part thereof, or of all loss and damage in respect thereof, but hath wholly neglected and refused so to do, by means whereof the plaintiff hath from thence hitherto lost and been deprived of the use and benefit of the said sums of money, and of divers great gains and profits amounting, to wit, to 1,000*l.*, which he might, and but for the premises, would have had and received in respect thereof. The second count was for money paid by the plaintiff for the use of the defendant.

Atherton, in support of the motion.—The special count discloses a contract whereby, in consideration of the plaintiff having at the defendant's request contracted to sell to a third party on his own personal credit and responsibility certain shares in a railway company, of which the defendant was the registered holder, the defendant promised the plaintiff to deliver to him all new shares allotted in respect of the said shares, while he was the registered holder thereof, on payment to him of all payments made by him to the company in respect of such new shares; and to save harmless and indemnify the plaintiff from all loss incurred by him by reason of the non-performance of his, the defendant's, said promise. It then alleges, in substance, the non-delivery to the plaintiff of certain new shares so allotted to the defendant, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff had to expend a large sum of money in the purchase of other shares for the purpose of performing his said contract of sale. The count therefore states circumstances under which the defendant is liable as for money paid. The plaintiff has been deprived of the use of his money, which he was compelled to expend by reason of the defendant having failed to fulfil his engagement, and which he paid under the defendant's promise to indemnify him from any loss. The case of Bayliffe v. Butterworth (1) in this court, last term, is an authority for saying, that under the circumstances disclosed in this count the plaintiff may recover on the count for money paid. There the defendant had employed the plaintiff, a sharebroker at Liverpool, to sell twenty railway scrip for him; and the plaintiff sold them to another Liverpool sharebroker. In consequence of the defendant not having delivered the shares to the purchaser at the proper time, the purchaser bought twenty other scrip in the market at an advanced price, and the plaintiff had to pay the difference. By the usage of the Liverpool share-market, brokers were responsible to each other for the fulfilment of such contracts; and it was held that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the difference upon the count for money paid.

It is money paid by the plaintiff under a contract, with respect to which the defendant has indemnified him from loss. The plaintiff enters into a legal liability, at the request of the defendant, and pays the money under that liability, and in consequence of the defendant's default.

[PARKE, B.—There is no averment here of any custom, as in the case of Bayliffe v. Butterworth. The defendant desires the plaintiff to enter into a contract for the sale of certain shares for him, and agrees to indemnify him from any loss he may sustain by the non-delivery to him of any new shares which may be allotted to the defendant. It would be going a step beyond what we decided last term, if we were to grant this application.]

All that is stated here might be given in evidence under non assumpsit to the second count; and therefore the pleading of these two counts together is in violation of the Pleading Rule of Hilary term, 4 Will. 4. whereby "several counts shall not be allowed unless a distinct subject-matter of complaint is intended to be established in respect of each."

Per Curiam (2). — There ought to be no rule.

1847. } BOULCOTT AND ANOTHER v.
Feb. 15. } GEORGE WOOLCOTT.*

Pleading — Replication — Departure — Bill of Exchange.

In an action on a bill of exchange the declaration stated that certain persons using the name and style of J. B. & Co., by that name and designation drew a bill of exchange on Messrs. G. & E. W. and indorsed the said bill to the defendant, who indorsed it to the plaintiffs. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiffs were the persons mentioned in the declaration as using the name and style of J. B. & Co. and as so making the bill; that the indorsement of the bill to the defendant was in fact an indorsement by the plaintiffs in the said name and style of J. B. & Co., and that they so indorsed it to him before he indorsed the same to them; and that, at the time of his so indorsing the bill to the plaintiffs, they were liable to pay the amount to him, according to their previous indorsement. The plaintiffs replied, stating an agreement between them and the defendant and G. & E. W. to forbear and give time to the defendant and G. & E. W. for the payment of another bill accepted by G. W. and indorsed by E. W. the maker, to the defendant and by him to the plaintiffs, till the time for payment of the bill declared on had elapsed, and then averred that the plaintiffs had forborne accordingly:—Held, that the replication was bad, as being a departure from the declaration.

Assumpsit. The declaration stated that certain persons using the name and style of Joseph Boulcott & Co., by that name and designation, on the 4th of February 1846, made their bill of exchange, and directed the same to certain persons using the name and style of Messrs. G. & E. Woolcott, by that name and designation, and thereby required the said Messrs. G. & E. Woolcott to pay to the order of them, the said J. Boulcott & Co., 101*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, at one month after the date thereof, which period had elapsed before the commencement of the suit; and that the said J. Boulcott & Co., by that name and designation, then indorsed the said bill to the defendant, who then indorsed the same to the plaintiffs. Averment of non-payment by Messrs. G. & E. Woolcott.

Fifth plea, to the first count, that the plaintiffs were and are the said persons in the said count mentioned as using the name and style of J. Boulcott & Co., and as so making the said bill by the said name and style, and that the said indorsement of the said bill to him, the defendant, was, in truth and in fact, an indorsement by the plaintiffs in the said name and style of J. Boulcott & Co.; and that in truth and in fact the plaintiffs did so indorse the said bill to him, the defendant, before he indorsed the same to them, modo et formá; that the plaintiffs were, at the time when he so indorsed the said bill to them, liable to pay the amount thereof to him, the defendant, according to the tenour and effect of the same and of their previous indorsement thereof to him; and that they, by reason of their said indorsement of the said bill to him, would be liable to pay him the amount thereof upon his paying the same to them. Verification.

Replication, that before the plaintiffs indorsed the said bill to the defendant, or the defendant indorsed the same to the plaintiffs, as in the plea mentioned, and before the same was made, and before the date thereof, and before the time for the payment thereof had elapsed, to wit, on &c., G. Woolcott the younger, and E. Woolcott, to whom * Decided in the sittings after Hilary term, 1847.

(2) Pollock, C.B., Parke, B., Alderson, B., and Rolfe, B.

the said bill of exchange was directed, by the names of Messrs. G. & E. Woolcott, and the defendant were respectively indebted to the plaintiffs in 100*l.* upon a certain bill of exchange, dated the 1st of August 1845, made by the said E. Woolcott, and directed to and accepted by the said G. Woolcott the younger, for the payment to the order of the said E. Woolcott of 146*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*, at six months after the date thereof, and indorsed by the said E. Woolcott to the defendant, and by the defendant to the plaintiffs; and thereupon it was then agreed between the plaintiffs, the defendant, and the said G. Woolcott the younger and E. Woolcott respectively, that the plaintiffs should forbear and give time for the payment of the said sum of 100*l.* for a certain time, to wit, until the time for the payment of the bill of exchange in the first count mentioned had elapsed, and that in consideration thereof, the said G. Woolcott the younger and E. Woolcott should accept, and the defendant should indorse the bill of exchange in the first count mentioned; that in pursuance of the said agreement they made the said bill of exchange in the first count mentioned, and then indorsed the same to the defendant as in the first count mentioned, for the mere purpose of the defendant indorsing the same to the plaintiffs, in pursuance of the said agreement; and that there never was any value or consideration for the indorsement of the said bill by the plaintiffs to the defendant, or for the payment by the plaintiffs, or any or either of them, to the defendant of the amount thereof, or of any part thereof; and the defendant then indorsed the said bill to the plaintiffs in pursuance of the said agreement, and upon and for value and consideration to the amount of the said bill, to wit, the money so due from the said G. Woolcott the younger, and E. Woolcott and the defendant, respectively, upon the said bill, and the forbearance of the plaintiffs as aforesaid. And the plaintiffs further say that they did forbear and give time for the payment of the said sum of 100*l.* to the said G. Woolcott the younger, and E. Woolcott and the defendant, respectively, until the period for the payment of the bill of exchange in the first count mentioned had elapsed. Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning for causes, amongst others, that although the plaintiffs in their declaration allege the defendant to have become liable to them solely by reason of his having indorsed to them the said bill, and by the custom of merchants, and according to his indorsement, yet the replication discloses that the defendant's liability upon his indorsement is wholly dependent on a supposed agreement, stated in the replication, as precedent to the making and indorsing of the said bill; and that in so stating the agreement as the ground of the defendant's liability, the replication is a departure from the declaration; and that the agreement ought to have been declared upon specially.

Peacock, in support of the demurrer.—The replication contains that which is a departure from the declaration. The declaration states that certain persons, that is, certain persons other than the plaintiffs, made the bill in question, and indorsed it to the plaintiffs. The plea states that the plaintiffs made and indorsed the bill to the defendant, before he indorsed it to them. This is admitted by the replication, which then proceeds to allege that the plaintiffs are entitled to sue the defendant by virtue of a certain contract which they set forth, and which is quite distinct from the custom of merchants on which the declaration is founded. The replication, therefore, shews clearly that the plaintiffs' right to recover is not upon the bill, but upon the new contract set forth in the declaration.

[PLATT, B.—Is not circuity of action got rid of by pleading the agreement?]

The defendant's argument is, that the replication discloses that which is a departure. If the persons stated in the declaration to have used the name and style of Joseph Boulcott & Co. had been there alleged to be the plaintiffs, the declaration would have been bad on the face of it.

PARKE, B.—The declaration can be good only on the ground of Joseph Boulcott & Co. being other persons than the plaintiffs; if they are the same persons the declaration is bad. The plea alleges that they are the same persons, and the replication, admitting that, states a different cause of action. This mode of replying makes the declaration a bad one, and sets up a new ground for suing the defendant. I think there is a departure in this case, and that the defendant is entitled to our judgment. The plaintiffs may have leave to amend, and unless they do so, there will be judgment for the defendant.

Willes, for the plaintiffs, elected to amend.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff was a surgeon and accoucheur, and that he had been employed to attend, and had attended one R. in her confinement; that the defendant, in a discourse with the said R. of and concerning the plaintiff in relation to his said profession, falsely &c. spoke and published the following words:—"I wonder you had him to attend you. Do you know him? he is not an apothecary; he has not passed any examination; he is a bad character; none of the medical men here will meet him. There have been many inquests had upon persons who have died because he had attended them." At the trial the words proved, as to the inquests, were "several have died that the plaintiff has attended, and there have been inquests held upon them:"—Held, that the Judge was right in allowing the declaration to be amended, by inserting the words proved.

Held, also, that if the amended words could have been answered by a plea of justification, and the words originally inserted could not, the counsel for the defendant should have applied to the Judge to postpone the trial.

Held, also, that the words as amended were actionable; and, semble, that the words "he is a bad character; none of the medical men here will meet him," were also actionable.

This was an action of slander for words spoken of the plaintiff in his profession of a surgeon and accoucheur. The declaration stated, that the plaintiff before and at, &c.

was and still is a surgeon and accoucheur, residing and carrying on his profession and business of a surgeon and accoucheur at Cambridge, in the county of Cambridge; that before the committing of the said grievances by the defendant, one Isabella Reay, being the wife of one Edward Reay, and residing and living at Cambridge aforesaid, had been delivered of a child, and the plaintiff had been employed and retained as such surgeon and accoucheur to attend, and had attended the said Isabella Reay, upon the occasion of her said confinement, and had delivered the said Isabella Reay of the said child, with skill, credit, and reputation; yet the defendant, intending to injure the plaintiff in the way of his said profession and business, heretofore, to wit, on &c. in a certain discourse which the defendant then had with the said Isabella Reay of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning the plaintiff in relation to his said profession and business in the presence and hearing of the said Isabella Reay and of one Isabella Wilkinson, and of divers other persons, falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning the plaintiff in relation to his said profession and business of a surgeon and accoucheur, the false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory words following, that is to say, "I" (meaning the defendant) "wonder that you" (meaning the said Isabella Reay) "had him" (meaning the plaintiff) "to attend you," (meaning the said Isabella Reay, and meaning the attendance on her, the said Isabella Reay, in her said confinement). Do you (meaning the said Isabella Reay) know him (meaning the plaintiff)? he (meaning the plaintiff) is not an apothecary; he (meaning the plaintiff) has not passed any examination; he (meaning the plaintiff) is a bad character; none of the medical men here (meaning the said town of Cambridge) will meet him (meaning the plaintiff); there have been many inquests had upon persons who have died, because he (meaning the plaintiff) had attended them" (meaning the plaintiff's attendance on the said last-mentioned persons in the way of his said profession and business). By means of the committing of which said several grievances by the defendant as aforesaid, the plaintiff hath been and is greatly injured in his said good name, fame, and credit, and reputation as such surgeon and accoucheur as aforesaid, &c., to the plaintiff's damage of 500*l.*, &c.

At the trial, before Pollock, C.B., at the Spring Assizes for Cambridge, 1847, it appeared that the words used with reference to the inquests were, "several have died that Mr. Southes attended, and there have been inquests held on them." The learned Judge allowed the plaintiff to amend his declaration, and left the amended words to the jury. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 50*l.*

Andrews having obtained a rule for a new trial, on the ground of the amendment having been improperly made, and also on the ground of misdirection,—

Naylor (Byles, Serj. with him) shewed cause (June 21).—The declaration contains separate and independent slanders. There is enough to support the verdict without the amended portion. It was impossible to think that the bad character referred to anything else than the defendant's profession.

[PARKE, B. referred to Doyley v. Roberts (1), and Ayre v. Craven (2). The question is, were the words spoken of his professional conduct?]

The words "none of the medical men here will meet him," clearly import that in the opinion of other medical men he was unfit to practise as an accoucheur. The learned Judge told the jury that the question was, whether the words were used, and whether their reasonable meaning was injurious to the plaintiff; and if they were used and were injurious, the question would then be as to the amount of damage. This, it is submitted, was correct.

Andrews, in support of the rule.—First, as to the amendment, which is important. The 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 23. only gives power to amend "in a matter not material to the merits of the case, and by which the opposite party cannot have been prejudiced in the conduct of his defence." Here the matter was material.

[PARKE, B.—The real merit of this case is, whether the defendant has been guilty of slander.]

[ALDERSON, B.—If the other words be

(2) 2 Ad. & EL 2; s. c. 4 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) B.B. 35.

actionable, the amendment no doubt was reasonable.]

The defendant could not have justified the words originally introduced, but he could have justified the amended words. He was therefore injured in the conduct of his defence.

[PARKE, B.—If so, you should have applied to postpone the trial.]

The words "he is a bad character; no medical man will meet him," do not necessarily refer to his profession of a surgeon. They might have been spoken of a clergyman or any one else. He cited Lumley v. Allday (3).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—That case clearly disconnects the charge from the question of the profession.]

At all events the amended words were left to the jury, and may have affected the damages.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

PARKE, B.—On the trial of this case, which was an action for slander, the Lord Chief Baron directed an amendment; and a rule nisi for a new trial having been granted, the propriety of that decision has been discussed. We think that the amendment was proper under the circumstances, and that the rule must be discharged. The declaration stated that the plaintiff was a surgeon and accoucheur; that in that character he had attended one Mrs. Reay during her confinement, and that the defendant in a discourse which he had with her of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning the plaintiff in relation to his said profession and business, spoke of and concerning, &c. certain false, scandalous and defamatory words, with proper innuendoes, to connect them with the plaintiff, viz. "I wonder you had him to attend you. Do you know him? He is not an apothecary; he has not passed any examination; he is a bad character: none of the medical men here will meet him. There have been many inquests held upon persons who have died, because he attended them" (meaning the said plaintiff's attendance in the way of his profession and business). On the trial, the latter words as to the coroner's inquests were not proved, but the words used appeared to be, "Several have died that the plaintiff has attended, and there have been inquests held upon them." The counsel for the plaintiff applied to the Lord Chief Baron to amend. The defendant's counsel objected, on the ground that the variance was not of the description contemplated by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, since it was not in a matter not material to the merits of the case, for there was a substantial difference between the words alleged and those proved to have been spoken; and it has been since argued before us, that the defendant might have justified the words as proved, although he could not have justified those contained in the declaration. The amendment being made, Mr. Andrews, on the part of the defendant, contended that the words were still not actionable, and that as the Lord Chief Baron in his summing up had ruled that they were actionable, the defendant was entitled to a new trial. It was doubted whether the Lord Chief Baron had so summed up, but from the notes of counsel it would appear that he was understood to have so done, and that the jury probably gave damages on that supposition. We think, that the Chief Baron was well justified, both in making the amendment and treating the amended words as being actionable. As to the amendment, the variance was material, no doubt, in one sense; that is, it prevented the plaintiff from recovering for that part of the words spoken, but it was such as the Judge might properly deem to be immaterial to the merits of the case, that is, to the dispute, whether words had been uttered imputing to the plaintiff the sort of want of skill, care and professional qualities contained in the allegation in the declaration, the precise words being immaterial. In this sense, the variance was immaterial to the real question, for the words spoken did really imply the same sort of slander as there alleged and positively expressed; and we also think it was one which the Chief Baron might well decide to be such as could not prejudice the defendant in the conduct of the defence, and therefore could direct to be amended immediately; for as the defendant did not plead a justification to the words alleged, he might be reasonably expected not to be able to justify the words as amended, for in truth they import, when read in connexion with the others spoken, the same slander, or at least a similar case differing only in degree; and as we are informed by the Lord Chief Baron that no request was made by the defendant's counsel to postpone the cause, to enable him to plead a justification to the words actually used, we think that the Chief Baron was justified in making the amendment instant. The words, as amended, without the aid of any innuendo to explain them by reference to extrinsic circumstances are, in our judgment, actionable, for their plain and obvious meaning, when taken together, imputes to the plaintiff a want of proper qualification for his profession or business of surgeon and accoucheur. The words which are to be assumed for this purpose to be false and malicious begin with an expression of an opinion that the plaintiff was an unfit person to attend Mrs. Reay. The defendant then proceeds to state that the plaintiff is a bad character in such a sense as to render him, in the judgment of his professional brethren, unfit to meet them, so that he is a person who, in a case of necessity requiring a consultation with others, could not obtain the benefit of their assistance for his patient; and we should incline to think that these words alone are actionable, for they do import a want of a necessary qualification for a surgeon in the ordinary discharge of his professional duties. But the remaining words are, in our opinion, actionable; for, according to their ordinary sense, and when meant as a reason for the opinion of the speaker that the plaintiff was unfit to be employed, they do obviously import that the plaintiff was so deficient in skill or care as that he had either caused his patients to die, or, at least, that coroner's inquests had been held, in which the inquiry had been whether he had not been the cause of the death of many persons. We follow the rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough, in Woolnoth v. Meadows (4), in which words as little definite, importing a charge of crime, were held actionable, because, without the aid of any innuendo, they did, in their plain and obvious meaning, import it.

K., son of the said T. K. and A. K., his heirs and assigns for ever. But in case the said J. G. K. should not survive T. K. and A. K., and should die without an heir lawfully begotten, then and in such case the testatrix devised the same to the next heir of the said T. and A. K., their heirs and assigns for ever. J. G. K. died an infant in the lifetime of his parents; but soon after his death, another son of T. and A. K. was born, who was also called J. G. K. A. K. died in 1795. The second J. G. K. married, and had issue a son J. K., and died in 1823. T. K. died in 1842:—Held, that the words “next heir” meant the person who should fill the character of true heir of T. and A. K.; and that, therefore, the executory devise over took effect only on the death of T. K., the surviving devisee for life, when the estate vested in J. K. the lessor of the plaintiff, who then filled the character of heir of T. and A. K.*

This was an ejectment brought on the demise of John Knight, dated the 10th of July 1822, to recover “one undivided moiety or half part of and in a farm and lands in the parish of Martock, in the county of Somerset.” At the trial, before Platt, B., at the Summer Assizes for that county, 1845, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court on the following

CASE.

The lessor of the plaintiff claims to be entitled, under the will of Elizabeth Goodden, hereinafter set out. By indentures of lease and release, bearing date the 15th and 16th of May 1758, the release being made between Edward Damer and Mary his wife of the first part, Richard Maddock of the second part, Thomas Goodden and Ann Damer, spinster, daughter of the said Edward Damer, of the third part, and Edward Patten and Jonathan Warre of the fourth part, certain tenements and lands (including the entirety of the lands, one undivided moiety whereof is sought to be recovered in this action) were limited, after the solemnization of a then intended marriage, which afterwards took effect, between the said Thomas Goodden and Ann Damer, to the following uses, that is to say, to the use of the said Thomas Goodden, for his life, without impeachment of waste; remainder to the use of the said Edward Patten and Jonathan Warre, and their heirs, during the life of the said Thomas Goodden, in trust to support the contingent uses therein limited; remainder to the use of such child or children of the body of the said Thomas Goodden on the body of the said Ann to be begotten, his, her, and their heirs, in such shares and proportions, and for such estates and interests, and charged with the payment of such sum or sums of money to any other the child or children of the said then intended marriage, and in such manner as the said Thomas Goodden and Ann his intended wife, or the survivor of them, should, by any deed or deeds in writing, or by his or her last will and testament in writing, under the hands and seals of the survivor of them, attested by two or more credible witnesses, give, grant, limit, direct, or appoint; and in default of such gift, grant, limitation, direction, or appointment, and subject thereto, to various uses which did not take effect. The said Thomas Goodden and Ann Damer were married on the 20th of August 1756. The said Thomas Goodden died before his wife, on the 12th of October 1779. There was issue of Thomas Goodden and Ann Damer five children. Of these children there were two only, viz., Ann and Elizabeth, who became material to the title. Ann was born on the 7th of September 1762, was married to Thomas Knight on the 25th of November 1783, and died on the 9th of January 1796; Elizabeth was born on the 27th of February 1764, and died unmarried on the 24th of February 1787. The said Ann Goodden (formerly Ann Damer), after the death of Thomas Goodden, her husband, by an indenture of appointment, bearing date the 8th of March 1784, and made between the said Ann Goodden of the one part, and the said Thomas Knight and Ann his wife (formerly the said Ann Goodden, spinster), and the said Elizabeth Goodden of the other part, in pursuance of the power vested in her by the hereinbefore mentioned indentures, duly limited and appointed the lands and tenements included in those indentures, from and after the death of the said Ann Goodden, to the use of the said Ann Knight and Elizabeth Goodden, in fee, as tenants in common. The said Elizabeth Goodden died before her mother, on the 24th of February 1787, seised, by virtue of the before-mentioned appointment, of the reversion in fee, expectant on the death of her mother, of and in one undivided moiety of the said tenements and lands mentioned in the above-mentioned indentures. The said Elizabeth Goodden being so seised made a will, dated the 11th of December 1786, under which the lessor of the plaintiff now claims title. The material parts of this will, which was duly executed and attested to pass real estate, were as follows:—"This is the last will and testament of me, Elizabeth Goodden, of Bower Hinton, in the parish of Martock, in the county of Somerset, spinster. I give and devise all and singular the messuages, tenements, lands, and hereditaments, which I am seised of or entitled unto, either in possession or reversion, remainder or expectancy, situate, lying, and being within the parish of Martock aforesaid, or elsewhere, in the said county of Somerset, unto my brother-in-law and sister Ann Knight, his wife, of Bower Hinton aforesaid, yeoman, for and during the term of their natural lives; and from and after their deceases I give and devise the same unto my nephew, John Goodden Knight, son of my said brother-in-law and sister Ann Knight, his heirs and assigns for ever; but in case the said John Goodden Knight should not survive my said brother-in-law and sister, Thomas and Ann Knight, and should die without an heir lawfully begotten, then and in such case I give and devise the same to the next heir of the said Thomas and Ann Knight, my brother-in-law and sister as aforesaid, their heirs and assigns for ever. I also give and bequeath unto my said brother-in-law and sister Ann Knight, all such lands in Martock aforesaid, as I am entitled unto for any term or number of years, to hold unto my said brother-in-law and sister Ann Knight, and their assigns, for and during the term of their natural lives; and from and after their decease, I give and bequeath the same unto their son John Goodden Knight, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and his heirs lawfully begotten. And as and for and concerning all and other my personal estate whatsoever, I give and bequeath the same unto my said brother-in-law and my sister Ann Knight, his wife as aforesaid, whom I hereby appoint sole executor and executrix of this my last will and testament."

The said Ann Goodden, the mother of the said testatrix, died in January 1796. John Goodden Knight, mentioned in the said will, died shortly after the testatrix, viz. in June 1787, without issue; in fact, he was then a child not a year old. Soon after the death of this son, another son of the said Thomas and Ann Knight was born, who was also called J. Goodden. This last J. G. Knight was born in November 1787. On the 3rd of November 1811 he married Mary Welch; and he died in June 1823. The lessor of the plaintiff is the eldest son of the marriage of the said last-mentioned J. G. Knight and Mary his wife. The said T. Knight and Ann his wife are both dead. The said Ann, the wife, died in December 1795, and the said T. Knight died in June 1842. [The case then set forth indentures of lease and release of the 1st and 2nd of July 1814, whereby T. Knight, and the last-mentioned J. G. Knight, the latter being stated therein to be entitled to the reversion in fee of the undivided moiety of the lands in question, under the will of Elizabeth Goodden, as surviving son and heir-at-law of A. Knight, conveyed the undivided moiety in fee to parties under whom the defendants claimed title. The case also stated various proceedings under an act, 59 Geo. 3, for inclosing lands within the parishes of Martock and Muchelney, in the county of Somerset, which, on behalf of the defendants, it was contended had the effect of a partition and exchange, whereby the parties entitled to the entirety of the lands of E. Goodden would, after the award made under the act, be entitled to the entirety of the lands awarded, and not to an undivided moiety; and consequently, that even if the lessor of the plaintiff had a good title under the will of E. Goodden, such title would not support the demise in this ejectment. With respect to this part of the case no report is necessary.] The lessor of the plaintiff claims to be entitled to the undivided moiety sought to be recovered in this action, under the said will of the said E. Goodden, notwithstanding the said indentures of the 1st and 2nd of July 1814, and notwithstanding the said proceedings under the Inclosure Act. The defendants contend that the lessor of the plaintiff is not entitled to recover under the said will, and that even if he shews any title under the said will, he cannot, upon the facts disclosed in the case, maintain an action in the present form for the undivided moiety of the said premises. If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the verdict entered for him was to stand, otherwise the verdict was to be entered for the defendants.

The case was argued, on the 25th and 27th of January 1847, by—

Humphry, for the lessor of the plaintiff. —The lessor of the plaintiff contends, that under the devise in question, Thomas and Ann Knight took an estate tail, with a remainder in fee to the first John Goodden Knight, and that the plaintiff is entitled to the premises as heir of that party; or if this view be incorrect, then that the lessor of the plaintiff is entitled by purchase as the heir of T. and A. Knight. But for the words “their heirs and assigns,” there could be no doubt that the limitation to the next heir of T. and A. Knight would create an estate tail. In Nanfan v. Legh (1) a devise to J. H. “as soon as he should attain twenty-one, and to his heirs lawfully begotten for ever,” was held to give an estate tail. In Burley's case, cited in King v. Melling (2), “a devise to A. for life, remainder to the next heir male; and for default of such heir male, then to remain,” was held by Hale, C.J. to be an estate tail. In the course of his judgment, the Chief Justice referred to Bisfield's case (3), which was the case of a devise to A, and if he dies, not having a son, then to remain to the heirs of the testator. The word “son” was there taken to be used as nomen collectivum, and the devise was held to be an entail. Archer's case (4) is also in point. In a will, where the intention of the testator is to be regarded, the words “heir male,” or “heir lawfully begotten,” are words of limitation, and create an estate tail. It is also to be observed that the devise in this case is to the heir of T. and A. Knight. The party must therefore be the heir of both, which implies that he must be the heir of their body—Roe d. Nightingale v. Quartley (5). Secondly, if the words “next heir” are regarded as words of purchase, the lessor of the plaintiff answers to the description in the will. The word “heir” does not mean “son” or “daughter,” unless the testator manifestly intended it to have that meaning. Here the testatrix intended survivorship to be essential to the vesting of the estate. If the devisee took an estate tail, and died during the life of his parents, that estate would determine—Brownsword v. Edwards (6). The testatrix intended that the party who should take the estate should be the surviving child, or his representative—Archer's case, Willis v. Hiscox (7), Attorney General v. Malkin (8), Jesson v. Wright (9), and Jarman on Wills, vol. 2, p. 232, are in point.

[He then argued the question arising under the Inclosure Act.]

Malins, for the defendants. —All the general doctrines, stated on the other side, may be conceded without affecting the title of the defendants to succeed in this case. The meaning of the testatrix is plain. She gives the estate to her nephew J. G. Knight, his heirs and assigns for ever. Under those words, it is clear he would have taken the fee. Then follow the words—that in case the said J. G. Knight should not survive his parents, and should die without an heir, the estate is devised to the next heir of T. and A. Knight, their heirs and assigns for ever. The meaning of this is, that the estate is to go over by way of executory devise in the event of J. G. Knight dying in the lifetime of his parents, and without heir lawfully begotten. Here the gift did take effect by way of executory devise—Pells v. Brown (10), Doe d. Barnfield v.

Wellon (11). Under these circumstances, J. G. Knight could not have taken an estate tail—Toovey v. Bassett (12), Frogmorton v. Holyday (13). To whom then did the testatrix intend the estate to pass by the words “next heir”? It is plain she used the word “heir” in its popular sense, and intended the estate to go to the next child or son of A. Knight—to the person who should answer the description of heir apparent; that is the second child, if there were one. In one sense the lessor of the plaintiff fulfils the description of heir of the tenant for life, but he is not the “next heir” within the meaning of the will of the testatrix. All the authorities on the subject are collected in 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 13. The following cases are also in point: James v. Richardson (14), Burchett v. Durdant (15), Lord Beaulieu v. Earl of Cardigan (16), Darbi-son d. Long v. Beaumont (17), Goodright v. White (18), Chambers v. Taylor (19), Carne v. Roch (20), Loddington v. Kime (21), Carter v. Barnadiston (22), Lees v. Mosley (23), Doe v. Parratt (24), Doe d. Hiscocks v. Hiscocks (25), and Doe d. Bosnall v. Harvey (26).—[He was then about to argue the point relating to the inclosure, when the Court rose.]

On the 29th of January, to which day the case stood adjourned,—

PARKE, B. said,—the Court are all agreed as to that part of the case which relates to the construction of the will. We think that the “next heir” means the person who should fill the character of true heir of T. and A. Knight; and therefore that the executory devise over took effect only on the death of T. Knight, the surviving deviser for life, when the estate vested in the lessor of the plaintiff, who then filled the character of heir of T. and A. Knight. With respect to the rest of the case, it is very desirable that it should be inquired into out of court.

The case was, therefore, postponed; but the parties having made no arrangement, the argument was now resumed, and the Court gave—many fell short of 20s., the whole amounting to 303l. 19s.—The Court granted a prohibition.

Quære—Whether a prohibition would have been granted if the whole of the claims had amounted to 20l. only, and the items had been separated and sued for in the county court by separate plaints.

This was a rule calling upon the Judge of the county court of Worcestershire and Thomas Grimby to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, to prohibit the said Court from further proceeding in the plaints mentioned in the affidavits.

Simeon Aykroyd, the party making the present application, was a contractor with the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, for constructing a certain portion of that railway; and in that capacity had engaged one Bugbird and others, as sub-contractors, to make bricks for him, and to do other work upon the railway. The sub-contractors were in the habit of paying their men, from time to time, partly in cash, and partly by means of tickets for goods signed by them, and which goods were to be supplied by T. Grimby, who kept a grocer's shop in the neighbourhood of the railway. The following is the form of one of the tickets, the others being similar in substance:—

"Micheton Hill. July 10, 1847.

"Mr. Grimby.—Let the bearer, Thomas Yeates, have goods to the amount of 20s.

(Signed) "Thomas Bugbird."

Of these tickets 3000 had been presented to Mr. Grimby, and goods supplied in respect of them. On the 17th of September the defendant Aykroyd was served with 228 summonses from the Worcestershire County Court, at the suit of Grimby, in respect of the above-mentioned goods. The aggregate of the sums claimed by the summonses amounted to 303l. 19s., one claim being for a sum amounting to 5l., and many for sums less than 20s. Mr. Aykroyd, in his affidavit, denied his liability to these demands, alleging that he never gave the orders, or authorized any person to give them; or that if he did give them, he was not primarily liable, but only as on a guarantee, and that the order was not in writing.

Whitehurst and Pigott shewed cause in

Hilary term (Jan. 29).—The plaintiff in the county court was at liberty to issue the summonses in question, as each summons related to a separate and distinct cause of action within the meaning of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. ss. 58, 63. The question turns upon the construction to be given to those sections. Section 58. enacts, "that all pleas of personal actions, where the debt or damage claimed is not more than 20l., whether in balance of account or otherwise, may be holden in the county court without writ." Section 63. enacts, "That it shall not be lawful for any plaintiff to divide any cause of action, for the purpose of bringing two or more suits in any of the said courts; but any plaintiff having cause of action for more than 20l., for which a plaint might be entered under this act if not for more than 20l., may abandon the excess, and thereupon the plaintiff shall, on proving his case, recover to an amount not exceeding 20l.; and the judgment of the Court, upon such plaint, shall be in full discharge of all demands in respect of such cause of action, and entry of the judgment shall be made accordingly." Here the orders were separate and distinct, being in writing, and having been given on various days to different individuals. Each order must, therefore, be considered as constituting a separate cause of action. The case of The King v. the Sheriff of Herefordshire (1) is in point. There the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff in a sum not exceeding 40s., for the carriage of a parcel; and in a month afterwards incurred another debt to the same party, not exceeding 40s., for the carriage of a second parcel. The plaintiff brought two actions in the county court. The Court held that the causes of action were distinct, and that the plaintiff was entitled to sue separately for each demand, and a prohibition was refused. [POLLOCK, C.B.—In that case the rule was refused. The decision, therefore, does not seem entitled to the same weight as if it had been fully discussed, and deliberately determined.]

Girling v. Alders (2) will be relied on by the other side; it was cited in The King v. the Sheriff of Herefordshire, and is to this effect: "In a prohibition to the Court of the honour of Eye, the case was, one contracted with another for divers parcels of malt, the money to be paid for each parcel being under 40s.; and he levied divers plaints thereupon in the said court; wherefore the Court here granted a prohibition, because, though they be several contracts, yet forasmuch as the plaintiff might have joined them all in one action, he ought so to have done, and sued here, and not put the defendant to an unnecessary vexation; no more than he can split an entire debt into divers, to give the inferior Court jurisdiction, in fraudem legis." Another case, Anon. (3), will also be relied on by the other side. The report is to this effect: "If there be several contracts between A. and B, at several times, for several sums, each sum under 40s., and they do all amount to a sum sufficient to entitle the superior court, they shall be there put in suit, and not in a court which is not of record; and so it was resolved, in the case of The Savoy Court, and Staundforde, 24 C. 2. Also it was said, that if a man at divers times steals things all which amount to above 12d., it is felony capital."

Suppose Grimbley to have brought an action for a sum under 40s., and Aykroyd to have pleaded to the jurisdiction, in what manner could he have shaped his plea? He must have pleaded that although true it was that he owed Grimbley 40s., yet that in addition he owed him 50l. on other contracts. Surely that would have been a bad plea. In Bac. Abr. 'Prohibition,' K, it is said, "If there be one entire contract above 40s., and a man sue for it in a court baron, severing it into divers small sums under 40s., a prohibition shall be granted, because this is done to defraud the Court of the King." In Fitzher. Nat. Brev. p. 46, it is said, "If a man sue another in the county court for debt on chattels which do amount to the sum of 40s., then the party shall have a prohibition, &c. * * And so if the executor sueth in the county or in a court baron, for a debt of five marks by divers plaints, whereas the debt is upon a contract or upon an obligation, now the defendant may shew the same, and plead unto the jurisdiction of the Court, or he may have a writ of prohibition directed unto them that they do surcease," &c. Mr. Udall, in his work on the County Court Act, 3rd edition, p. 97, refers to the Irish Civil Bill Act, 36 Geo. 3. c. 25. s. 8, which enacts, that "no cause of action still subsisting, and in the whole amounting to a sum beyond such sum as is made according to the nature of the case recoverable by force of this act, shall be split or divided so as to make the ground of two or more different actions in order to bring such cases within the jurisdiction created by this act." The case of Hamblin v. Hamblin, which was decided under that act of parliament, and referred to by Mr. Udall, as being reported in Mr. Napier's Digest, was this:—A. had lent B. a sum of money, and some time afterwards another sum, and it was held that A. might sue for them separately. Neale v. Ellis (4) is in point. There the Brighton Court of Requests Act provided that it should not be lawful for any plaintiff to divide any cause of action into two or more suits, for the purpose of bringing the same within the jurisdiction of the Court; but that any plaintiff having a cause of action above the value of 15l., might sue for 15l. and abandon the excess. It was held that a plaintiff having demands for the price of a horse, for goods sold and delivered, and for rent, against the defendant, was entitled, after having sued for and recovered 15l., in respect of the horse, by plaint in the county court, to maintain his action in the superior court for the residue of his claim; for that the causes of action were distinct, and that there had been no division of them for the purpose of bringing them within the jurisdiction of the Court, or any abandonment of the excess over the 15l. recovered in that court.

[ALDERSON, B. referred to the interpretation clause, s. 142.]

Martin and H. Hill, in support of the rule.—The rule must be made absolute. The plaintiff in the county court has been guilty of a gross abuse of the process of the inferior court. As the subject-matters of his claims were capable of being united in one action, he ought to have brought his action in one of the superior courts. It would be monstrous if a butcher, who is in the habit of supplying meat to his customers daily, were at liberty to issue a separate plaint in the county court in respect of each day's supply. Where articles of a similar description are furnished by a tradesman for a great length of time, his demands in respect thereof are blended into one debt, and constitute one cause of action within the meaning of the statute in question.

[PARKE, B.—There is a distinction between one entire contract and one cause of action—Hesketh v. Fawcett (5).]

A debt may consist of more items than one—Shaddick v. Bennett (6). This view of the case is supported by the 58th section of the act of parliament, which gives the county court jurisdiction in "all pleas of personal action where the debt or damage claimed is not more than 20*l.*, whether on balance of account or otherwise." It is probable that these latter words were inserted to prevent the recurrence of the questions which were raised by Clark v. Askew (7) and Porter v. Philpot (8). If the interpretation of the 63rd section, insisted upon by the other side, be correct, that section is unnecessary; for a party who sues for a portion of his demand, and omits to include the whole of it, is not entitled to recover the difference in another action—Dunn v. Murray (9). The case of Hamblin v. Hamblin is not satisfactory, as the Court appear to have been governed solely by the case of The King v. the Sheriff of Herefordshire.—They referred to Williams v. Lord Bagot (10).

POLLOCK, C.B.—In this case a prohibition to the Judge of the County Court of Worcestershire was moved for; a rule nisi granted; and cause shewn in the last term, before my Brothers Parke, Alderson, Platt, and myself. It appeared from the affidavit, that on the 17th of September last, 228 summonses were issued out of the county court, at the suit of the plaintiff Grimby against the defendant, for sums amounting in the aggregate to 303*l.* 19*s.*; one claim only amounting to the sum of 5*l.*, and many to less than 20*s.* These demands arose out of an order alleged to have been given by the defendant, a railway contractor, to the plaintiff, a grocer, to supply with goods the workmen employed by certain persons, who were sub-contractors with the defendant. Tickets appear to have been given by the sub-contractors, and signed by them, each for a certain amount, and those tickets amounted to 3,000; but actions were brought not for each supply, but apparently each for the amount of all the supplies to one workman. The defendant's affidavit denies all liability to these demands, on the ground that he never gave the order, or if he did that he was not primarily liable, but only as on a guarantee, and the order was not in writing. But for the purpose of the present decision, this is wholly immaterial, the question being whether, on the assumption that he was indebted, the county court had jurisdiction. This depends upon the true construction of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, particularly section 63, and not upon the old rule of the common law, as to the jurisdiction of the county court. It will be proper, however, to consider what that rule was, in order to give a construction to the County Court Act. At common law, the county court held no plea of debt or damages to the value of 40*s.* or above—4 Inst. 266; "Placita de catallis debita, &c., quæ summam 40*s.* attingunt vel eum excedunt, sine brevi regis placitari non debent." 2 Inst. 302; and if an entire contract or debt of 40*s.* or upwards was severed into sums below 40*s.*, a prohibition was granted—Roll. Abr. 'Prohibition,' 317; and without saying that the debt arose in an entire contract, Fitzherbert, in his Nat. Brev. 46, lays it down, that if a man do owe unto another man five marks, and he sue several plaints for the same in the county court, or any other court (meaning, no doubt, the hundred court or court baron) against the debtor, he shall have prohibition thereof, and reverse the matter; and that it would defraud the King's court of its jurisdiction. This doctrine was applied to contracts made at different times between the same persons, for several sums.

each less than 40s., but put together amounting to more, in an Anon. case, in 1 Ventris, 65, and in Girling v. Alders, reported in 2 Keb. 617 by the name of Girling v. Aldas, which was for the price of different parcels of malt, sold at different times; "because, though they be several contracts, yet forasmuch as the plaintiff might have joined them all in one action, he ought so to have done, and sued in the court above, and not put the defendant to an unnecessary vexation, no more than he can split an entire debt into divers, to give the inferior court jurisdiction in fraudem legis." The reason there given is a very satisfactory one, for it would be extremely vexatious if a plaintiff, from whom goods had been purchased in small quantities, at small prices, at different times, and by distinct contracts, either payable immediately or on credit which had expired, instead of uniting all in one action, which he could do after the debts were all due, should divide them into several, and sue for each in a separate action in the county court, which would give no adequate relief by consolidating them, in the exercise of their equitable jurisdiction (if they had any), as a superior court would; for they could not unite them, so as in the aggregate to exceed or be equal to 40s. The extent to which that vexation might be carried, may be illustrated by the present case, in which it is sworn that there were 3,000 different tickets, and consequently 3,000 different items or separate contracts. It is true, indeed, that when each contract was due in cash, the creditor might, in the absence of any express or implied contract to the contrary, immediately sue for it; but when several debts had become due he could unite them in one count in debt, or simple contract in indebitatus assumpsit, as one entire debt, and there seems no good reason why he should not. In the subsequent case of The King v. the Sheriff of Herefordshire, the judgment of Lord Tenterden, that to bring a case within the rule of law which forbids splitting, the cause of action must be one and entire, is at variance with the law laid down in the above-cited authorities. The case itself may be distinguished, because there the debts were treated as being entirely distinct and separate from each other, the one having no connexion with the other; but in the case of a running bill with a tradesman, the items are generally connected, the first contract being usually made with the understanding that if not paid for until after others have been made, it is to form part of the same debt, so that several items are to be united into one bill. But the result of the decision altogether is to render it impossible to rely on the authority of the former cases, which otherwise would have disposed of the present question, supposing it to be decided by the rule of the common law. The present case, however, does not depend upon these authorities, but on the construction of the recent act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. By the 58th section the new Court has jurisdiction in all pleas of personal actions when the debt or damage claimed is not more than 20*l.*, whether on balance of account or otherwise. This clause was probably introduced in consequence of the provisions in some of the Court of Requests Acts, that the act should not extend to any debt for the balance of an account originally exceeding a given sum: see Porter v. Philpot. Be that as it may, it cannot be doubted that the clause was meant to give jurisdiction, when the debt claimed consisted of various items, either together originally not exceeding 20*l.* at the time of the suit, or being reduced to that amount by payments, or in allowed set-off of other sums. We are next to consider the 63rd section, and the whole question turns upon the meaning of the term, "cause of action" in that section. It is provided, that it shall not be lawful to divide any cause of action, for the purpose of bringing two or more suits in any of the said courts; but any plaintiff having cause of action for more than 20*l.*, for which a plaint might be entered under this act, if not for more than 20*l.*, may abandon the excess, and thereupon the plaintiff shall, on proving his case, recover to an amount not exceeding 20*l.*; and the judgment of the Court upon such plaint shall be in full discharge of all demands in respect of such causes of action, and entry of the judgment shall be made accordingly.

What then is the construction of the term "cause of action"? The term "debt or damage" is not used as it is in the passage above cited from 4*th Inst.* 266; but the more extensive term adopted is "cause of action." This term does not necessarily mean a cause of action on one single entire contract, for there may be one cause of action on several debts, contracted at different times, and in by far the greater number of cases a count in indebitatus assumpsit or debt is founded on many distinct contracts, as was pointed out in the case of Hesketh v. Fawcett, and one count may be considered as one cause of action. To provide that one cause of action on one entire contract should not be divided would be unnecessary and surplusage; and though an argument that a clause in an act of parliament, if understood in one sense would be inoperative, in another operative, is not by any means a conclusive one, because it must be admitted that clauses are often introduced ex abundanti cautela; yet it is of some weight, and the probability is that the legislature in enacting that a cause of action should not be divided, meant a cause of action which but for the enactment would be divisible; and when it is considered to what abuses the narrower construction of this term would lead (which is strongly exemplified in the present case, in which 228 actions have been commenced, and 3,000 might have been brought), we think we may safely conclude that the term "cause of action" ought to be interpreted cause of one action, and not be limited to an action on one separate contract. But on the other hand, if the term is to comprise all debts that might be included in one count, debts for work and labour, goods sold, use and occupation, though totally unconnected with each other, which might be included in one indebitatus count, would be prevented from being divided under this clause; and if indivisible, and the creditor brought an action for any part, he would virtually abandon all the remainder by the operation of the latter part of the 63rd section. In such a case Mr. Justice Coleridge held, that a similar clause in the Brighton Court of Requests Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. x. s. 24.) did not apply; the demand there being for three distinct things, a house sold, for rent, and for goods sold, but he made a distinction between that case and one where a debtor has a bill running from day to day—Neale v. Ellis. In such a case, though each item of goods supplied or work done constitutes a separate contract, so that after the stipulated price becomes due, the tradesman could sue for one item, yet the understanding is undoubtedly that it shall be united with other items and form one entire demand; and doubtless, if after several other items were added to the first, the tradesman were to bring separate actions for each as for a distinct debt, any superior court would deal with such a proceeding as vexatious. It appears then, that a great inconvenience would follow if the term "cause of action" were interpreted to mean cause of action on one separate contract, and also if the construction were to be, that it was intended to cover all contracts executed, however dissimilar in character, that could be included in one indebitatus count, which, according to the modern practice, may comprise any number of separate unconnected contracts, whenever made, each having ended in a debt before the commencement of the suit. As some extension must be given to the former construction, some restriction must be put on the latter; and we think that we ought to hold that the 63rd clause does apply (whether to all debts which could be comprised in one description in one count, as for "goods sold," or not, we need not now decide), but at all events to the case of tradesmen's bills, in which one item is connected with another in this sense, that the dealing is not intended to terminate with one contract, but to be continuous, so that one item if not paid shall be united with another and form one entire demand. If that demand exceed 20*l.* it ceases to be within the jurisdiction of the County Court Act; and therefore, we think that on the facts disclosed in the affidavits before us, all the debts claimed fall within that description, the total greatly exceeding 20*l.*, and consequently they ought not to have been separated into different suits. Whether if the total had only amounted to 20*l.*, and the items then been separated and sued for by separate plaints, the total being within the jurisdiction of the county court, which then could have given adequate relief, the suits could have been prohibited, is a question which need not now be discussed. But when the total exceeds that amount, and justice cannot be done in the county court, we think that that court has no jurisdiction, and a prohibition ought to go.

and his right to costs in respect thereof is not affected by the 67th and 129th sections of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95.*

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why a suggestion should not be entered on the roll, for the purpose of depriving him of costs under the provisions of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95 (1). It appeared from the affidavits, * Decided in Easter term, but published early on account of its general utility.

(1) The following sections are material:—

58th sect. "That all pleas of personal actions, where the debt or damage claimed is not more than 20*l*., whether on balance of account or otherwise, may be holden in the county court without writ; and all such actions brought in the said court shall be heard and determined in a summary way in a court constituted under this act, and according to the provisions of this act: Provided always, that the Court shall not have cognizance of any action of ejectment, or in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments, or to any toll, fair, market, or franchise, shall be in question, or in which the validity of any devise, bequest, or limitation under any will or settlement may be disputed, or for any malicious prosecution, or for any libel or slander, or for criminal conversation, or for seduction, or breach of promise of marriage."

67th sect. "That no privilege, except as herein-after excepted, shall be allowed to any person to exempt him from the jurisdiction of any court holden under this act."

128th sect. "That all actions and proceedings which before the passing of this act might have been brought in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant, or where the cause of action did not arise wholly or in some material point within the jurisdiction of the court within which the defendant dwells, or carries on his business at the time of the action brought, or where any officer of the county court shall be a party except in respect of any claim to any goods and chattels taken in execution of the process of the court, or the proceeds or value thereof, may be brought and determined in any such superior court at the election of the party suing or proceeding, as if this act had not been passed."

129th sect. "That if any action shall be commenced after the passing of this act in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record for any cause other than those lastly hereinbefore specified, for which a plaint might have been entered in any that the plaintiff was an attorney residing in London, and that the action was brought by him as the indorsee of a bill of exchange for 18*l*. 3*s*. against the defendant as the acceptor.

The defendant at the time of the commencement of the suit resided in the Old Kent Road, within the jurisdiction of the county court of Surrey, and within twenty miles of the plaintiff's residence, and the cause of action arose wholly within the jurisdiction of that court.

G. F. Pollock shewed cause.—There can be no doubt, that the privilege of an attorney defendant of being sued in the superior courts only, is taken away by the provisions of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, in the cases to which that act applies: but the question here is whether that act has also taken away his privilege of suing as a plaintiff in the superior courts, or whether he is bound like the rest of the public to sue in the county court in certain court holden under this act, and a verdict shall be found for the plaintiff for a sum less than 20*l*., if the said action is founded on contract, or less than 5*l*. if it be founded on tort, the said plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only, and no costs; and if a verdict shall not be found for the plaintiff, the defendant shall be entitled to his costs as between attorney and client, unless in either case the Judge who shall try the cause shall certify on the back of the record that the action was fit to be brought in such superior court."

139th sect. "That if any person shall bring any suit in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record in respect of any grievance committed by any clerk, bailiff, or officer of any court holden under this act, under colour or pretence of the process of the said court, and the jury upon the trial of the action shall not find greater damages for the plaintiff than the sum of 20*l*., no costs shall be awarded to the plaintiff in such action, unless the Judge shall certify in court upon the back of the record, that the action was fit to be brought in such superior court."

140th sect. "That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to alter or affect the rights or privileges of the Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge respectively as by law possessed, or the jurisdiction of the courts of the Chancellors or Vice Chancellors of the said universities, as holden under the respective charters of the said universities, or otherwise."

141st sect. "That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to affect the courts of the lord warden, or of the vice warden of the stannaries of Cornwall; but this provision shall not be deemed to prevent the establishment of any court under this act within the said stannaries, or to limit or affect the jurisdiction of any court so established under this act."

cases, on pain of losing his costs. The point has already been solemnly decided in two cases that were argued in the Queen's Bench in Hilary term last, and determined on the 1st of May. The cases are Lewis v. Hance and Jones v. Savage (2). The decision in those cases is, that an attorney in a superior court suing for a debt recoverable in the county court is entitled to his full costs, his privilege when plaintiff not having been taken away by the 67th and 129th sections of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. The words in the 67th section, "that no privilege except as hereinafter excepted shall be allowed to any person to exempt him from the jurisdiction of the county court," cannot apply to the case of a plaintiff, who cannot be considered in any sense to be exempt from the jurisdiction of a court, as it depends upon himself whether or not he will come within the jurisdiction of the county court. Board v. Parker (3) is in point. There by the 39 & 40 Geo. 3. c. 104. s. 10, (the London Court of Conscience Act,) it was enacted, "that no privilege shall be allowed to exempt any person from the jurisdiction of the said court of requests on account of his being an attorney or solicitor, or any other officer of any of the courts of law or equity at Westminster, or of any other court whatsoever; but that all attorneys, solicitors, and officers shall be subject to the several processes, orders, judgments and executions of the said court of requests, in the same manner as any other persons are subject to the same by the said recited acts and this act or any of them." In the construction of that section it was held that an attorney plaintiff was not compellable to sue in the inferior court on pain of losing his costs. After the passing of the Uniformity of Process Act, 2 Will. 4. c. 39, which enacts, that actions shall be commenced by writ of summons, it was contended that the privilege of the attorney was at an end; but it was held, that his privilege was not abolished, although he was compelled to sue by writ of summons—Dyer v. Levy (4). By the 23 Geo. 3. c. 33. s. 19, (the Middlesex County Courts Act), it is enacted, that in case any action of debt, or action upon assumpsit shall be commenced or prosecuted after, &c. in any of His Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, and the defendant at the time of such action brought be liable to be summoned to the county court, and the jury upon the trial shall find damages under 40s., in such case no costs shall be awarded to the plaintiff, but the defendant shall be entitled to double costs of suit. Upon the construction of that act it was also held, that an attorney was not bound to sue in the county court—Hussey v. Jordan (5). The only privileges that are exempted by positive words from the jurisdiction of the county courts are those referred to in the 140th and the 141st sections, relating to the universities and the stanaries courts of Cornwall. He also referred to Wright v. Skinner (6), Armington's case (7), Gardner v. Jessop (8), Silk v. Rennell (9).—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

Pearson, in support of the rule.—The legislature intended by the County Courts Act to abolish all privilege. With respect to the late cases of Lewis v. Hance and Jones v. Savage, this Court will not be bound by that judgment, unless it coincides with their own opinion, as the present case cannot be taken to a court of error. The question turns upon the words of the 67th section, which may mean that no person shall be exempt from the jurisdiction of the county courts in respect of costs.

[PARKE, B.—That cannot be the meaning of the section. The inferior court has no jurisdiction as to costs. If an action is brought in the superior court, which ought to be brought in the court below, it is the superior and not the inferior court which deprives the party of costs.]

If attorneys are not compelled to sue in the county courts very serious consequences will ensue, as attorneys will be at liberty in such case to buy up small bills of exchange, and sue upon them in the superior courts for the mere purpose of costs.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This rule must be discharged. A long series of authorities has decided that the privilege of an attorney to sue in the superior courts is not taken away by words similar to those used in the present case. Now, it is not an inconvenient mode of construing statutes to presume that the legislature were acquainted with the state of the law at the time they passed the present act of parliament; and if the state of the law was such that words similar to those in the present County Courts Act were insufficient to take away the privilege of the attorney, why are we to suppose that more was meant by the legislature by the new than by the old statute? We should not be justified in overruling a long series of cases.

PARKE, B., ROLFE, B. and PLATT, B. concurred.

G. F. Pollock then contended, that the rule having been moved with costs, ought to be discharged with costs, there being a rule of the courts to that effect.

[PARKE, B.—The rule that has been referred to relates to motions for irregularity (10).]

POLLOCK, C.B.—The rule will be discharged with costs, as it has been moved for in the face of direct authorities.

ROLFE, B.—That is a more satisfactory ground for discharging the rule with costs, than that the defendant has asked what he is not entitled to.

Attorney and Solicitor—Bill of Costs, Form of, upon Delivery under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 37.—Court in which Business done.

In an action for the recovery of fees, &c., for business done by an attorney and solicitor,

(10) The rule referred to is the 37 Geo. 3. K.B., 7 Term Rep. 82: "It is ordered, that in all cases where a rule is obtained to shew cause why proceedings should not be set aside for irregularity with costs, and such rule is afterwards discharged generally without any special direction upon the matter of costs, it is understood to be discharged with costs; and the latter rule must be drawn up accordingly." And see Hayward v. Ribbans, 3 East, 313; Tilley v. Henly, 1 Chitt. Rep. 136; Anonymous, ibid. 398, note; The King v. the Sheriff of Middlesex, 1 Cr. & M. 482; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Esch. 234.

* Decided in Easter term, 1847.

it appeared that the bill of costs delivered under the provisions of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 37, contained charges for business done in a Chancery suit, headed Churchill ats. Marks, and also charges relating to a suit between the defendant and one E, which from the nature of the items must have been in one of the superior courts of law; but in which it did not at all appear. It was, however, proved that for such items as the bill comprised the charges were the same in all the superior courts of law:—Held, that there was no delivery of a sufficient bill of such fees, &c., under the above statute; and the plaintiff was nonsuited. The bill should have stated in what court the common law business was done.

Debt for work and labour as an attorney and solicitor, and for fees due and payable in respect thereof. There were also counts for money paid, and for money due on an account stated.

The defendant pleaded to the first and second counts, that the plaintiff was an attorney of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer at Westminster, and a solicitor of her Majesty's High Court of Chancery; and that the said work was business done by him as an attorney and solicitor, and the said materials were provided by the plaintiff as aforesaid as an attorney and solicitor, in and about the said work and business, and not otherwise; and that the said money in the said first count mentioned consisted of fees and charges for the said business so done, &c.; and that the said money in the second count mentioned to have been paid was so paid by the plaintiff as an attorney and solicitor in disbursements for, in, and about the said work and business, &c.: that no bill of the said fees, charges, and disbursements, &c., subscribed with the proper hand of the plaintiff, was one calendar month or at any time before the commencement of this suit delivered to the defendant, or sent by the post to or left for the defendant at his counting-house, office of business, dwelling-house, or last-known place of abode; nor was any bill of the said fees, charges, and disbursements, &c., one calendar month or at any other time before the commencement of this suit delivered unto the defendant, inclosed in or accompanied by a letter, subscribed with the proper hand of the plaintiff, referring to such bill, as required by the statute in such case made and provided, &c.

Replication, that a bill of the said fees, &c. was, one calendar month before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on &c., duly left for the defendant at his office of business, inclosed in a letter, subscribed with the proper hand of the plaintiff, to wit, with the plaintiff's own name, referring to such bill, in manner and form as required by the said statute.

The cause was tried, before Platt, B., when it appeared that the action was brought to recover the sum of 88*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*, charges, &c. in respect of business done by the plaintiff as an attorney and solicitor for the defendant. A bill thereof, inclosed in a letter, signed by the plaintiff, was delivered at the defendant's residence. It contained charges for business done in a Chancery suit, headed Churchill ats. Marks (1), and also charges for business done in a suit between the defendant and one Erskine; but the bill did not specify, nor was there anything in it to shew, in what court. It was, however, manifest from the items charged for (term fees, summonses for time to plead, attending summonses, Judge's clerk's fees, &c.) that it must have been in one of the superior courts of law; and it was proved that the charges for all those items in the bill were the same in each of the superior courts of law. The defendant contended that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited, inasmuch as he had delivered no such bill of charges as under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 37. was necessary before he was entitled to recover. Under the direction of the learned Judge, the plaintiff had a verdict, with leave reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

Peacock, in Michaelmas term, 1846, obtained a rule accordingly.

Farrer now shewed cause.—This case depends on the construction of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 37. (2), which was under the consideration of the Court in the case of

Engleheart v. Moore (3). There this Court held that an attorney's bill must give, in some part of it, substantial information in what court the business was done; the reason of which is stated by Alderson, B., who says, "With the view to the taxation and payment of the bill, if the client denied it, the legislature intended that the client should be informed when each item of the business was done, and that the attorney should hold his hand for a month after the such attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, shall have delivered unto the party to be charged therewith, or sent by the post to, or left for him at his counting-house, office of business, dwelling-house, or last-known place of abode, a bill of such fees, charges, and disbursements, and which bill shall either be subscribed with the proper hand of such attorney or solicitor, (or, in the case of a partnership, by any of the partners, either with his own name, or with the name or style of such partnership,) or of the executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, or be inclosed in or accompanied by a letter, subscribed in like manner, referring to such bill; and upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill within such month it shall be lawful, in case the business contained in such bill, or any part thereof, shall have been transacted in the High Court of Chancery, or in any other court of equity, or in any matter of bankruptcy or lunacy, or in case no part of such business shall have been transacted in any court of law or equity, for the Lord High Chancellor, or the Master of the Rolls, and in case any part of such business shall have been transacted in any other court, for the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, or Court of Pleas at Durham, or any Judge of either of them, and they are hereby respectively required to refer such bill, and the demand of such attorney or solicitor, executor, administrator, or assignee, thereupon to be taxed and settled by the proper officer of the court in which such reference shall be made, without any money being brought into court." It then provides that no such reference shall be made after verdict obtained, or a writ of inquiry executed, or after the expiration of twelve months after such bill shall have been delivered, except under special circumstances, to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court or Judge to whom the application for such reference shall be made; and that if on taxation more than one-sixth of the bill be taken off, the costs of taxation shall be paid by the attorney, and, if less than one-sixth, then by the party chargeable with the bill. It also empowers a "Judge of any of the superior courts of law or equity to authorise an attorney or solicitor to commence an action or suit for the recovery of his fees, &c., although one month shall not have expired from the delivery of a bill as aforesaid, on proof to the satisfaction of the Judge that there is probable cause for believing that such party is about to quit England."

(3) 15 Mee. & Wels. 548; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 312.

(1) Erroneously for Marks ats. Churchill, and on this point there was leave to reduce the verdict, if the Court should think the description insufficient.

(2) Which enacts, "that from and after the passing of that Act, no attorney or solicitor, nor any executor, administrator, or assignee of any attorney or solicitor, shall commence or maintain any action or suit for the recovery of any fees, charges, or disbursements for any business done by such attorney or solicitor until the expiration of one month after delivery of the bill, for the express purpose of giving the client a full opportunity of ascertaining whether the business was done, and whether the charges are reasonable. For this purpose it is very material that the bill should shew in what court the business was done, because the fees are different in different courts." The reason of that case does not apply here, because the charges for all the common law items in this bill would be the same in each of the courts. At all events the plaintiff is entitled to recover for that part of the bill which relates to the Chancery suit. With respect to that portion of the business done the statute has been complied with, and for that the plaintiff may recover—Drew v. Clifford (4), and Waller v. Lacy (5). Under the 42nd section of the statute of Victoria the defendant might have referred the bill for taxation to the taxing officer of the Court of Chancery, who would have handed it over to an officer of one of the courts of law for the taxation of those charges which were for business done in one of them.

[PARKE, B.—The reason given by my Brother Alderson in Engleheart v. Moore is not the only reason for requiring the name of the court in which the business is done to be mentioned. In the case of Martindale v. Falkner (6), Tindal, C. J. said, "I agree entirely with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Lewis v. Primrose (7), that although the statute (the 2 Geo. 2. c. 23. s. 23.) does not in express terms require the court and cause to be mentioned, yet it follows from the general scope and object of the clause that such information is necessary, in order to enable the client to ascertain to what Court or Judge he is to apply for taxation of the bill." My Brother Maule differed from the other Judges as to the sufficiency of the particular bill delivered in that case; he put a more liberal construction on the statute, on the ground that the delivery of an attorney's bill is required for the information of ignorant persons, and not for those skilled in the law and practice of the courts. I do not see why the same reason which applied to the repealed statute should not apply to the statute now in force, and certainly the most skilful person could not tell from this bill in which court the business was done.]

Peacock, in support of the rule, was directed to argue only the question of the plaintiff's right to recover for that part of the bill which related to the suit in Chancery. —This is an entire bill, and if bad in part it is bad altogether; otherwise how can an attorney advise as to whether the bill should be taxed or not? because unless one-sixth of the whole were taxed off, the party would have to pay the costs of taxation.—(He was then stopped.)

POLLOCK, C.B.—With respect to the plaintiff's right to recover for that portion of the bill which contains charges for business done in Chancery, the case of Waller v. Lacy, relied on by the plaintiff's counsel, is not now applicable, for there is this difference between the statute on which that case was decided and the present—that under the present statute every part of an attorney's bill is taxable, whether it be for business done in or out of court. Moreover, the point was not decided in Waller v. Lacy; for it was given up by the defendant's counsel on the case of Drew v. Clifford being cited. In that case Lord Tenterden did not decide the point, but only directed the jury to find for the plaintiff, and gave the defendant leave to move upon it. In the case of Hill v. Humphreys (8), it was held, that if an attorney introduce into his bill certain items connected with his professional capacity, though not immediately within the words of the 2 Geo. 2. c. 23, and in an action on the bill fail because it was not properly delivered according to the statute, he must fail altogether. I think that case was correctly decided, and for good reasons. If an attorney in his bill charges for business done in a court of law, and does not distinctly state in what court, it is the same as if no court at all were stated and he cannot recover, although the bill with respect to charges therein for business done in Chancery is sufficient. The whole is to be taxed. The present bill is not such a bill as an attorney could properly advise his client upon as to the propriety of having it taxed; and therefore I think that under the provision of this statute

Prohibition—County Court—Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 58.—Corporeal or Incorporeal Hereditament—Local Act, Construction of.

A local act of parliament empowered trustees to build a church and to make rates on all houses in the parish, one half on the landlords, the other half on the tenants. It was also enacted, that the tenants should first pay the whole rate and deduct a moiety out of the rent, and that every landlord should allow of such deduction "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary." After the passing of this act certain premises in the parish were leased, the tenant covenanting to pay all rates and taxes. The landlord having refused to deduct half the church-rate from the rent, on the ground that the act extended only to agreements in existence at the time of its passing, the plaintiff served him with a plaint from the county court. The Court refused a writ of prohibition, "the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments" within the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 58, not being in question; and semble, per Parke, B.,—that the local act did not apply to agreements entered into subsequently to the time of its passing.

H. Hill moved for a prohibition to be directed to a Judge of a county court, established by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, to restrain him from proceeding further in a suit of Gwynne v. Knight, which had been brought in that court.—The question turns upon the construction of the 39th and 40th sections of a local and personal act, 57 Geo. 3. c. lxxii. for rebuilding, &c. the church and churchyard of St. Paul's, Shadwell; and also upon the meaning of the 58th section of the Small Debts Act. The 39th section of the local act empowers certain trustees to make rates on all houses, &c. in the parish rateable to the poor, one half on the landlords, and the other half on the tenants. By the 40th section, every tenant shall first pay the whole rate, and then be entitled to deduct from his rent one moiety of such rate, and every landlord shall allow of such deduction accordingly, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary. Subsequently to the passing of this statute a lease of premises within the parish was granted, the tenant covenanting to pay all parliamentary and other taxes and rates. The tenant paid the full amount of rent, and also church-rates for a year and a half; but the landlord, contending that the clause in the statute, "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary," applied only to agreements made before the passing of the act, refused to deduct the amount of church-rates from the rent. The tenant thereupon issued a plaint in the county court against the landlord for the recovery of 7l. 10s., being half the amount of the church-rate. On the case being called on for hearing, the Judge of the county court expressed a doubt whether the matter came within his jurisdiction, and desired the parties to take the opinion of one of the superior courts upon the point. The question arises on the 58th section of the Small Debts Act, "Provided always, that the Court shall not have cognizance of any action of ejectment, or in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments" shall be in question. The Judge doubted whether under these words the landlord's title to his rent did not come in question.

[PARKE, B.—The reasonable construction of the local act is, that it refers to agreements subsisting at the time when it passed. Occupiers of houses and landlords could not foresee that an act of parliament would impose upon the parish the expense of building a church. But what is there in the act to prevent a tenant after the passing of the act from agreeing with his landlord to pay church-rates?]

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think the defendant in this case is not entitled to a prohibition.

PARKE, B.—The title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament cannot come in question in this case. The only point is how the landlord's rent is to be paid? His right to it is admitted. There is no ground for a prohibition.

Plea—And the said defendant by his attorney says that he did not indorse the said bill in the said first count mentioned, in manner and form as in the said first count mentioned. And as to the last count of the said declaration, the defendant says that he did not promise in manner and form as in that count alleged, &c.

The defendant being under terms to plead issuably, the plaintiff signed judgment on the ground that the first plea being pleaded to the whole declaration, and containing no answer to the second count, it was not issuable. A rule having been obtained to set aside the judgment for irregularity,—

Prentice now shewed cause.—The first plea should have been confined in terms to the first count; and not being so, it must be taken as pleaded to the whole. In Putney v. Swan (1), the declaration contained two counts, one on a bill, and the other on an account stated. The defendant pleaded that he did not accept the bill, but took no notice of the account stated. Parke, B. there says, “as this plea does not profess to be confined to one particular count, it must therefore be taken to be intended as an answer to the whole declaration.”

tion.” Then the first plea, being no answer to the last count, is bad on special demurrer—Parratt v. Goddard (2). When a defendant is under terms to plead issuably, he is bound not to invite a demurrer—Hughes v. Poole (3). Where a defendant, being under terms of pleading issuably, pleaded nunquam indebitatus to a declaration containing counts on bills of exchange, as well as for goods sold and delivered, it was held that the plaintiff might treat the plea as a nullity and sign judgment—Sewell v. Dale (4).

The Attorney General and Thompson, in support of the rule.—The conclusion of the first plea, “in manner and form as in the first count mentioned,” sufficiently shews that it is confined to the first count. Vere v. Goldsborough (5) is an express authority to shew that the plaintiff was not entitled to sign judgment; and that his course was to demur specially, if he did not join issue—Worley v. Harrison (6).

POLLOCK, C.B.—How can it be said that a plea which is only bad on special demurrer, is not an issuable plea? The rule must be made absolute.

Debt, for money paid, interest, and on an account stated.

Pleas — First, never indebted; second, the defendant's bankruptcy.

At the trial, before Parke, B., at the Warwickshire Spring Assizes, 1847, the facts were admitted to be, that the plaintiff, the defendant, and one Joseph Baker, had signed, as co-sureties for one John Antrobus, the promissory note following :—

" Birmingham, April 13, 1841.

" £200.—On demand we severally and jointly promise to pay to Mr. Charles Truman, or order, the sum of 200*l.* for value received.

(Signed) " John Antrobus.
" Edward Swinburne.
" William Wallis.
" Joseph Baker."

Antrobus, the principal, became bankrupt on the 26th of November 1842, and the defendant Swinburne was bankrupt in August 1842, and obtained his certificate on the 12th of April 1843. In discharge of the note the plaintiff had paid, previously to the bankruptcy, the sum of 20*l.*, being less than his share of the debt; and subsequently to his bankruptcy had paid sums amounting, with his previous payments, to more than his proportion. The action was brought by him to recover one-third of the amount so paid.

It was contended, on the part of the defendant, that he was, under these circumstances, discharged by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 52. That section enacts that "any person who, at the issuing of the commission, shall be surety or liable for any debt of the bankrupt, or bail for the bankrupt, either to the sheriff or to the action, if he shall have paid the debt, or any part thereof, in discharge of the whole debt, (although he may have paid the same after the commission issued,) if the creditor shall have proved his debt under the commission, shall be entitled to stand in the place of such creditor as to the dividends and all other rights under the said commission, which such creditor possessed or would be entitled to in respect of such proof; or if the creditor shall not have proved under the commission, such surety or person liable, or bail, shall be entitled to prove his demand in respect of such payment as a debt under the commission, not disturbing the former dividends, and may receive dividends with the other creditors, although he may have become surety, liable, or bail as aforesaid after an act of bankruptcy committed by such bankrupt; provided that such person had not, when he became such surety or bail, or so liable as aforesaid, notice of any act of bankruptcy by such bankrupt committed." The learned Judge was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and accordingly directed the jury to find a verdict for him, reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

A rule having been obtained by Waddington,—

Mellor shewed cause (June 18).—This case is not within the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 52. Here the plaintiff, not having paid more than his share before the bankruptcy of the defendant, could have no cause of action against him at the time of the bankruptcy, as no liability arises between co-sureties till one has paid more than his share—Davies v. Humphreys (1). In Clements v. Langley (2) Lord Denman says, "To graft upon the 52nd clause the liability of one co-surety for another, on default made by the principal, which is attempted in the present case, would be going a length which is, in my opinion, not warranted." And Littledale, J. says, "I cannot see how the plaintiff here could be considered a surety, or liable for the debt of the bankrupt. The co-sureties were not so for each other, but for the principal: and I think the statute contemplates the case where the bankrupt is the principal debtor." In that case Patteson, J. seems to consider Wood v. Dodgson (3) as analogous; but it really is not so: that was a case of partners, and there may be a great distinction between partners and co-sureties. With co-sureties the claim of one against the other arises only when one has paid more than his proportion, and this is not so with partners. The other side will rely on Aflalo v. Fourdrinier (4), which was a case of partners. Ex parte Porter (5) is expressly in point. The whole machinery of the 52nd section is inapplicable altogether to a case of co-suretyship; that section only contemplates the case of direct liability. The case turns on the meaning of the words "liable for."

Waddington, contra.—It is necessary to look very closely into the words of the act; and it is submitted that the plaintiff comes within the meaning of a "person liable" at the time of the bankruptcy for a debt of the bankrupt. No difficulty can arise in applying this section to the case of a co-surety, as he could not come in till he had paid the debt. A party who pays a debt which could be proved against the estate protects the estate to that amount. If there be a debt due at the time of the bankruptcy for which another party is surety or liable, such party is within the meaning of the 52nd section. In Ex parte Porter, it does not appear that the note was due before the bankruptcy.

[PARKE, B.—It may be that the statute only applies to the case of sureties as between them and the principal debtor, and not as between themselves as co-sureties.]

There must be a debt at the time of the bankruptcy, and if the note was not due at the time, the case would not apply. Clements v. Langley does not decide the question as to whether the act applies to co-sureties.

[ALDERSON, B.—It is a casus omissus in the act. Suppose there were twenty sureties, they might prove the debt twenty times over. In the case of partners each is liable for the debt of the other. Here there is merely a contingent liability.]

It is not easy to distinguish the difference between the case of co-sureties and partners. Each is liable for the whole, and is surety for the shares of the others. Affalo v. Fourdrinier was a case of partners. Wright v. Hunter (6), Bassett v. Doggin (7), Ex parte Young (8), Ex parte Lloyd (9), Filbey v. Lawford (10), and Ex parte Watson (11).

PARKE, B. — My Brothers Alderson, Platt, and myself, before whom this case was argued, are of opinion that the rule to enter a nonsuit must be discharged. The plaintiff sued the defendant for money paid, to which the defendant pleaded bankruptcy. At the trial, before me, at Warwick, all the facts were admitted. The plaintiff and defendant were co-sureties with another, for one Antrobus, by a joint and several note for 200*l*. The defendant became bankrupt on the 8th of August 1842, and the note was then due; before the bankruptcy, the plaintiff paid 20*l*., not being his share of the debt; after it, he paid sums amounting with the previous payment to more than his proportion, and sought to recover one-third in this action. I was of opinion that he was entitled to recover, thinking that the case of co-sureties is not within the meaning of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 52, but reserved the question, which has been since fully argued; and we all, after considering the arguments and referring to the authorities, concur in that opinion. The words of the section in question, which, with the addition of "bail," is copied from the 49 Geo. 3. c. 121. s. 8, apply to any person who is surety or liable for the debt of the bankrupt. It was properly admitted on the argument, that the plaintiff in this case was not a surety for the debt of the bankrupt; but it was contended that he was a person liable for the bankrupt's debt, by reason of the promissory note, on which he, as well as the bankrupt, was indebted to the creditors, having become due before the bankruptcy. But the cases decided on the former statute have given a construction to these latter words, and shew that they were meant to apply to those cases in which there subsisted at the time of the bankruptcy a relation analogous to that of surety and principal between the person who is to prove and the bankrupt, and which as between themselves made the former liable for the debts of the latter. If a surety only had been mentioned, it might have been held that the statute applied only to those cases where the person was a surety by express contract with the creditor; but the words "liable for" were added to embrace those cases where a person was the principal debtor with respect to the creditor, but by agreement with the bankrupt, the latter was to pay the debt, and so with respect to him he became a surety. This appears to be the explanation given by Lord Eldon of the intention of the framer of the act, from his observations in Ex parte Young and Ex parte Lobbon (12), and the cases in which proof has been admitted by persons liable; and, consequently, such persons barred have been all of that description:—in Stedman v. Martinant (13), the acceptor, for the accommodation of the drawer, who became a bankrupt; in Wood v. Dodgson (14), a retiring partner, with whom his co-partner, the bankrupt, had contracted to pay all the partnership debts; in Ex parte Young, a partner who used his partner's name fraudulently for his own purposes; in Ex parte Watson, a solvent partner paying the whole of the partnership debts,—fall under the description of persons “liable for” the bankrupt's debts: the bankrupt being the principal debtor in the two first cases by his express contract, in the third by his implied one for the whole amount of the debt, and in the last for the bankrupt's share; for, as the Vice Chancellor Leach said, “each partner is a principal debtor for his own share, and they are mutual sureties to the creditors for the shares of each other.” In Ex parte Watson, re Sheath (15) the Vice Chancellor lays down the same doctrine, that one partner is a surety for another; and he says that the principle is, that the surety may prove for such sum as the principal debtor ought at the time of the bankruptcy to provide; and therefore one partner may prove for the amount of the aliquot share of another; and upon the ground of each partner being surety for the other rested the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Tindal, in Astle v. Fourdrinier. In all these cases the party is liable in the nature of a surety for what is, as between himself and the bankrupt, the bankrupt's debt, and for which he at the time of the bankruptcy ought to provide by express or implied contract. But no case has gone beyond these, and extended the construction of the statute so as to include persons who are co-sureties for a debt due, not from the bankrupt, but from a third person. It is not correct to say, that one co-surety is liable for the debt of another inter se at the time of the bankruptcy: the bankrupt at that time has not engaged with his co-surety to provide any part of the money; but the third party, the principal, has engaged with both to do so; and it is then quite a contingency whether the co-surety will be called on by the creditor to pay, or will pay more than his own share, and until then he has no claim on the bankrupt; and, accordingly, it has been so held by Mr. Justice Erskine and the other members of the Court of Review, in the case of Ex parte Porter, in which case the note in which all joined was clearly due before the bankruptcy: but if it was not, it makes no difference, as where one person is really a surety for another for his debt, it has been held that he is within the clause, though the debt is not due, if it be debitum in presenti solvendum in futuro—Ex parte Lobbon. In the previous case of Clements v. Langley there are strong dicta to the same effect, though the case itself did not decide that a co-surety was not within the meaning of the clause in question.

plaintiff's successor to, &c., wherefore the defendant refused to pay the said sum of 50l. Verification:—Held, that the plea was bad, as the introduction to the patients was an independent covenant, and not a condition precedent to the payment of the 50l.

Covenant. The declaration stated that by indenture, made &c., between the plaintiff and the defendant, (profert) the plaintiff and the defendant did covenant and agree with each other in manner following, that is to say, that the plaintiff and the defendant would be and become partners in the profession and business of surgeons and apothecaries, for the term of one year, to be commenced and be computed from the 1st day of January 1845, if the plaintiff and the defendant should so long live; that the partnership should be carried on at the house, situate, &c., and upon, under, and subject to the terms, conditions, and agreements following, that is to say, that the defendant should pay, and he did thereby covenant to pay, to the plaintiff the sum of 800l., at the times and in manner therein-after mentioned, viz. the sum of 400l. upon the execution of the said indenture, and the several sums of 100l. on the 25th of March in the years 1846, 1847, 1848, and 1849 respectively, the said sums making together the sum of 800l.; that the defendant should, in consideration of such payment, be entitled to the entire profits of the said business, from the 1st day of January 1845, the defendant paying all the expenses of carrying on the said business from the said last-mentioned date; that the plaintiff should introduce the defendant to the patients and friends of the plaintiff, at first as a partner and ultimately as his successor, with the view and for the express purpose of securing to the defendant the confidence of the said patients and friends, and of obtaining for the defendant their future employment in the said business; that the business of the said partnership should be carried on at the then residence of the plaintiff at Ware, and that the plaintiff should continue to reside and to practise as a surgeon and apothecary in the same residence, till the 25th of June 1845, and should at all reasonable times be ready and willing to attend and advise and prescribe for patients, and to assist the defendant in carrying on the said business of a surgeon and apothecary, till the 1st of January 1846, and at all subsequent times when the plaintiff should be at the said town of Ware, or in its immediate vicinity; that the plaintiff should from and after the 1st of January 1846, introduce the defendant as his successor in the said business, and should use his best endeavours to establish him in his practice as a surgeon and apothecary in the said town of Ware; in consideration whereof the defendant thereby covenanted and agreed to pay to the plaintiff the further sum of 50l. on the 25th of March 1846, in addition to and beyond the said sum of 800l.; that the defendant should purchase of the plaintiff all the medical fixtures, drugs, and instruments then belonging to and used in the surgery of the plaintiff, at Ware aforesaid, at a valuation to be made in the usual manner, the amount of such valuation to be paid within two months of the date of the said indenture. Averment of due performance on the part of the plaintiff. Second breach, non-payment of the sum of 50l., due March 25, 1846.

Plea, that after the said 1st day of January 1846, to wit, on &c., and on divers other days and times between that day and the 26th of March 1846, being proper and reasonable times in that behalf, he, the defendant, requested the plaintiff to introduce him, the defendant, as his, the plaintiff's, successor in the said business to divers persons, to wit, &c., and which said persons had been, and at the time of the execution of the said indenture, and up to the time when the plaintiff was requested by the defendant as aforesaid to introduce him, were respectively patients of the plaintiff, yet that the plaintiff did not nor would at those several days and times when he was so requested as aforesaid, or at any or either of them, or at any other time hitherto, introduce the defendant to the said persons, or any or either of them, but, on the contrary, the plaintiff then wholly refused and neglected, and from thence hitherto hath refused and neglected, to introduce the defendant to any of the said persons, nor has the plaintiff, from the said 1st of January 1846, hitherto introduced the defendant at all to any person whomsoever as his, the plaintiff's, successor in the said business, nor has the plaintiff at any time since the said 1st of January 1846, used any endeavour whatever to establish the defendant in the practice of a surgeon and apothecary in the said town of Ware, but the plaintiff has wholly neglected and refused so to do; and the defendant, in fact, saith that the plaintiff hath not at any time hitherto performed any part whatever of the said alleged consideration for his, the defendant's, said covenant to pay the plaintiff the said sum of 50*l.*, wherefore, &c.

Special demurrer, on the ground, amongst others, that the covenant to introduce the defendant to the plaintiff's patients was not a condition precedent to the payment of 50*l.* in the declaration mentioned, but that the same was a distinct and independent covenant. Joinder in demurrer.

Willes, in support of the demurrer.—The introduction to the patients is not a condition precedent to the payment of the 50*l.* It would be unjust if it were so, as a slight accident might in that case absolve the defendant from the payment of the money, as the omission to introduce one patient would be enough. It might also be unjust to the defendant, as he might wish one to be introduced after the time. The case, however, falls clearly within the rule laid down in Fordage v. Cole (1), that "if a day be appointed for payment of money, or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen or may happen before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance, for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make his performance a condition precedent; and so it is where no time is fixed for the performance of that which is the consideration of the money or other act." The case of Sir R. Pool, from the Year Book, is also stated in the note, 48 Edw. 3. The Court then called on—

Hawkins, in support of the plea.—This plea is good. In Collins v. Gibbs (2) the action was for the recovery of certain costs, and the declaration stated, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendant, would execute to the defendant a general release, to bear date on the 27th of July 1758, he, the defendant, undertook to pay certain costs, as soon as a bill of such costs could be prepared. Averment, that the costs amounted to 21*l.* 3*s.* 7*d.*, and that a bill of such costs was prepared and produced to the defendant. It was then urged that the plaintiff should have averred that he had given or tendered to the defendant a general release, and it was held that the declaration was bad for want of such averment.

Per Curiam.—You cannot get over the rule as stated by the plaintiff's counsel. The introduction of his patients by the plaintiff is clearly not a condition precedent to the payment of the 50*l.*

May 6. } In re ROBINSON v. LENAGHAN.*

Prohibition—County Court—Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 80—Jurisdiction of Judge.

The defendant having been sued in the county court, without any notice of the proceedings, judgment was given against him and his goods seized in execution. He then applied to the Judge under the 80th section of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. to set aside the judgment and execution; but the Judge having imposed certain terms to which the defendant declined to accede, the latter paid the debt and costs under protest, and moved this Court for a prohibition:—Held, that the Judge had jurisdiction over the matter, and that no prohibition ought to issue.

This was a rule calling upon the Judge of one of the Middlesex County Courts, and Robinson, the plaintiff, to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, prohibiting the said Court from proceeding further in the said cause, and why a sum of money paid by the defendant Lenaghan, as debt and costs, under protest, should not be returned to him under the following circumstances.

It appeared from the affidavits, that the defendant on returning to his lodgings at No. 8, Highbury Villa, found a person in possession of his goods, under an execution from the county court. The defendant had received no notice whatever of any proceedings against him in the county court until the execution in question was put in; but the process had been served at No. 8, Paul's Villa, at which place he had never resided; and the officer on leaving the summons there was informed that Mr. Lenaghan did not reside and was not known at that place. On the following day, the 14th of January, the defendant attended at the county court and stated the above facts, whereupon the Judge made the following order:—"It is ordered that on the defendant's undertaking to appear and defend this case on the merits, and also undertaking to bring no action against the plaintiff or any officer of the court, the judgment be set aside, and in default of giving such undertaking on Saturday next, it is ordered that the said judgment and execution be confirmed." The defendant refused to accede to these terms, and paid the debt and costs under protest.

Willes having obtained a rule to set aside this judgment and execution, on the authority of Ferguson v. Mahon (1),

J. Brown shewed cause.—The defendant in this case comes too late for a prohibition after the sentence of the Court below has been fully carried into effect. This was decided in the case In the matter of Poe (2), where it was held, that a prohibition could not issue to a court-martial after its sentence had been ratified by the king, and carried into execution. The case of Ferguson v. Mahon will be relied on by the defendant, but is not in point. That was the case of an action against the defendant upon a judgment of the Common Pleas in Ireland, and the point decided was, that although the defendant could not contest the merits of the action, nor the propriety of the decision, yet that he might shew that the Court had not properly jurisdiction over him; and that it was a good defence to such action that he was not aware of any process of the court in respect of the judgment, nor had ever appeared to the action. In the present case it cannot be contended that the Judge of the county court had no jurisdiction in the matter. That he had jurisdiction is clear from the 50th section of the Small Debts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. That section is in these terms:

(1) 11 Ad. & EL 179; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 146.

(2) 5 B. & Ad. 681; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) K.B. 33.

"That if on the day so named in the summons, or at any continuation or adjournment of the court or cause in which the summons was issued, the defendant shall not appear or sufficiently excuse his absence, or shall neglect to answer when called in court, the Judge, upon due proof of service of the summons, may proceed to the hearing or trial of the cause on the part of the plaintiff only, and the judgment thereupon shall be as valid as if both parties had attended. Provided always, that the Judge in any such case, at the same or any subsequent court, may set aside any judgment so given in the absence of the defendant, and the execution thereupon, and may grant a new trial of the cause upon such terms, if any, as to payment of costs, giving security for debt or costs, or such other terms as he may think fit, on sufficient cause shewn to him for that purpose." Here the Judge of the county court took the course he was bound to take, for upon the defendant not appearing, it was his duty to proceed to the hearing, and pronounce judgment; and the proceeding would be the same, although it might afterwards turn out that the bailiff had sworn falsely to the service of the summons. Again, the case In the matter of the Dean of York (3) shews that whilst a sentence continues in operation a prohibition will lie; and it would seem to follow from that case that after the sentence has been executed and is at an end, it is too late to move for a prohibition. He referred to the 79th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95.

Willes, in support of the rule.—The case of Ex parte the Dean of York is a conclusive authority to shew that if judgment has been given by an inferior court against the defendant, without process having been served upon him, a superior court will interfere by way of prohibition.

[PARKE, B.—Remove the 80th section of the act, and then this Court would have ample jurisdiction to interfere.]

Would the judgment be good, then, if the defendant had no notice whatever? Formerly, unless the defendant actually appeared in person, the Court had no power to proceed. The provisions of the 80th section are to be read as a waiver of this requisite, but not so as to give jurisdiction to the Court when no notice has in fact been given. The greatest inconvenience would follow from holding that mere proof of notice is sufficient to give validity to the proceedings of the county court taken in the absence of the defendant.

[PARKE, B.—But look at the inconvenience on the other side. Were we to interfere by way of prohibition in this case, we should make ourselves Judges of a fact which it was entirely for the Judge of the county court to decide upon.]

As to the second point. It appears in Coke's Artic. Cler. that prohibition may issue after judgment. In Buggin v. Bennett (4) Lord Mansfield says, "If it appears upon the face of the proceedings that the Court below have no jurisdiction, a prohibition may be issued at any time either before or after sentence, because all is a nullity; it is coram non judice." So in Fits. Nat. Brev. 46, a, it is said, "So after judgment given and execution awarded in the county or in other court baron, which hath not power to hold plea of debt of the sum of 40s. &c., or of damages in trespass amounting to such sum or more, the party defendant shall have a writ of prohibition unto the bailiffs or unto the sheriff or officer of the Court, that they do not execution; and if they have distrained the party to make satisfaction, that then they release the distress, and that they revoke what they have done therein." He referred also to Roberts v. Humby (5).

POLLOCK, C.B.—I entertain no doubt but that this rule ought to be discharged. The natural and plain construction of the 80th section is that the county court has jurisdiction to hear and determine a cause ex parte, upon due proof of the service of the summons upon the defendant. When the Judge is satisfied that such service has been made, he has at once jurisdiction.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. By the 80th section the legislature gives the same power to the county court as is possessed by the superior courts. A defendant may apply to the Judge to set aside the judgment which has been obtained in his absence, if no summons has in fact been served upon him.

(4) 4 Burr. 2037.

(5) 3 Mee. & Wels. 120; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 45.

ROLFE, B.—Mr. Willes reads the 80th section as if a summons must in point of fact have been served upon the defendant before the Judge of the county court has jurisdiction to try. But, by the words of the statute, all that is required is "due proof" of such service, that is to say, such proof as may satisfy the Judge that service has been made.

PLATT, B.—It appears to me that this rule is subject to two infirmities. In the first place, the question as to whether a summons was served upon the defendant is one entirely within the jurisdiction of the Judge of the county court to determine. The other infirmity is that as in this case the judgment has been executed, there is nothing to which the writ of prohibition can attach. In the case cited from Fits. Nat. Brev. there was something to be done which might ultimately produce the fruits of execution.

Thistlethwayte, T. S. Cocke, and C. Hodgson, trustees of an act of the 35 Geo. 3, for enabling the Lord Bishop of London to grant a lease, with powers of renewal of lands in the parish of Haddington, &c., for the purpose of building upon, and of certain acts since passed for amending and enlarging the same, of the first part, Charles James Lord Bishop of London of the second part, and the defendant of the third part, certain premises, particularly mentioned and described, were for the consideration in the said indenture mentioned, demised by the said T. Thistlethwayte, T. S. Cocks, C. Hodgson, and Charles James Lord Bishop of London, to the defendant, his executors, &c.: also reciting that a building society, called the Metropolitan Building Association, had been established in the city of London, and that rules and regulations had been made for the government and guidance thereof, and had been duly certified, allowed, and inrolled, &c.: also reciting that defendant was a shareholder in the society: also reciting that the monies to be contributed in respect of each share in the funds of the society amounted to 120*l.*, and that the defendant was then entitled to receive out of the funds of the society eight shares and three-quarters of another share, being equal to 550*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*; and that for securing the due and regular payment of the subscriptions, fines, and other monies which should become payable by the defendant in respect of his said shares, &c., and which might become payable by him in respect of any other share or shares which he might at any time thereafter, before a sale of the said premises in the said indenture particularly mentioned and described under certain trusts created by the said indenture, acquire in the funds of the said society, it had been agreed that the premises, in the said indenture particularly mentioned and described, should be assigned to the plaintiffs upon the trusts and in manner in the said indenture thereinafter declared, the defendant did, for himself, his heirs, &c., covenant, promise, and agree to and with the plaintiffs, their executors, &c., that he, the defendant, his heirs, &c., should and would well and truly pay unto the plaintiffs, their executors, &c., all the subscriptions, fines, and other monies which should become payable by the defendant in respect of the shares then held by him, &c., as and when the same should become payable under the rules and regulations of the said society. The declaration then alleged, that after the making of the said indenture, and before any sale of the premises thereby assigned, and before the commencement of the suit, the defendant became and was the holder of a large number of other shares of and in the funds of the said society, to wit, twenty shares and one quarter of another share. Averment, that there was due and payable by the defendant, under the rules and regulations of the said society, for subscriptions, fines, and other monies, in respect of the said twenty-nine shares of and in the funds of the said society, so held by the defendant, a large sum, to wit, 320*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*; that the shares of the defendant do not exceed in value 150*l.* for each share, and that the subscriptions as aforesaid do not exceed in the whole 20*s.* for one month for each share. Breach, that the defendant did not nor would pay or cause to be paid to the plaintiffs the said subscriptions, fines, and other monies payable as aforesaid, for and in respect of the said shares, &c.

The defendant pleaded, first, non est factum, after setting out on oyer the indenture declared on, by which it appeared that the premises demised to the defendant by the recited indenture of the 6th of December 1843, were mortgaged by him to the plaintiffs, in consideration of 550*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* paid by them to him out of the funds of the society.

Third plea, that the said society was not nor is a society established under or by virtue of or according to the said act of parliament for the regulation of benefit building societies, modo et formâ.

Thirteenth plea, that by the said rules and regulations of the society, certified, inrolled, &c., and which were in force at the time of the making of the said indenture in the declaration mentioned, and from thence hitherto have been and still are in force, it was ordered and declared, that in case it should be necessary to bring or defend any action, suit, or prosecution, criminal as well as civil, in law or in equity, touching or concerning the property or assets, rights, or claim of the said society, or touching or concerning the breach or non-performance of any of the articles, matters, or things contained in the same rules, the same should be brought or defended by or in the name or names of the trustee or trustees of the said society for the time being, on behalf of the said society, and he or they should be indemnified from all losses or damages by him or them sustained in consequence of being a party or parties to such proceedings; but that no such proceedings should be taken or defended until the approbation of the majority of the members present at a special meeting of the society should have been obtained; that the claims or demands of the plaintiffs in the declaration mentioned were and are rights or claims of the said society, within the meaning of the said rules; and that this action was and is brought and prosecuted by the plaintiffs, as the trustees of the society, on behalf of the society, for the breach by the defendant of divers articles contained in the rules of the said society; and that the approbation of a majority of the members of the said society present at a special meeting thereof, had not been obtained before or at the time of the commencement of this suit, nor has it ever been obtained as required by the said rules. Verification.

Fourteenth plea,—that by the said rules of the society, certified, inrolled, &c., and which were in force at the time of the making of the indentures in the declaration mentioned, and thence hitherto have been and still are in force, it was ordered and declared, that there should be elected by the members of the said society present at the first general meeting, and at every meeting on the first Wednesday in September during the continuance of the society, a president, vice-president, and other officers; that the president, vice-president, and other officers to be elected at the same time should compose the committee for the ensuing year; and in case of the death, resignation or removal of any such members of the committee or officers, the vacancy should be supplied by the election of some other member or members of the said society or association, at the next meeting of the association, and the member or members so added should continue in office till the next general meeting appointed for the election of officers and committee. That the committee of the said society for the time being, or the major part of them, should determine all disputes which might arise respecting the construction of the rules of the said society, or any of the clauses, matters, or things therein contained, and also of any additions, alterations, or amendments which should or might thereafter arise between the trustees, officers, or other members of the said society, and that the decision of the committee, if satisfactory, should be conclusive, but if not satisfactory reference should be made to arbitration, pursuant to the 27th section of the statute made in the 10th year of the reign of King George IV. for consolidating and amending the laws relating to friendly societies; and that at the first meeting of that society after the inrolment of the said rules, five arbitrators should be elected, none of the said arbitrators being beneficially interested, directly or indirectly, in the funds of the said society, and in each case of dispute the names of the arbitrators should be written on pieces of paper, and placed in a box or glass, and the three whose names were first drawn by the complaining party, or some one appointed by him or her, should be the arbitrators to decide the matters in dispute, whose decision should be final; that the claims and demands of the plaintiffs in the declaration mentioned were before and at the time of the commencement of this suit and still are matters in dispute between the plaintiffs as trustees of the society and the defendant, within the meaning of the said rules, and that the defendant has always been and still is ready and willing to refer the same to the arbitration and determination of the committee for the time being of the society, or the major part of them, or to arbitrators to be chosen in manner as directed by the said rules, according to the true intent and meaning of the said rules, of which the plaintiffs have always had notice. Verification.

The plaintiffs joined issue on the first and third pleas, and to the thirteenth and fourteenth replied de injuriâ.

At the trial, before Coltman, J., at the Surrey Summer Assizes, 1847, it appeared that the plaintiffs were the trustees of a building society called "The Metropolitan Building Association," and that the defendant was a member, and the holder of twenty-nine shares in the society. The certified rules and regulations of the society (1) were given in evidence, and it ap-

(1) The amended rules of the society were prefaced by the following, amongst other statements:—"This association is established for the purpose of enabling parties to purchase freehold or leasehold property in or within twenty-five miles of London. It is proposed to raise by monthly subscriptions from each member or shareholder a fund, out of which to assist subscribers in their endeavours to become possessors of such property as may be best suited to their own interest or advantage. Each shareholder must contribute to the association 10s. per month for each share, of which he is the possessor, until peared that the present action was brought with the approbation of the majority of members present at a "special general meeting" of the society. On the part of the defendant, it was submitted that the issues on the first, third, thirteenth, and fourteenth pleas ought to be found for him; first, because the objects of the society were not confined to the purposes mentioned in the act for the regulation of benefit building societies, the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 82 (2), but extended to loans to members on mortgage these monthly payments shall, with the profits, amount to 120*l.* per share. The operations of the association will extend over a space of about ten years and then cease altogether. When the funds have become sufficiently large to make advances to the subscribers, due notice will be given, and that member who will submit to the largest deduction of discount from the amount of his share of 120*l.*, for priority of advance, will be the one to whom the loan will be immediately granted;—the property purchased with the association's funds to be mortgaged to the association as security for the continuation of his monthly instalments, until the termination of the association. The subscriptions of those who do not draw their shares are invested on mortgage of freehold or leasehold property; on the termination of the association they will be entitled not only to compound interest on the money they have paid, but also to participate in the profits arising from premiums, fines, &c. To mortgagors this association will be of great advantage. In the event of the money being required by the lender, the same may be discharged by a loan from this association."

Rule 3. "That in case it shall be necessary to bring or defend any action, suit, or prosecution, criminal as well as civil, in law or in equity, touching or concerning the property or assets, right or claim of this association, or touching or concerning the breach or non-performance of any of the articles, matters, and things herein contained, the same shall be brought or defended by or in the name or names of the trustee or trustees of this association for the time being, on behalf of the said association, and he or they shall be indemnified from all losses or damages by him or them sustained in consequence of being a party or parties to such proceedings; but no such proceedings shall be taken or defended until the approbation of a majority of the members present at a special meeting of the association shall have been obtained."

"That the president of the committee shall have power to call a special meeting of the committee at any time; and the committee shall have power to call a special meeting of the members at any time, by giving three clear days' notice thereof to such members, and specifying the cause of the meeting."

"That the president, on receiving a written request signed by twelve of the members to convene a special general meeting of the association, shall within three days after receiving such request convene such meeting by letter," &c.

Rule 8. "That so often as the funds of the association shall amount to a share or sum of 120*l.*, (or by an anticipation, that is, before the funds actually amount to that sum, if the committee shall so determine,) the share shall be awarded to the highest bidder by ticket or premium for the preference; but no member shall be allowed to advance less than 10*s.* on each bidding, and the purchaser shall have the privilege of taking as many additional shares at the same rate as he may choose, on giving notice of such an intention to the president at the time of sale; and the committee shall have the power to sell an additional quarter, half, or three-quarter share at the same premium as the last purchase, if required."

Rule 11. "That when any member shall have been awarded his or her share or shares pursuant to Article 8, he or she shall give notice of the situation of the premises intended to be offered for the security thereof to the secretary, and he shall forthwith transmit a copy of the same to the surveyor, and the surveyor shall within seven days after the receipt thereof examine the premises mentioned in such notice, and make his report in writing to the committee."

"That when the committee shall be satisfied that the premises so to be offered as aforesaid are a sufficient security to the association, they shall direct the trustees to pay to such member the sum or sums of money which he or she shall be entitled to receive, on such member executing a deed in trust to sell, or such other valid conveyance, mortgage, or assurance of such premises as the solicitors to the association shall require, and depositing the same and all other necessary title-deeds relating thereto with the trustees as a security to the said association for so much money as shall therein be expressed to be secured, and the trustees shall make such payment accordingly."

Rule 28. "That the committee for the time being, or the major part of them, shall determine all disputes which may arise respecting the construction of these rules or any of the clauses, matters, or things herein contained, and also of any additions, alterations, or amendments which shall or may hereafter arise between the trustees, officers, or other members of this association, and the decision of the committee, if satisfactory, shall be conclusive; but if not satisfactory, reference shall be made to arbitration pursuant to 10 Geo. 4. c. 56. s. 27; and at the first meeting of this association after the involvement of these rules five arbitrators shall be elected, none of the said arbitrators being beneficially interested directly or indirectly in the funds of this association, and in each case of dispute the names of the arbitrators shall be written on pieces of paper and placed in a box or glass, and the three whose names are first drawn by the complaining party, or some one appointed by him or her, shall be the arbitrators to decide the matter in dispute, whose decision shall be final."

(2) Sect. 1. "Whereas certain societies commonly called building societies have been established in different parts of the kingdom, principally amongst the industrious classes, for the purpose of raising by small periodical subscriptions a fund to purchase the members thereof in obtaining a small freehold or leasehold property, and it is expedient to amend securities; secondly, that the action was not brought with the approbation of the majority of members present at a "special meeting," as required by the third rule; and thirdly, that the proper mode of proceeding was by reference to arbitration under the twenty-eighth rule. The learned Judge overruled the objections, and directed a verdict for the plaintiffs.

J. Brown now moved for a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.—The certified rules and regulations shew that the purposes of the society are not limited to those mentioned in the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32, for the regulation of benefit building societies. Though one of the objects of the association encouragement and protection to such societies, and the property obtained therewith: be it enacted, &c. that it shall and may be lawful for any number of persons in Great Britain and Ireland to form themselves into and establish societies for the purpose of raising by the monthly or other subscriptions of the several members of such societies, shares not exceeding the value of 150*l.* for each share, such subscriptions not to exceed in the whole 20*s.* per month for each share, a stock or fund for the purpose of enabling each member thereof to receive out of the funds of such society the amount or value of his or her share or shares therein to erect or purchase one or more dwelling-house or dwelling-houses, or other real or leasehold estate, to be secured by way of mortgage to such society until the amount or value of his or her shares shall have been fully repaid to such society, with the interest thereon, and all fines or other payments incurred in respect thereof, and to and for the several members of such society from time to time to assemble together, and to make, ordain, and constitute such proper and wholesome rules and regulations for the government and guidance of the same as to the major part of the members of such society so assembled together shall seem meet, so as such rules shall not be repugnant to the express provisions of this act, and to the general laws of the realm, and to impose and inflict such reasonable fines, penalties, and forfeitures upon the several members of any such society who shall offend against any such rules, as the members may think fit, to be respectively paid to such uses for the benefit of such society as such society by such rules shall direct, and also from time to time to alter and amend such rules as occasion shall require, or annul or repeal the same, and to make new rules in lieu thereof, under such restrictions as are in this act contained; provided that no member shall receive or be entitled to receive from the funds of such society any interest or dividend by way of annual or other periodical profit upon any shares in such society until the amount or value of his or her share shall have been realized, except on the withdrawal of such member, according to the rules of such society then in force."

is to enable members to receive out of the funds of the society the amount of his shares to erect or purchase houses or land, yet another object is to lend money to members on mortgage, without regard to the purpose to which it may be applied. Such an object was never contemplated by the statute. The eighth rule provides, that so often as the funds of the association shall amount to a share of 120*l.* the share shall be awarded to the highest bidder, who shall have the privilege of taking as many additional shares at the same rate as he may choose.

[PARKE, B.—It may be that the intention of the legislature was not to allow any one member to acquire a larger interest than 150*l.* in respect of his share or shares; but that objection does not seem to have been taken at the trial.]

By the eleventh rule, when any member shall have been awarded his share, he is to give notice to the secretary of the situation of the premises intended to be offered for security, and when the committee shall be satisfied that the premises so to be offered are a sufficient security to the association, they shall direct the trustees to pay to such member the sum of money which he shall be entitled to receive on executing a mortgage of the premises. These societies are exempt from the penalties of usury, and also from the charges of stamp duty; but the legislature could never have intended that those exemptions should apply to loans to members at usurious interest. If so, a person who wished to borrow money on mortgage might avoid the payment of stamp duty by becoming a member of one of these societies.

[PARKE, B.—There is no usury in benefit societies lending to their members money at more than 5*l.* per cent. They are both lenders and borrowers—Silver v. Barnes (3).]

The defendant is entitled to a verdict on the issue raised by the thirteenth plea; for though a meeting was held, and the approbation of the majority of the members then present obtained before the action was commenced, yet the meeting was not a "special meeting," as required by the rule, but a "special general meeting."

(3) 6 Bing. N.C. 180; s.c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 118.

[ALDERSON, B.—The meaning of a “special meeting” is, that the meeting shall not be convened unless the parties have notice of the purpose of the meeting. A meeting may be both general and special—general for the purpose of doing general business, and special for a particular purpose: then it becomes a special general meeting.]

[ROLFE, B.—A special general meeting is both special and general.]

The issue raised by the fourteenth plea ought also to have been found for the defendant. Crisp v. Bunbury (4) decided that since the 9 Geo. 4. c. 92, an action will not lie against the trustees of a benefit society, and that in the case of disputes the only mode of proceeding is by arbitration. This case differs from that of a private agreement to refer, since these rules are made under and have the force of an act of parliament. The 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32. incorporates the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 10 Geo. 4. c. 56, the 27th section of which requires the rules of every such society to provide for reference of disputes to arbitration.

[PARKE, B.—This rule contains no provision for enforcing the award in case of non-payment of the money.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—There ought to be no rule. If at the trial it had been objected that the society was not within the act, because it enabled members to hold an unlimited number of shares, each of which might be the maximum share, and consequently one member might have in himself the whole interest in the society—if that objection had been raised, the Court would probably have taken time to consider the construction of the act. But the objection taken was, that the society could not lend money on mortgage to its own members. It is conceded, that the society might lend money to persons not members; and I have looked into the act of parliament to see whether it contains any exclusion of loans to members, but I find none. If then the society may lend to strangers, I see no reason why they should not lend to any of their own body: on the contrary, it is quite within the scope of the society. With respect to the second objection, the answer has been already given by my Brother Alderson. By a “special meeting” is meant a meeting for those matters of which the parties have had special notice. Here they had notice of the purpose of the meeting, which was held for that and also for other purposes. As to the last objection, the 28th rule does not make it imperative to refer a matter of this kind to arbitration. That rule applies only to differences in respect of the construction of the rule, or any additions, alterations, or amendments therein.

PARKE, B.—I agree with the Lord Chief Baron. There is nothing in the act of parliament to prevent the society from purchasing from its members the fee simple of an estate, then why may they not take a mortgage of the estate? With respect to the question as to the number of shares that any one member may hold, that point does not appear to have been taken at the trial, and therefore does not arise now. As to the second objection, the answer has been already given. With respect to the last, the 28th rule applies only to disputes respecting the construction of the rules, and an action on a covenant is not a matter in dispute to be referred in pursuance of that rule.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. The point as to the number of shares which one member may hold was not taken: if it had been, I should have desired time to consider whether the meaning of the act is not that each member is to have an interest to the extent of 150*l.*, and no more, whether in one or more shares. With respect to the other objection, there is no ground for saying that this is a matter to be referred to arbitration.

ROLFE, B. concurred.

plaintiff the respective sums of 1,300*l.* and 700*l.*, with interest. Plea, in substance, that the plaintiff was a mortgagee, by two mortgages, of an estate which was insufficient, upon an estimate of its value, to pay the mortgage money due from the testator; that three other mortgagees were in the same situation, the estate realized to each being less in estimated value than the charge upon it; that the defendants were devisees of the real estate, and executors of the deceased mortgagor; that they had received assets, which, after deducting the costs and expenses payable by them in the first instance, and in preference to the debts due from the testator, and also excepting some furniture, amounted to the deficiency on each mortgage; and thereupon it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant, and each of the mortgagees, as the common consent of all, and at the request of each, that no suit should be instituted for the administration of assets, and that the said balance of the assets, after deducting the furniture which should be given to the widow, should be divided rateably between the different mortgagees, and paid to them in satisfaction of the sums due to them over and above the estimated value of the estates; and that all the respective rights and equities of redemption, or other rights of the defendants, as executors and trustees to the mortgaged property, should thenceforth be wholly barred, extinguished, satisfied, and discharged, and the mortgagees should thenceforth become absolute owners, both at law and in equity, of the mortgaged estates, and that the covenants in the declaration should be satisfied and discharged, in consideration of the premises. The plea then averred payment to each of his share of the assets, and that the several rights and equities of redemption were barred and extinguished. Replication, that it was not agreed, nor did the defendants pay to the plaintiff the sum of money in the plea mentioned, upon which issue was joined. The Judge, at the trial, having ruled that the plea could not be proved, except by an agreement in writing,—Held, that although an agreement to convey an equity of redemption must be in writing, this plea would have been good on demurrer, even though it had expressly stated the contract to have been by parol, inasmuch as the agreement by the plaintiff to forego the balance of his mort- gage beyond the value of the estate upon receiving his share of the assets, was binding on him, and the receipt of his share of the assets was a satisfaction for the estate; because the agreement of the other mortgagees to take their shares of the assets also was a good consideration for giving up the claim for the residue of the debt against the defendants.

Debt. The first count of the declaration was on an indenture of the 14th of February 1823 made between Ames and Foyson, whereby Foyson covenanted to pay to Ames 1,300*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent, on the 27th of August 1823. The second count was on an indenture of the 9th of April 1825, made between Foyson of the first part, E. Lawes, S. Parkinson and the plaintiff, as executors of Ames, deceased, of the second part, and one J. R. Staff of the third part, whereby Foyson covenanted to pay to the said Lawes, Parkinson and the plaintiff 700*l.*, with interest at 4*l.* per cent. on the 9th day of October 1825.

Plea—That before the making of the indenture in the first count mentioned, the said Foyson had a certain interest in certain hereditaments, that is to say, a certain power of appointment of the said hereditaments, and the fee simple thereof was vested in the said Foyson, and the said hereditaments and the fee simple thereof were limited and assured to such uses as the said Foyson should, at any time or times, and from time to time thereafter, by any deed or deeds to be by him duly executed, direct, limit or appoint; and in default of such direction, limitation, or appointment, and subject thereto, to the ultimate use of the said Foyson and his heirs and assigns for ever. And the defendants further say, that the said indenture in the first count mentioned was an indenture of mortgage, whereby in consideration of the said sum of 1,300*l.*, in the first count mentioned, lent by the said Ames to the said Foyson, at or before the making of the same indenture, the said Foyson, by virtue and in exercise and execution of the powers then vested in him in that behalf as aforesaid, did by the said indenture by him duly executed as aforesaid, direct, limit and appoint, that the said hereditaments should thenceforth go, remain, continue and be unto the said Ames, his executors, administrators and assigns for the term of 1,000 years, to be computed from the day next before the day of the date of the same indenture, and fully to be complete and ended, subject nevertheless to a certain proviso or condition, in the same indenture contained, whereby it was provided, that if the said Foyson, his heirs, executors, administrators, appointees, or assigns, some or one of them, should and did pay, or cause to be paid unto the said Ames, his executors, administrators, or assigns, at or in his or their dwelling-house for the time being, the said sum of 1,300*l.*, together with interest for the same, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, on the 27th of August then next, without any deduction or abatement whatsoever, then and in such case the said term of 1,000 years and the said appointment thereof should cease and determine. And the said covenant in the said first count mentioned was a covenant in the same indenture contained, to secure the payment to the said Ames, his executors, administrators, or assigns, by the said Foyson, his executors, administrators, appointees, or assigns of the said sum of 1,300*l.* so lent on the said mortgage security as aforesaid. And the defendants further say, that the said Foyson made default in the payment of the said sum of 1,300*l.* and interest on the said 27th of August then next, according to the said proviso, and omitted to pay the said sum of 1,300*l.* and interest on the said 27th of August then next, according to his said covenant in that behalf as in the first count mentioned. And the defendants further say, that afterwards and after the death of the said Ames, and at the time of the making of the said indenture in the last count mentioned, the said Foyson continued to have such interest as aforesaid, in the said hereditaments and such power of appointment as aforesaid, subject to the said term of 1,000 years, and had a certain interest in the equity of redemption of the said hereditaments from the said mortgage. And the defendants further say, that the said indenture in the last count mentioned was an indenture of further mortgage, whereby in consideration of the further sum of 700*l.*, being the sum of 700*l.* in the said last count mentioned, also lent by the said Lawes, and J. S. Parkinson, and the plaintiff, as such executors as aforesaid, to the said Foyson, at or before the making of the last-mentioned indenture, and also in consideration of the sum of 10*s.* paid by the said J. R. Staff to the said Foyson, before the making of the last-mentioned indenture, the said Foyson, by virtue and in exercise and execution of the power therein then vested in him in that behalf, and at the request and by the direction of the said Lawes, Parkinson, and the plaintiff, as such executors as aforesaid, did, by the last-mentioned indenture by him duly executed as aforesaid, direct, limit, and appoint that the said hereditaments, and the reversion thereof expectant on the determination of the said term of 1,000 years, should thenceforth go, remain, continue, and be to the use of the said J. R. Staff, his heirs and assigns, upon certain trusts in the last-mentioned indenture contained, and did bargain, sell, assign, transfer, and set over unto the said J. R. Staff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, certain goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects of the said Foyson, and all the rights, title, and interest, property, claim, and demand, both legal and equitable, of him, the said Foyson, therein and thereto, to have, hold, receive, take, and enjoy the said goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects unto the said J. R. Staff, his executors and administrators, (with power of sale, fully set out in the plea), and should stand and be possessed of the money arising by and from such sale or sales upon certain trusts, that is to say, upon trust, amongst others, to pay and discharge the principal money and interest which should be then due and owing upon or by virtue of any mortgage affecting the said hereditaments and premises, or any part of the same at the date of the said last-mentioned indenture, and to pay to the said Lawes, Parkinson, and the plaintiff, their executors, administrators and assigns, the said sum of 700*l.* and the interest then due for the same, at and after the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, and after payment thereof respectively, should pay the then surplus, if any, of the money arising from such sale or sales as aforesaid, unto the said Foyson, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and which said covenant in the last count mentioned was a covenant in the said last-mentioned indenture contained, to secure the payment to the said Lawes, Parkinson, and the plaintiff, as such executors as aforesaid, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, by the said Foyson, his heirs, executors, and administrators, of the said sum of 700*l.* and interest, so lent on the said last-mentioned mortgage security as aforesaid, on the said 9th of October then next. And the defendants further say, that from the time of the making of the said last-mentioned indenture until and at the time of the making of the accord and satisfaction hereinafter mentioned, the said Foyson, during his lifetime, and the defendants after his death, had a certain equitable interest in the equity of redemption of the said hereditaments, and of the said goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects, subject to the said two several mortgage securities, and in any such surplus monies (if any) as aforesaid, as might arise from the sale, by the said J. R. Staff, of the said hereditaments, and of the said goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects. (The plea then went on to aver that Foyson in his lifetime was possessed of an interest in certain other hereditaments, and then set out several mortgages, that is to say, a mortgage to one Aufrere for 900*l.*, with covenant to pay; a mortgage to one Wiley for 400*l.*, with covenant to pay; a mortgage to one Lawes for 200*l.*, with a covenant to pay.) That Foyson at the time of his decease was indebted to certain other persons in certain simple contract debts; and the defendants, as such executors, had incurred certain necessary and unavoidable debts and expenses in and about obtaining probate of the said will, and in and about the funeral of the said Foyson; which said last-mentioned debts and expenses the defendants, as such executors, were lawfully entitled and bound to satisfy and discharge, out of the goods, chattels, and effects of Foyson at the time of his death, in the hands of the defendants, as such executors, to be administered before the said mortgage debts, and before any other debts of the said Foyson, and after setting apart a sufficient sum out of the goods, chattels, and effects of Foyson, at the time of his death, in the hands of the defendants, as such executors, to be administered, and applying the same in payment and satisfaction of the said necessary and unavoidable debts and expenses, there remained in the hands of the defendants, as such executors, at the time of the making of the accord and satisfaction hereinafter mentioned, goods, chattels, and effects, which were of the said Foyson deceased at the time of his death of such a value as was sufficient to satisfy and discharge the said several mortgage debts, due in respect of the said several covenants and indentures, to wit, of the value of 1,042*l.*, and no more; and there were no other goods, chattels, and effects of Foyson at the time of his decease whatever, except the household furniture herein mentioned. That after the death of Foyson and Ames, and in the lifetime of Lawes, it was estimated, as the truth and fact was, that the said hereditaments so conveyed and assured by way of mortgage to Aufrere, and the said equitable interest in the same, so vested in the defendants, were of less value than the said sum, to wit, 900*l.*, so secured by the said mortgage, to be paid to Aufrere, and all interest due thereon, by the sum of 300*l.*; that the said hereditaments, goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects, mentioned in the said first and second indentures, and mortgaged as aforesaid to Ames, Lawes, Parkinson, and the plaintiff, and the said equitable interest in the same so vested in the defendants, were of less value than the said two sums of 1,300*l.* and 700*l.*, so secured by the said firstly and secondly-mentioned indentures to be paid to Ames, Lawes, Parkinson, and the plaintiff, and all interest due thereon by the sum of 500*l.* (The plea then stated that the hereditaments mortgaged to Wiley, and the equitable interest in the same, were of less value than 400*l.*, and all interest then due thereon, by the sum of 133*l.*; that the hereditaments mortgaged to Lawes, and the equitable interest in the same were of less value than 200*l.*, by the sum of 109*l.*, of which the plaintiff, Staff, Aufrere, &c. had notice.) And thereupon the defendants, as such executors as aforesaid, agreed with one another, and the plaintiff and Lawes, as such executors as aforesaid, and with Staff, and with Aufrere, and with Wiley, respectively, with the full knowledge and consent and at the request of each and every of them respectively, that the said several debts and covenants, and all damages accrued in respect thereof, respectively, including the said debts and causes of action in the declaration, should be respectively satisfied and discharged by the arrangement, on the terms and in the manner following, (that is to say) that no suit should be instituted by the plaintiff and Lawes, as such executors, or as such creditors as aforesaid, or by Staff or by Lawes as such mortgagee or covenantee, or by Aufrere or by Wiley, or by all or any of them, for causing the goods, chattels and effects which were of Foyson at the time of his death, in the hands of the defendants, as such executors as aforesaid, to be administered, but that the household furniture, parcel of the said goods, chattels, and effects, which were of Foyson deceased, at the time of his death, should thenceforth be taken, had, possessed, and enjoyed by the widow of Foyson, for her own use and benefit; that a sufficient part of the residue of the said goods, chattels, and effects which were of Foyson deceased at the time of his death, in the hands of the defendants, as such executors, to be administered, should be set apart and applied by the defendants as such executors for and in the payment and satisfaction of the said necessary and unavoidable debts and expenses, and the residue of the said goods, chattels, and effects which then were estimated and admitted by the defendants, the plaintiff, Lawes, Staff, Aufrere and Wiley, as the fact was, to be of the value of 1,042*l.*, and no more, should be divided and distributed by the defendants as such executors as aforesaid, between and amongst the plaintiff and Lawes, as such executors as aforesaid, the said Lawes, as such mortgagee and covenantee, the said Aufrere and Wiley, in proportion to the respective amounts remaining due to each of them respectively, in respect of their said respective debts, securities, and covenants, after deducting from the amount due for debts and damages, in respect of each of the said respective debts and covenants respectively, the estimated value, estimated as aforesaid, of the respective hereditaments and premises so mortgaged as aforesaid to each of them respectively, for securing the payment of the said respective debts as aforesaid, (that is to say) that 500*l.*, parcel of the said 1,042*l.*, should be paid by the defendants as such executors as aforesaid, to the plaintiff and Lawes, as such executors as aforesaid, and that 300*l.*, other parcel of the said sum of 1,042*l.*, should be paid by the defendants as such executors, to Aufrere, as such mortgagee and covenantee as aforesaid, and that 133*l.*, other part of the said sum of 1,042*l.*, should be paid to Wiley as such mortgagee and covenantee as aforesaid; and that 109*l.*, residue of the said sum of 1,042*l.*, should be paid to Lawes as such mortgagee and covenantee as aforesaid; and that all the respective rights and equities of redemption, or other right of the defendants as such executors and trustees, or otherwise, of and in the said first-mentioned hereditaments, and of and in the said goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects, and of and in the said surplus money, if any, to arise from such sale as aforesaid of the said first-mentioned hereditaments, goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects, or any of them, by the said Staff as aforesaid, and also of and in the said secondly-mentioned hereditaments, so conveyed and assured to Aufrere as aforesaid, and also of and in the said thirdly-mentioned hereditaments, so conveyed and assured to Wiley as aforesaid, and also of and in the fourthly-mentioned hereditaments, so conveyed and assured to Lawes as aforesaid, respectively, should be thenceforth respectively wholly barred, extinguished, satisfied and discharged, and that the plaintiff and Lawes, or Staff as their trustee, should thenceforth become and be the absolute owner both at law and in equity of the said first-mentioned hereditaments, goods, chattels, fixtures, and effects, and that Aufrere should thenceforth become and be the absolute owner, both at law and in equity of the said secondly-mentioned hereditaments, and that Wiley should thenceforth become and be the absolute owner both at law and in equity of the said thirdly-mentioned hereditaments, and that Lawes should thenceforth become and be the absolute owner both at law and in equity of the said fourthly-mentioned hereditaments, and that the said two covenants in the declaration mentioned, and all debts and damages in respect thereof, and the said covenant for payment to Aufrere of the said sum of 900*l.* and interest, and all debts and damages accrued in respect thereof, and the said covenant for the payment to Wiley of the said sum of 400*l.* and interest, and all debts and damages accrued in respect thereof, and the said covenant for payment to Lawes of the said sum of 200*l.* and interest, and all debts and damages accrued in respect thereof, should, in consideration of the premises, be respectively satisfied and discharged. That in pursuance and performance, and according to the true intent and meaning of the said arrangement and agreement, no such suit in equity as aforesaid was instituted, and that the said household furniture was taken, had, possessed and enjoyed by the said widow of the said Foyson, for her own use and benefit. (The plea then averred payment to the plaintiff and Lawes, as such executors, and acceptance by them of the sum of 500*l.* upon the terms aforesaid, also payment to Aufreze of 300*l.*, payment to Wiley of 133*l.*, and payment to Lawes of 109*l.*.) That the several rights and equities of redemption, and other rights of the defendants, as such executors and trustees as aforesaid, of and in the said several hereditaments firstly, secondly, thirdly, and fourthly above mentioned, and of and in the said goods, chattels, and effects, and of and in the said surplus, if any, to arise by sale thereof as aforesaid, became and were barred and extinguished; and in consideration thereof, and of other the premises aforesaid, each of the said several covenants and all debts and damages accrued due in respect thereof, respectively became and were, by and with the said agreement and consent and at the request of the plaintiff and Lawes, as such executors and creditors as aforesaid, and of Lawes as such mortgagee and covenantee, and of Aufreze and Wiley, as such mortgagees and covenantees respectively, wholly satisfied and discharged, according to the true intent and meaning of the said arrangement and agreement. Verification.

Replication, that it was not agreed, nor did the defendants pay to the plaintiff and Lawes, nor did the plaintiff and Lawes accept or receive of or from the defendants the said sum of money in the first plea mentioned modo et forma; upon which issue was joined.

The cause came on to be tried, before Pollock, C.B., at the Norfolk Spring Assizes for 1847.

Andrews, for the defendants, began, and said he could prove the plea only by parol.

Byles, Serj., for the plaintiff, objected that it could not be proved without a memorandum in writing. On the other hand it was contended, that a memorandum in writing was unnecessary, and that, at all events, enough of the plea could be proved by parol to make it an answer to the action. The learned Judge was of opinion that the plea could not be proved without a memorandum in writing, and directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff.

Andrews having obtained a rule, in the following term, to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial on the ground of misdirection,—

Fitzpatrick (Byles, Serj. with him) shewed cause (June 21).—Upon the issue joined, the agreement is one which ought to be in writing under the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3. s. 4. It is for an interest in land: it provides that all interest in the said hereditaments is to become the property of the mortgagees. The issue is taken on the agreement. There is no authority to shew that an equitable interest is not within the Statute of Frauds. In Hodgkinson v. Wyatt (1), a loan was secured by the deposit of title-deeds, and it was held, that this was an interest in land within the meaning of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 37. s. 1. The words in the last-mentioned statute, "security of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any estate or interest therein," are not so strong as the words "lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them," in the Statute of Frauds. The question is, is an equitable interest within the Statute of Frauds?

[PARKE, B.—There seems no doubt about that.]

Carrington v. Roots (2) decides that it is not necessary, in order that the statute should apply, that the action should be brought on the agreement; but it is enough if the effect of the action is to charge the party by means of the agreement. Lord Abinger there says, "The meaning of the statute is not that the statute shall stand for all purposes, except that of being enforced by action, but it means that the contract shall be altogether void."

(2) 2 Mee. & Wels. 248; a.c. 6 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 95.

[PARKE, B.—The question is, could this plea, or so much of it as is an answer to the action, be proved by parol?]

They contend that part performance can take the case out of the Statute of Frauds. That is not so in the case of an interest in land. It would certainly seem, from the cases of Lord Guernsey v. Rodbridges (3) and Lester v. Foxcroft (4), that the courts of equity have held that doctrine; but it does not appear in those cases whether there was any plea of the statute. There is, however, no such doctrine at law. Whitbread v. Brockhurst (5) and Brodie v. St. Paul (6) are the only two cases which at all throw out such a notion.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—I think you need not give yourself any more trouble about that. There is no such doctrine at law.]

The Court then called on—

Palmer, in support of the rule.—The ground on which the doctrine of part performance rests is stated in 1 Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, p. 140, "Where agreements have been carried partly into execution, the Court will decree performance of them, in order that one side may not take advantage of the statute to be guilty of fraud." The circumstances stated in this plea are sufficient to entitle the defendants to aid from a court of equity. It is not necessary to say there has been a conveyance of land, but that the parties have got all they bargained for, and that they have got it without a note in writing. The executors might have preferred any creditors in equal degree. A mortgage without a covenant is a simple contract debt; with a covenant it becomes a specialty. In Powell on Mortgages, citing Martin v. Mowlin (7), it is laid down that the words "lands, tenements, and hereditaments" in a devise do not include mortgages. Ancaster v. Mayer (8) shews that a mortgage is a simple debt, and the land is only an accessory as a security, and if the principal is gone the accessory goes with it. Debt does not lie against the heir if there are assets—3 Lev. 3.

The plea alleges that A. B. and C. were mortgagees of different estates of Foyson, and there were other simple contract creditors: they all meet together, they value the different securities, and in order to prevent legal proceedings, they then distribute all the estate, except the furniture, pro rata. This need not be in writing. There was here a sufficient consideration for the subsequent contract—Good v. Cheeseman (9), Alchin v. Hopkins (10).

[PARKE, B.—Can you support your plea on the ground of the composition? Must you not shew that the plaintiff became the absolute owner at law and in equity of the estate? He was not bound by his agreement unless he got the equity of redemption. If this is a bad plea, you must prove the whole of it.]

It is submitted, that the equity was barred by the arrangement. We say you have a trust in our favour, we will not attempt to redeem it. We do not transfer the equity of redemption; we only consent to its being extinguished. It is admitted, on the pleadings, that the plaintiff has received his share of the assets; there is, therefore, a valid accord.

ROLFE, B.—The only question in this case is, whether the plea, which is a very special one, could be proved without a note in writing. The defendant was stopped in the case by my Lord Chief Baron, upon the statement by the defendant's counsel that he had not any such proof. Upon attentively considering the allegations in the plea, we think that it might be proved by parol. It is unnecessary to say, in this stage of the proceedings, whether the plea if proved would be a good bar. Accord and satisfaction is no bar to an action for a debt certain covenanted to be paid; but this plea is not meant to be one simply of accord and satisfaction; being in an action against executors, it is a sort of special plea of plene administravit, by an even division of assets, a part being given up for good consideration. We assume the plea to be good, for the purpose of disposing of the question, whether there should be a new trial. The substance of the plea is this: that the plaintiff was a mortgagee by two mortgages of an estate which was insufficient, upon an estimate of its value, to pay the mortgage money due from the testator; that three other mortgagees were in the same situation, the estate realized to each being less in estimated value than the charge upon it; that the defendants were devisees of the real estate and executors of the deceased mortgagor; that they had received assets, which, after deducting the costs and expenses payable by them in the first instance, and in preference to the debts due from the testator, and also excepting some furniture, amounted to the deficiency on each mortgage, and thereupon it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendant and each of the mortgagees, as the common consent of all, and at the request of each, that no suit should be instituted for the administration of assets, and that the said balance of the assets, after deducting the furniture, which should be given to the widow, should be divided rateably between the different mortgagees, and paid to them in satisfaction of the sums due to them over and above the estimated value of the estates; and that all the respective rights and equities of redemption, or other rights of the defendants, as executors and trustees to the mortgaged property, should thenceforth be wholly barred, extinguished, satisfied and discharged, and the mortgagees should thenceforth become absolute owners both at law and in equity of the mortgaged estates, and that the covenants in the declaration should be satisfied and discharged in consideration of the premises. The plea then avers the payment to each of his share of the assets, and that the several rights and equities of redemption of the defendants were barred and extinguished. The issue raised by the replication was, that it was not agreed, nor did the defendants pay to the plaintiff the sum of money in the plea mentioned. The averment that the equities were barred and extinguished was not in issue; and the question is, whether on the traverse of the agreement it was necessary to prove an agreement in writing by the defendants to convey or release their equity of redemption.

It must be admitted that no agreement to convey an equity of redemption would be binding unless in writing, because a court of equity treats the equity of redemption as the land itself,—at all events, as an interest in land; and if in this case it were essential to support the plea that a binding agreement to convey the equity of redemption should be proved, the plea would have been held bad on demurrer, for not stating the contract to be in writing, and to make it good a contract in writing must have been proved. But this plea would have been held good on demurrer, even if it had been expressly stated that the contract was by parol, for the agreement by the plaintiff to forego the balance of his mortgage debt above the value of the estate on receiving his share of the assets would be obligatory on him, and the receipt of that share a satisfaction for the estate, though there was no binding agreement on the defendants to convey the equity of redemption; for the agreement of the other mortgagees to take their share also, is a good consideration for giving up the claim for the residue of the debt against the defendants. Without such an agreement by all, the plaintiff and each of the other mortgagees would have had a right to sue the defendants to recover all the assets, which, in the proper course of administration, ought to have been paid to the specialty creditors. Each would have had his chance of recovering so much as would satisfy his debt, but the chance only, for the defendants might have paid one, or confessed judgment to one, and left the others totally or partially unpaid, according as the debt paid absorbed the whole or only a part of the assets. The giving up this chance by each of getting the whole is a good consideration for each agreeing to take less than the whole of the assets, and such a binding agreement of all and actual payment of the share is a good satisfaction of the whole. It would be so without any stipulation as to barring or extinguishing the equity of redemption, and it is not the less so with the addition of that stipulation, though it was not obligatory on the defendants. Indeed, in a plea of accord and satisfaction, the accord, generally speaking, is not obligatory. Here, the accord is composed partly of the obligatory agreement of each not to claim the whole of the assets, and partly of the non-obligatory agreement by the defendants to pay the debts, and yield up the equity of redemption. The effect of it is this: the creditors bind themselves to take their share and give up the residue, if the defendants will pay the rateable share of each and give up the equity of redemption; and the plea avers this to have been done; and the replication denies only the agreement of all, and the fact of payment. We think, therefore, that in this case there was no necessity to prove an agreement in writing; and certainly from the form of the allegations in the plea the pleader never meant to aver that there was one. The rule must, therefore, be absolute.

April 21.* } BURNBY v. BOLLITT.

Vendor and Purchaser—Sale of Unwholesome Food—Implied Warranty.

The defendant, a farmer, purchased of a butcher the carcase of a pig which was exposed for sale in the public shambles, and left it there. Subsequently, the plaintiff offered for the carcase, and was told by the butcher he had already sold it to the defendant. The plaintiff afterwards met the defendant in the town, and for a trifling consideration the defendant transferred his bargain to the plaintiff. The carcase turned out to be measly and unfit for human food. There was no evidence that the defendant knew when he bought or sold the pig that it was diseased, but there was reasonable evidence that he knew it was intended for human food.

In an action on the case to recover the price of the pig as damages for the breach of an implied warranty,—Held, that the defendant not having dealt in the way of a common trader, and there being no evidence of a warranty or of fraud on his part, was not liable; and the plaintiff was nonsuited.

This was an action on the case. The declaration stated that the defendant, on &c., at Lincoln, publicly offered for sale the carcase of a pig, for the food of man, and thereby then and there falsely and frau-duently undertook and warranted that the said carcase was in a sound and wholesome condition, and fit for human consumption; whereby the plaintiff was induced to buy the said carcase at the sum of 6*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*: whereas, in truth and in fact, the said carcase was not in a sound and wholesome condition and fit for human consumption, but, on the contrary thereof, was unsound, unwholesome, and unfit for human consumption; whereby, &c.

Plea—Not guilty; and issue thereon.

At the trial, before Patteson, J., at the Lincolnshire Summer Assizes, 1847, the following facts were proved. The plaintiff and the defendant were farmers. The latter had bought the carcase of the pig in question at the stall of a butcher named Penrose, in the public shambles in Lincoln market. He did not take away the carcase, but left it there until he should have transacted other business he had in Lincoln. Before he returned for the carcase, the defendant came to the stall and offered to buy the pig, but Penrose told him he had already sold it to the defendant, but that perhaps he might be induced to part with it for a trifling profit. The plaintiff afterwards meeting with the defendant, bought the pig of him at a trifling advance in the price, but without any warranty of its soundness. The plaintiff took it home, and the next day it was found to be measly and shortly afterwards became wholly unfit for human food.

It did not appear that the defendant had any knowledge of the unsoundness of the meat either when he bought it or sold it to the plaintiff; but there was reasonable evidence that he knew it was to be used for human food. This action was brought to recover from the defendant the price of the pig as damages for the breach of the implied warranty stated in the declaration.

The learned Judge thought the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the jury found a verdict for him for the price of the pig.

Leave was reserved for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit if the Court should think the plaintiff was not on the above facts entitled to recover.

In the sittings after Hilary term (Feb. 11),

Humfrey and Hildyard shewed cause.—The question which the learned Judge intended to reserve at the trial is, whether a person who sells food for human consumption, which is unsound and unfit for the use of man, is liable to the vendee, though at the time of the sale he was not aware of its unsoundness, and gave no warranty of its fitness for human food. It is submitted, that in every case of the sale of food for the use of man, the law implies a warranty of its fitness, whether the sale be by a private individual or by a dealer in victuals in the course of his trade. The vendor, if he sell unwholesome food, is not only liable to the vendee, but may be indicted for a misdemeanour; and hence the universal practice of never asking for a warranty of soundness upon the sale of provisions. No express decision is to be found on the point; but this view of the law on the subject is supported by a series of dicta from the earliest times. In Keilway's Reports, 91. pl. 16, "Nota, per Frowike, que nul home poit justifier le vender de vitaille corrupt, mes action sur le case gist vers le vendor le quel le vitaille soit garrant destre bien ou nient garrant. The case referred to in Keilway is the 9 Hen. 6. 53 B., pl. 37. It was a writ of deceit upon the case by A. against B. and C, alleging that whereas the aforesaid A. bargained for a certain butt of wine from the said B. and C, the said C. knowing it to be corrupt and unfit to use (corruptam et inhabilem), warranted it fit for use and not corrupt, and sold it for a certain sum of money. Rolf. Judgment of the writ: for the writ is habilem with an h, whereas it should be abilem without an h, and thus false Latin or no Latin.—Babing. Some of the Chancery say that it should be written with an h, and some the contrary: you are therefore safe.—Rolf. Still judgment of the writ: for he does not allege that we warranted this to be good, and therefore it shall be adjudged his own folly.—Martin. The warranty is not to the purpose: for it is ordained that no one shall sell corrupt victuals.—Cottes. This is actio popularis.—Babing. The warranty, as Martin has said, is not to the purpose: for if I come into a tavern to eat, and he gives and sells me beer or flesh corrupt, whereby I am brought into great infirmity, I shall have an action against him on my case, clearly; and yet he made me no warranty.—Godred. It has been adjudged in the King's Bench, where one sold a piece de panno laneo sciens ipsam esse rancam and not well fulled, and this was adjudged good without warranty. And then West said that the writ alleged a warranty. And sic fuit.—Rolf.—ridendo et protestando, that the plaintiff is a wine drawer and knowing nothing of wines; and for plea we say for B, that at the time of the sale of the wine, the wine was sufficient and able.—Prest. Tota Curia. You ought to traverse the plea. And then he said, and not corrupt: and alii à contra: and for C. we say that he sold to the plaintiff by the aforesaid B. as his servant, without this, that he sold to him in any other manner.—Martin. Of your own knowledge you have deceived him.—Rolf. You say true: for you do not command him to sell the thing to him nor to any person in particular; but if your servant, by your covin and commandment, sells any corrupt wine, he shall have an action against you; for it is your own sale: and if the case be so, that you did not command your servant to sell to that same person, then you may say that you did not sell to the plaintiff.—(Prest.)—Rolf. It would be a great pity to put this matter in the mouth of lay people, which is a matter in law, &c. In the 1 Roll. Abr. 90, pl. 30, it is said, "If a vintner sells wine, knowing it to be corrupt, to another as sound, good, and not corrupt, without any express warranty, still an action of deceit lies against him; for this is a warranty in law." And at pl. 31. it is said, "So if I come into a tavern to eat, and the taverner gives and sells me drink and flesh corrupt, whereby I am put in great infirmity, an action lies against him without express warranty, for it is a warranty in law." In the case of Southerne v. Howe (7), it is put thus—"If a man knowing his wines to be corrupt sells them, an action lies against him, although he did not warrant them;" and 42 Ass. 8. and 9 Hen. 6. are cited for that position. In Roswell v. Vaughan (8), the opinion of Tanfield, C.B. and Altham, B. is thus stated: "If a man sells victuals which are corrupt, without warranty, an action lies; because it is against the commonwealth, as 9 Hen. 6, 53, 7 Hen. 4, 15, and 11 Edw. 4, 6." In Fitz. Nat. Brev. it is said, "If a man do sell unto another man a horse, and warrant him to be sound and good, &c., if the horse be lame or diseased that he cannot work, he shall have an action upon the case against him. So if a man bargain and sell unto another certain pipes of wine, and warrants them to be good, &c., and they are corrupted, he shall have an action upon the case against him. But it is to be noted that he warrant it to be a horse to be sound, otherwise it will not lie. For if he sells the wine without such warranty, it is no peril, and his eyes and his ears are the judges in that case." And by Lord Hale, it is said, "There is a great difference between selling corrupt wines or merchandise, for there an action on the case does not lie without warranty; otherwise, if it be by a taverner or victualler, if it prejudice any." There is a passage in 3 Black. Com. 166, to the same effect, viz.—"In contracts likewise for sales, it is constantly understood that the seller undertakes that the commodity he sells is his own; and if it proves otherwise, an action on the case lies against him, to exact damages for the deceit. In contracts for provisions it is always implied that they are wholesome; and if they be not, the same remedy may be had." With respect to indictments for selling unwholesome provisions, the law is thus laid down in Russell on Crimes and Misdemeanors, "The public health may be injured by selling unwholesome food, and it is an indictable offence to mix unwholesome ingredients in anything made and supplied for the food of man. And if a master knows that his servant puts into bread what the law has prohibited, and the servant from the quantity he puts in makes the bread unwholesome, the master is indictable criminally, for he should have taken care that more than is wholesome was not inserted."

[ALDERSON, B.—In the case in 11 Edw. 4, 6, pl. 10. there is a material distinction taken in the case of a man who sells a horse, and warrants that he has two eyes; if he has not, he shall not have an action of deceit, for he might have had consensence of that at the beginning.]

[PARKER, B.—In the 7 Hen. 4, 14, 15, pl. 19, the gist of the action is said to be the selling the wine knowing it to be corrupt.]

The case of a taverner who sells wine as merchandise (a pipe of wine, for instance) may be different from a sale in the regular way of his trade; but as a general rule, a person who manufactures a thing and sells it for a particular purpose, is understood to warrant that it is fit for that purpose—Lord Tenterden in Goss v. Cox (9). Sutton v.

T
ci
ar
(10)

If a contract for the sale of unwholesome provisions be illegal, how can it be said that the law attaches an implied warranty to such a contract? In Chanter v. Hopkins (11), Lord Abinger says, "A warranty is an express or implied statement of something which a party undertakes shall be part of a contract, and though part of the contract, yet collateral to the express object of it." The law implies no warranty on the sale of any specific chattel that it is fit for any particular purpose; but if a party agrees to manufacture, or perhaps even to supply, an article for a particular purpose, it is otherwise, and the vendee may return the article if it is unfit for the purpose—Shepherd v. Pybus, Brown v. Edgington.

[PARKE, B.—Those were cases of executory contracts, where no property was transferred by the bargain: in such the expression "implied warranty" is not correct; the bargain being, that if a man makes the thing you will pay him, and if he accepts that order, it is evidence of a contract on his part to perform it. In the present case we have the sale of a specific chattel; and there can be no doubt that on such a sale there is in general no implied warranty by the common law, although in the civil law it is otherwise—Co. Lit. 102, a; Noy's Max. c. 42; and the only question is, whether there is an exception to this rule, where the subject-matter of the sale is provisions to be eaten by man.]

The selling of unwholesome food is not illegal per se. If it were illegal the law would often be infringed, for sales are constantly made of venison and other articles of food which medical men would pronounce unwholesome. This is not the case of a trader in provisions, who perhaps may stand in the same situation as a manufacturer. But even in the case of a trader in provisions, there is no liability if due and reasonable care is exercised to ascertain that the provisions he sells are wholesome. The defendant was a mere private person transferring his bargain to the plaintiff at his own request. He had no knowledge of the unwholesome state of the carcase; and fraud, on his part, was negatived. All the cases cited on the other side proceed on the scienter of the seller; and, according to Lord Hale's note in Fitz. N.B. 94 b. a vintner is not liable for selling bad wine, unless it prejudice any.

[PARKE, B.—The strongest case in favour of the plaintiff is the 11 Edw. 4. 6, pl. 10. There Brian draws a distinction between selling sheep and selling mutton. "Si jeo vende a un home 20 berbits purtuer, s'ils sont corrupts, uncore si jeo garrante eux, il n'avera action de deceit sur le garrantie, et ne serra travers, car quant ils sont morts jeo ne puisse conustre que ils sont corruptes, quant jeo done trust et confidence à vous, si jeo suy disceive jeo averai action de disceit, &c., mes si je vende mutton pur manger quel est corrupt, il avera action de disceit, comment si je ne garrante cell." It is not, however, easy to see what is the distinction he means to take. Then some one (whether Judge or counsel I cannot collect from the report) says, "En vostre cas le cause est pur ce que il est prohibite per le leys que home vende vitaille corrupted," &c.]

That case is very obscure; but there are authorities in favour of the defendant. In 2 Black. Com. 451, it is said, "By the civil law an implied warranty was annexed to every sale in respect of the title of the vendor; and so, too, in our law a purchaser of goods and chattels may have a satisfaction from the seller if he sells them as his own, and the title proves deficient, without any express warranty for that purpose. But with regard to the goodness of the wares so purchased, the vendor is not bound to answer it, unless he knew them to be otherwise, and hath used any art to disguise them, unless they turn out to be different from what he represented them to the buyer." No exception is made of a vintner or dealer in provisions. In Com. Dig. 'Action upon the Case for a Deceit,' (A, 8): "So if a man by false affirmation of a thing within his knowledge deceive in the sale of goods: as if a taverner sell wine for sound and good, which he knows to be corrupt. Or give any one to eat corrupt meat or drink; for it is ordained that no one shall sell corrupt victuals, if he knows it." In this case fraud is altogether negatived, and the defendant is not liable.

(11) 4 Mee. & Wels. 399; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 14.

other things, inquiry is to be made of the vintners' names, and how they sell a gallon of wine, and if any corrupted wine be in the town, or such is not wholesome for man's body; and if any butcher sell contagious flesh, or that died of the murrain, or cooks that seethe the unwholesome flesh. Lord Coke then goes on to say, that "Britton, who wrote after the statute 51 Hen. 3, and following the same, saith thus: 'Puis soit inquis de ceux queux achatent per un manner de mesure et vendent per meinder mesure faux, et ceux sont punies come vendors des vines, et auxi ceux que serront atteints de faux aunes et faux poys, et auxi les macegrievés* et les gents que de usage vendent a trespassants mauvasse viands corrupus et wacrus et autrement perillous a la sauntie de home.' Et, fo. 33, he doth conclude the like passage with these words: 'Enconter le forme de nous statutes.'"

This view of the case explains what is said in the Year Book, 9 Hen. 6. 53, that "the warranty is not to the purpose; for it is ordained that none shall sell corrupt victuals;" and in Roswell v. Vaughan, where Tanfield, C.B. and Altham, B. say, "that if a man sells victuals which is corrupt without warranty, an action lies, because it is against the commonwealth." That also explains the note of Lord Hale, in 1st Fitzherbert's N.B. p. 94, that there is "diversity between selling corrupt wines and merchandise; for there an action on the case does not lie without warranty; otherwise, if it be for a taverner or victualler, if it prejudice any." The defendant in this case was not dealing in the way of a common trader, and was not punishable by indictment for what he did; he merely transferred his bargain to the plaintiff, and at his own request. He therefore falls within the reason of the former part of Lord Hale's distinction; and there being no evidence of a warranty or of any fraud he is not liable. The plaintiff ought, therefore, to have been nonsuited at the trial, and this rule must be made absolute.

* Macellarius, a butcher or victualler.

Rule absolute.

IN THE

Court of Exchequer of Pleas.

EASTER TERM, 11 VICTORIÆ.

1848. }
April 19. } WILLIAMS v. FIGOTT.

Railway Company—Contract—Committee of Management—Provisional Committee-man.

In an action brought against a member of the provisional committee of a proposed railway company, upon a contract entered into by the committee of management appointed by such provisional committee, it is a question of fact for the jury to determine from all the evidence in the cause whether the defendant had made the committee of management his agents for the purpose of pledging his individual credit.

Assumpsit for work and labour and materials; money lent; money paid; and on an account stated.

Pleas—Non assumpsit, and payment.

At the trial, before Patteson, J., at the last assizes for the county of Gloucester, it appeared that the action was brought to recover the amount of an attorney's bill, for business done by the plaintiff as the solicitor to "The Wolverhampton, Bridgnorth and Ludlow Railway Company." The defendant was a member of the provisional committee. On the 8th of November 1845 a meeting of the members of the provisional committee took place, which was attended both by the plaintiff and the defendant, and the prospectus of the company was then adopted, in which the defendant's name appeared as one of the provisional committee, and that of the plaintiff as the solicitor to the company. That prospectus contained the following clause: "Until an act of parliament shall be obtained, the affairs of the company will be under the direction and controul of the committee of management, who are hereby empowered to enter into such arrangements as shall best serve the interests of this company and the public, with existing or projected companies, and also to nominate the first directors of the company." At that meeting the committee of management was appointed, the defendant being present and taking a part in the proceedings. In the first instance, however, he was not proposed as one of the committee of management; but after he had left the room, his name was substituted in lieu of one of those previously appointed. The evidence relied on as shewing that although the appointment was made in the defendant's absence, it was done with his knowledge and sanction, was, that all the circulars afterwards issued to the members of the committee of management were sent to him and none of them returned; that he had promised to attend the meetings of such committee, although in point of fact he had never done so; and that advertisements had been inserted in newspapers which he was in the habit of reading, and in which his name appeared as one of the committee of management. In January 1846, in answer to an application made to the defendant as one of the provisional committee to take up the shares allotted to him, in order that a fund might be raised, out of which the expenses of the company might be paid, he wrote, that "after the best consideration which he had been able to give the subject, he thought it desirable to decline the shares which it was proposed to allot to him as one of the members of the provisional committee." It appeared further, that no fraud in any way attached to any of the proceedings of the company, but that it failed for lack of funds. In summing up the evidence, the learned Judge left it to the jury to say whether, in the first place, they were satisfied that the defendant was a member of the committee of management, in which case he would be liable; secondly, that if they were not so satisfied, then that the fact of the defendant being a member of the provisional committee did not make him personally liable, nor the fact that he assisted in the appointment of the committee of management; but that they must be satisfied under all the circumstances of the case that the defendant, as one of the provisional committee, appointed the committee of management his agents for the purpose of pledging his credit. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

Whately now moved for a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.—The jury must be taken to have found by their verdict that the defendant was not a member of the committee of management; but the Judge ought to have directed them to find a verdict for the plaintiff upon the ground that by the appointment of the committee of management, the provisional committee made them their agents to pledge their credit for the necessary expenses attending the formation of the company. In a case of Wood v. Harding, Wilde, C.J. is said to have directed the jury, "that a shareholder who was present at a meeting at which the committee of management was appointed, was personally liable for all the orders subsequently given of such committee."

[PARKE, B.—All depends upon the question adverted to in Reynell v. Lewis and

Wylde v. Hopkins (1), as to what is intended by appointing an acting committee: "Is the meaning that the acting committee is to take the whole management to the exclusion of the provisional committee, their provisional character having ceased, in which case the provisional committee would not be liable? or does it mean that the provisional committee-men have appointed the acting committee, or the majority of it, on their behalf and as their agents; in which case they would be liable for the contracts of the acting committee, or the majority, made as such agents?" This is a question of fact to be determined by the jury in each particular case.]

By the prospectus in this case, it is clear that the managing committee had power given to them by the provisional committee to enter into contracts on their behalf.

[PARKE, B.—The prospectus proves nothing. It is quite consistent with its terms, that the contracts entered into by the managing committee were as principals not agents. Generally speaking, a provisional committee after having once appointed an acting committee, think they have no further concern in the affairs or management of the company.]

He cited Barnett v. Lambert (2), and Pitchford v. Davis (3).

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that no rule ought to be granted in this case. It is impossible for this Court to lay it down as a rule of law, that if the provisional committee of a railway company appoint a committee of management, they make them their agents to pledge their credit. It is in every case a question for the jury. As to the case of Wood v. Harding, we have not any report of it before us, and we cannot, therefore, express any opinion as to the law there laid down; but I dare say, that under the circumstances of that case, the direction was perfectly correct.

PARKE, B.—I also think that there should be no rule. It was a question of fact for the jury to determine in this case,

(1) 15 Mee. & Wels. 530; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 31.

(2) 15 Ibid. 489; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 305.

whether the managing committee had been made by the defendant his agents to pledge his credit. All the difficulty which has arisen in cases of this nature has been from forgetting that you cannot make a party liable upon a contract which he has never entered into. In the present case, the summing up of my Brother Patteson was perfectly correct, and there ought, therefore, to be no rule.

ROLFE, B. and PLATT, B. concurred.

1848. } SMITH v. TATEHAM AND May 5. } ANOTHER.

Pleading—Executor—Judgment of Assets quando.

A judgment of assets quando acciderint affects all assets which at the time of such judgment are in the hands of the executor not administered, as well as those which may come into his hands subsequently.

Where, therefore, in an action against an executor, the defendant pleaded plene administravit præter, and the plaintiff replied that assets had come to the defendants' hands since plea pleaded,—Held, that such replication was unnecessary and bad.

Debt by the plaintiff against the defendants, as executors of W. G. deceased.

Plea, plene administravit præter 10l., which amount was insufficient to satisfy a specialty debt due by the testator to one J. S.

Replication, that this action was commenced on the 5th day of January A.D. 1847, and that after the commencement of this suit and after the pleading of the said plea by the defendants, and before this day, to wit, on the 15th day of May, A.D. 1847, and on divers other days and times since the said plea was pleaded, and before this day, divers goods and chattels and monies which were of the said W. G. at the time of his death, of great value, to wit, to the amount of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned, and over and above the value and amount of the said causes of action so confessed in the said plea to be due to the said J. S. and over and above the value and amount of the said debt of 110l. in the said plea mentioned, came to and were in the hands of the defendants, as executors aforesaid, to be administered, and wherewith the defendants could and ought to have satisfied the causes of action in the declaration mentioned. Verification.

Demurrer, assigning for cause, that the fact of assets having come to the hands of the executors, after the plea and before the replication, could not form the subject-matter of a good replication in law to the defendants' plea of plene administravit præter; and also that the matters set forth in the replication were not an avoidance of and afforded no answer to the defendants' said plea.

The plaintiff's points for argument were:—That the replication shewed facts which avoided the plea; and that the plaintiff could not pray judgment of assets quando, inasmuch as the plaintiff in order to recover such assets must shew that they came to the defendants' hands after the judgment, whereas the assets were here received by the defendants after plea and before replication; therefore, a judgment of assets quando would be of no avail to the plaintiff as far as those assets were concerned.

Needham, in support of the demurrer.—There is no necessity for such a replication as has been pleaded in this case; and it is contrary to precedent. The proper course for the plaintiff to have adopted was to have taken judgment of assets quando acciderint, and under such a judgment he would have been entitled to those assets which he seeks to affect by this replication—Chitty's Forms, p. 496, form 7; 1 W. Savd. 336, a; Mara v. Quin (1). The only precedent to be found in the books of such a replication is one in 3 Wentworth, 224; but from the opinion of Mr. Barrow, the pleader, there given, he himself seems to entertain great doubt as to its validity.

[ROLFE, B.—If you rejoined to this replication, plene administravit, there might be a surrejoinder similar to the replication, and so the pleadings might be indefinitely prolonged.]

[PARKE, B.—So, if the defendants allowed judgment to go by default, the effect would be to strike out all the pleadings, except the declaration, from the record, and there would be judgment of nil dicit against the defendants, which would make them liable to pay costs de bonis propriis, whereas upon a judgment of assets quando acciderint, the costs to be paid to the plaintiff are de bonis testatoris. That would be a great hardship.]

The COURT then called on—

Montague Smith to support the replication.—Where assets have come into the hands of an executor since plea pleaded, the proper course is to reply that fact. It is the only mode by which the plaintiff can reach those assets; for from the earliest times the form of judgment of assets quando acciderint has been that the plaintiff “do recover his debt, &c., to be levied of the goods and chattels which were of the testator at the time of his death, and which should thereafter come to the hands of the executor to be administered”—Noell v. Nelson (2); and in Serj. Williams’s note to that case he says, “It seems necessary to state that the assets came to the executor’s hands after the judgment.” In Mara v. Quin, as in the present case, assets had come to the defendant’s hands between the time of pleading and entering up judgment; and the Court, on motion, ordered the judgment to be amended by being antedated to a time anterior to that at which these assets had come into the hands of the executor. That amendment was unnecessary if the judgment had a retrospective effect, and embraced assets which had come into the executor’s hands in the interval between the plea and judgment. The judgments both of Lord Kenyon and Mr. Justice Ashurst in that case, suggest this mode of replication.—[He referred also to Taylor v. Holman (3), 1 Wms. Saund. 336, a, Williams’s Executors, 1534, note 1.]—With respect to the question of costs no serious difficulty would arise. If the replication is true, and the defendants allow judgment to go by default, all the pleadings might nevertheless remain upon the record, and the costs of the judgment would be costs de bonis testatoris. It is clear that by some means or another the plaintiff ought to be allowed his debt out of these assets. An interval must always elapse between the time of pleading and entering up judgment:

it would be unjust, therefore, to confine him to those assets only which had come into the hands of the executors since the judgment. The only other course is to alter the form of the ordinary judgment to that which is to be found in Mr. Chitty’s forms.

Needham replied.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that this replication is bad. The whole question turns upon what is the effect of a judgment of assets quando acciderint. It appears to us that such a judgment embraces not only those assets which may have actually come into the hands of the executors since judgment was signed, but all assets which may then exist in the hands of the executors, although received by them before. By giving such an effect to this judgment, we reconcile all the former cases and precedents. The plaintiff’s counsel was not correct when he stated that assets which come into the hands of the executors between writ and judgment of assets quando would not be reached by such judgment. In point of fact they will, unless in the meanwhile they have been properly disposed of by the executors.

PARKE, B.—I think that this is a bad replication. It is entirely without precedent, except that of Mr. Barrow’s, in 3 Wentworth, p. 224, and which, he says, “he fears is unprecedented; and, therefore, perhaps, not to be preferred,” and it would be productive also of the greatest inconvenience. There would, then, be no limit to the pleadings in actions of this nature; for if the defendants had in the meanwhile duly administered the assets which had come into their hands since plea pleaded, they would so rejoin; if further assets came into their hands there would be a surrejoinder by the plaintiff in like form to the present replication; and thus the pleadings might be protracted indefinitely. If, on the other hand, the defendants did not rejoin, but allowed judgment to go by default, there would also be a difficulty; for when judgment is allowed to go by default, the course is for all the intermediate pleadings to be struck out, the declaration alone remaining upon the record. Now, upon judgment of nil dicit in actions against executors, they are liable to costs de bonis propriis. This clearly ought not to be the result where the executors have placed upon the record what was a good defence to the action. We should, therefore, as the plaintiff's counsel admits, have to introduce a new practice, allowing in cases of this nature all the pleadings to remain upon the record, with a judgment of costs de bonis testatoris. There appears to me, however, to be no necessity for any such course, for, in my opinion, a judgment of assets quando acciderint has all the effect which could result from allowing this replication to stand. This matter was first discussed in the case of Mara v. Quin. In that case Lord Kenyon gave it as his opinion "that the ordinary mode of entering up a judgment of assets quando acciderint was not correct; for as on the issue of plene administravit, no evidence could be given of assets after the writ sued out, if the judgment were to affect assets received after the judgment, there was an interval between the commencement of the action and the judgment, in which, if the executor received any assets, they could not be taken at all." Upon which Mr. Justice Ashurst suggested that the plaintiff might reply to the plea of plene administravit "that the executor had assets since," &c.; and this form of replication has, within my own recollection, been adopted (4). I much doubt, however, whether there is any necessity for it; and, certainly, I think that there is no ground whatever for Lord Kenyon's observations as to the form of judgment of assets quando acciderint. That judgment binds assets which may then or thereafter be in the hands of the executors to be administered, irrespective of the fact whether they may have been received by the executor before or after the signing of such judgment. If that is so, it would reach assets which have been received by the executor between the writ and judgment; in the event of such assets not having been administered when the judgment was signed. In other words, the true meaning of the judgment is, that the amount recovered shall be satisfied out of any assets which may thereafter be in the hands of the executors applicable to the payment of the debt. There seems no occasion, therefore, for introducing the form of pleading suggested by Mr. Justice Ashurst, still less the mode of replication which has been made use of here. It appears to me that the difficulty raised by Lord Kenyon is no difficulty at all; that a judgment of assets quando would reach those assets to which this replication has been pleaded; and that the replication is, therefore, bad.

(2) 2 Wms. Saund. 219, a.

(3) Buller’s N.P. 169.

ROLF, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is gratifying to see that the principles of the common law are of sufficient strength to grapple successfully with the difficulties of the present case. I concur with all that has fallen from the Court, in deciding that the judgment of assets quando acciderint embraces all that is sought for by the present replication. I concur also with the remarks of my Brother Parke, with reference to the observations of Lord Kenyon and Mr. Justice Ashurst, in the case of Mara v. Quin. The plaintiff's counsel in his argument, relied upon the case of Taylor v. Holman, for the purpose of shewing that a judgment of assets quando acciderint would not affect assets which had come into the hands of the executors between the time of plea pleaded and of signing judgment. That was an action in scire facias upon a judgment of assets quando, and the declaration stated that divers goods, &c. of the testator, sufficient to pay, &c., had come to and were in the defendant's hands to be administered, &c., without stating that those goods had come to the defendant's hands since the judgment, and prayed execution against the defendant to be levied of those goods according to the form and effect of his said recovery, &c.; the defendant pleaded that after the plaintiff's judgment no goods, &c. of the testator had come to the defendant's hands to be administered, &c.; to which the plaintiff replied that divers goods had come to the defendant's hands, without adding "since the judgment"; and on demurrer it was adjudged that the scire facias was wrong for want of the words, "after the judgment." In the note of Mr. Serj. Williams, in which he cites this case, he says, "It seems necessary to state that the assets came to the executor's hands after the judgment; for the scire facias must pursue the terms of the judgment, which in this case are that the plaintiff do recover his debt to be levied of the goods of the testator which shall thereafter come to the hands of the executor." Now, all the difficulty upon this subject arises from misunderstanding these latter words of the judgment of assets quando. The case of Taylor v. Holman was rightly decided, because it was quite consistent with the declaration in that case, that assets were sought to be affected by the declaration, which had not only come into the hands of the executor, but had been duly administered by him, before the judgment of assets quando had been signed. But it is no authority to shew that the first perception of the assets by the executor must have been at a time posterior to the judgment. All assets, which at the time of the judgment are in the hands of the executor unadministered are liable equally with those which may subsequently come there. If the Court therefore in Mara v. Quin had not yielded too readily to the difficulty suggested, and instead of allowing the judgment to be antedated, had allowed it to stand as of Michaelmas term, 1793, the common law would have done for the plaintiff all that the complicated machinery introduced into the case could effect. For these reasons I think that the present replication is unnecessary, unwarranted, and bad.

(4) See the form 3, Chitty on Pleading, 447.

PLATT, B. concurred.

*Arrest, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3—Warrant of Protection, under 2 & 3 Vict.
c. 41. (Scotch Sequestration Act).*

A warrant of protection from arrest, granted by the Lord Ordinary to a bankrupt, under the 13th section of the Scotch Sequestration Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, is inoperative if the bankrupt is already in custody.

In such case the proper course is to apply for a warrant of liberation under section 17. of that statute.

The defendant in this action being about to leave this country for Scotland, was arrested on the 17th of March last, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 3. At that time and previously he had been carrying on business with a Mr. James Mitchell, as merchants, under the firm of Ross, Mitchell, & Co., at Glasgow and at Toronto, in Upper Canada. The Scotch house having become bankrupt, and the defendant and James Mitchell having duly filed their petition, on the 20th the Lord Ordinary made the following order:—

“Edinburgh, 20th March 1848.

“The Lord Ordinary having considered this petition, with the writs produced, sequestrates the estates now belonging or which shall hereafter belong to the petitioners, John Fiskien and James Mitchell, individual partners of the firm of Ross, Mitchell, & Co., merchants, carrying on business in Glasgow and at Toronto, in Upper Canada, as partners of the said firm, and as individuals, before the date of their discharge, in terms of the act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, and declares the same to belong to their respective creditors, for the purposes of the said act; appoints the creditors to hold two meetings at the times and place mentioned in the petition, for the purpose of electing one interim factor or separate interim factors, and one trustee or separate trustees, or trustees in succession, and commissioners, as directed by the statute; remits to the sheriff of the county, where the said meetings are to be held, to proceed in manner mentioned in the said statute; and grants warrant of protection to the said John Fiskien and James Mitchell respectively, against arrest or imprisonment for civil debt, until the meeting of the creditors for the election of a trustee.

(Signed) “John A. Murray.”

Parke, B. having declined, at chambers, to make any order, on the 22nd of March the sum of 1,329*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* was paid into court, by a Mr. Alexander Mitchell, in lieu of special bail, and the defendant was thereupon discharged out of custody. In the course of the present term a rule having been obtained calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the said sum of money should not be repaid out of court to the defendant, or to Mr. Alexander Mitchell,—

Willes now shewed cause.—The defendant having been arrested on the 17th of March, the warrant of protection from arrest, granted by the Lord Ordinary on the 20th of March, is inoperative to discharge him.

The statute of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41. contemplates two sorts of warrants: the one under the 13th section, by which a debtor, who is still at large, is protected from arrest; the other, under the 17th section, which enacts, "That the Lord Ordinary may, on application made either in the petition for sequestration, or by a separate petition by the debtor, grant a warrant for liberating the debtor if in prison, after such intimation to the incarcerating creditor or his known agent, as the Lord Ordinary shall deem to be just, and after hearing any objection to the granting of such warrant." The defendant should have obtained a warrant for liberation under this section, instead of the warrant under the 13th section, which that before the Court is. This latter warrant is a mere temporary benefit conferred upon the bankrupt, until the meeting of the creditors takes place; and by the 58th section the personal protection of the bankrupt may be renewed for such time as the creditors may think fit. No difficulty will be thrown in the way of the proceedings in Scotland, by holding that the effect of a warrant of protection from arrest will not discharge a person already arrested; for the 67th section of the statute provides for the case of a bankrupt being in custody in England, by authorizing the Lord Ordinary to grant a warrant for his transmission to Scotland for the purpose of being examined, and for his re-transmission after examination to his former custody. Secondly, if the Court should think that this was a warrant liberating the bankrupt from arrest, still it would be inoperative under the 18th section, which provides that a "warrant of protection or liberation shall not be of any effect against the execution of a warrant of arrest or imprisonment in meditatione fugæ. In the case of M'Gregor v. Fiske (1), which was argued before Wightman, J., in the Bail Court, that learned Judge certainly decided that a contemplated departure from England to Scotland was not a meditatio fugæ within the meaning of that section; but it is submitted, that that decision cannot be supported.

Aspland, contra. — The warrant of the Lord Ordinary in this case was sufficient to authorize the discharge of the defendant from custody. Although the word "liberate" is not used, the warrant expressly protects the defendant not only against arrest, but against "imprisonment for civil debt;" its effect, therefore, the bankrupt being in custody at the time, was, by the 18th section of the statute, to discharge him. This Court will not require the authority of the Lord Ordinary to appear upon the face of the warrant — Marsh v. Woolley (2); and they should also leave it to the Lord Ordinary to say whether the warrant is sufficient or not. Neither was there any meditatio fugæ in this case; that point has been expressly decided by Wightman, J. in the case referred to.

POLLOCK, C.B. — I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The defendant having been arrested on the 17th of March, the warrant of protection granted by the Lord Ordinary was not obtained until three days afterwards. The defendant being at that time in custody the warrant was inoperative.

PARKE, B. — I am of the same opinion. Under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 41, the Lord Ordinary has power to grant two distinct kinds of warrants: one protecting the bankrupt from arrest; the other liberating him if already arrested. If a warrant of liberation had been obtained in this case, or if the bankrupt had not been arrested until after the warrant of protection against arrest had been granted, then the question as to the meditatio fugæ, which at chambers I thought was the point in the case, would have arisen. But it does not; for I am clearly of opinion that the present warrant is only a warrant of protection made under the 13th section of the act, and is altogether inoperative in the present case, inasmuch as the defendant was in custody at the time it was obtained. The 18th section does not help the defendant. That should be read reddendo singula singulis, and means that a warrant of protection shall protect the debtor from arrest, and a warrant of liberation shall liberate him from imprisonment if already arrested.

1848. } KERFOOT, EXECUTOR, ETC. v.
May 10. } EDWARDS.

Practice—Plea—Time for Pleading—Abatement—Oyer.

The rule that where oyer has been demanded, the defendant has as much time for pleading after it is granted as he had when he demanded it, is applicable as well to a plea in abatement as to a plea in bar.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, as executor of one James Kerfoot, deceased. The declaration was in debt, and contained a profert of the letters testamentary in the usual form. The declaration was delivered on the 7th of April last. On the 8th of April the defendant demanded oyer and a copy of the letters testamentary. This was granted on the 11th of April. On the 13th, the defendant delivered a plea in abatement. A summons was thereupon taken out and attended before Alderson, B., calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the plea in abatement should not be set aside, on the ground that it had been pleaded more than four days after the delivery of the declaration, but the learned Judge refused to make any order. Notice was then given by the plaintiff to the defendant, that he should treat the plea in abatement as a nullity, and sign judgment for want of a plea, after the time for pleading in bar should have expired. Final judgment was accordingly signed on the 20th of April. A rule having been obtained calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why that judgment should not be set aside,—

Crompton now shewed cause.—It is submitted that the time for pleading in abatement had expired before the plea was delivered in this case. Although the rule with respect to pleading in bar is, that the defendant has as many pleading days after oyer is granted as he had at the time he demanded it, that is not the case with respect to a plea in abatement. A defendant cannot plead in abatement after the four days from the delivery of the declaration has expired.

[PARKE, B.—Have you any authority on the point?]

In the case of Barrow v. Bell (1), the facts were these :—It was an action by an executor, and the declaration was delivered on the 30th of May 1846. At seven P.M. on the 3rd of June, there was a demand of oyer of the letters testamentary, which was given at five minutes before nine P.M. on the 6th of June, but it being impossible to deliver a plea that night within office hours, a plea in abatement was delivered on Monday, the 8th of June, before eleven o'clock. Judgment as for want of a plea having been signed on the 12th, this Court refused a rule to set it aside. The defendant would have been in time with his plea in that case, if he had had as much pleading time after oyer was granted as he had when he demanded it.

Welsby, who appeared in support of the rule, was not called upon by the Court.

[PARKE, B.—The decision in Barrow v. Bell probably proceeded upon the ground that for a plea in abatement to be in time, it must be pleaded within the four days, including both the first and last. That was the old rule; but by the rule of Hilary term, 2 Will. 4. r. 8, which provides, "that in all cases in which any particular number of days, not expressed to be clear days, is prescribed by the rules or practice of the courts, the same shall be reckoned exclusively of the first day and inclusively of the last day," the old rule was changed; and, accordingly, in Ryland v. Wormald (2), we decided, that since that rule the four days for pleading in abatement are to be computed exclusively of the day of delivering the declaration and inclusively of the last day. The Court were probably unmindful of this rule and case when they refused to set aside the judgment in Barrow v. Bell, and not because they thought that when oyer has been demanded there was any different rule prevailing in respect to pleading in bar and pleading in abatement.]

May 10. } THE QUEEN v. RENTON.

Prisoner—Writ of Extent—Escape—Recapture and Detainer.

A writ of extent may be made returnable in vacation.

If a defendant in prison under a writ of extent be taken out of the precincts of the prison for a time, by order of the Commissioners of Excise, but without a writ, for the purpose of giving evidence, and be afterwards brought back and detained in the same custody, such custody is lawful.

Upon the 31st of January last, the defendant was taken into custody and conveyed to the county gaol, by the sheriff of Surrey, under a writ of extent, issued at the suit of the Crown, for certain penalties incurred by the defendant for a breach of the Excise laws. The writ was made returnable in vacation. On the 12th of February, and whilst he was in such custody, the defendant was taken out of the precincts of the gaol, by order of the Commissioners of Excise, for the purpose of giving evidence before a jury in the matter of such extent. But no writ of habeas corpus or any other legal process had been obtained for that purpose. After having given evidence the defendant was taken back to gaol, where he had ever since been detained.

Upon affidavits stating these facts, a rule had been obtained, calling upon the Attorney General or the Commissioners of Excise, and the sheriff of the county of Surrey, to shew cause why the writ of extent should not be quashed and the defendant discharged out of custody. The rule was obtained upon two grounds: first, that the writ of extent was bad because made returnable in vacation; secondly, that the defendant having been removed from the gaol without a habeas corpus ad testificandum having been obtained, that amounted in law to an escape, and that he could not be retaken.

The Attorney General (Sir J. Jervis), (Watson and Wilde with him), now shewed cause on behalf of the Crown. — As to the first point, the 8th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 86. expressly authorizes the making of writs of extent returnable in vacation. As to the second point, although as between subject and subject the facts of the present case may, in point of law, amount to a voluntary escape; and, therefore, if the defendant were detained at the suit of a private individual, he would be entitled to his discharge, that is not the case where a defendant is in custody at the suit of the Crown. The Crown is not affected by the laches of its officers, and as against the Crown, therefore, there is no such thing as a voluntary escape—Sheffield v. Ratchife (1), where it is said, "It is no reason that the negligence of his officers, and perhaps their compact and combination with the adverse party, should defeat the king"—The Attorney General v. Chitty (2), and The Attorney General v. Walmsley (3). But even if there was a voluntary escape, the Crown had power to retake the defendant and detain him in custody under the original writ of extent. That was expressly decided in an Anonymous case in Savile (4), as follows:—"It was said by Fanshawe, remembrancer of the Queen, that if one should be in execution at the suit of the Queen in the Fleet, the guardian of the Fleet could suffer him to go to his counsel with his keeper; but it is otherwise if one is in execution at the suit of a common person. And the reason is, for this, that if he who is in prison in execution for the Queen should happen to escape, the guardian for the Queen can retake him; it is otherwise in the case of a common person." Although the Court differed in opinion upon another point in this case, upon this they were unanimous. He referred also to Dyer (5), Manning's Ex. Prac. 32, Sir E. Coke's case (6).

Lush and J. W. Rogers, contra. — As to the first point it is admitted that the rule cannot be sustained; but as to the second, the case stands upon a different footing from that upon which it was put by the Attorney General, and the rule ought to be made absolute. This is not a question whether the Crown was bound by the act of its officer, for the Crown itself was in this case a party to the removal of the defendant out of his then custody; and the simple question is, whether the Crown has any power so to do without the leave of a court of law. In Dyer (7) it is expressly laid down, that "the command of the Treasurer and Chancellor are not sufficient warrant to license one condemned in execution to go with a keeper or otherwise at large, for the Queen herself could not do that; as was holden by the opinion of all the Justices of both benches, in the time of Queen Mary"—Thurland's case (8), and 2 Coke's Inst. 187. Even if this were to be treated as the act not of the Crown itself, but of its officers, the authorities cited on the other side only apply to cases where the property of the debtor is concerned. The maxim that the Crown is not bound by the negligence or misconduct of its officers, has never been pushed so far as to affect the person of a subject. With respect to the authority cited from Savile, that was a proceeding ex gratia to the debtor; here, the proceedings were clearly adverse. The rule is otherwise clear, that if there has ever been a voluntary escape a prisoner can never be retaken upon the same writ—Filewood v. Clement (9).

The Attorney General replied.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. There are several points connected with the matter in discussion before us, which might have called for a more solemn and deliberate judgment, inasmuch as the authorities with reference to them are conflicting. But the simple question before us now is, whether a defendant in execution under a writ of extent, who has been taken from prison for a time by the order of the Commissioners of Excise, for the purpose of giving evidence, but who has afterwards been brought back in the same custody, is entitled to his discharge. I do not wish to throw any doubt upon the right of the Crown to remove him for the purpose of giving evidence without any writ issuing for that purpose; but that question need not be decided now. In order to establish the proposition for which the Attorney General has contended, I think the case in Savile furnishes sufficient authority. There is no doubt or conflict of opinion upon that case so far as it decides that if a person who is in prison at the suit of the Queen should happen to escape, the guardian for the Queen can retake him. For these reasons, I think that the present rule should be discharged.

PARKE, B.—I entirely concur in opinion with the Lord Chief Baron. For the purpose of deciding the present case, I will assume that by removing the defendant out of the precincts of the prison, there has been a voluntary escape. Still he is at present in custody; and then the case in Savile shews that such custody is legal, for it decides that he may be retaken under the original writ; and a clear distinction is there taken between the rights of the Crown in this respect and the rights of the subject. In the one case the execution is not satisfied by the escape; in the other it is. This being so, it becomes unnecessary to give any opinion upon the other points which have been raised in the case.

Costs—Suggestion on the Roll; Traverse of—Payment of Costs by Rule.

The plaintiff having obtained a verdict in this court for 30s. in a case within the jurisdiction of the Middlesex County Court, a rule was made absolute for entering a suggestion on the roll depriving him of costs, and for his paying the defendant his costs of suit. This suggestion was traversed by the plaintiff:—Held, that as the costs of suit depended upon the trial of the suggestion, the Court had no power by rule to compel the plaintiff to pay them.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the taxation of the plaintiff's costs should not be stayed until after the trial of the issue raised on the traverse of the suggestion.

The case having been tried, before the sheriff, on a writ of trial, and the plaintiff having obtained a verdict for 30s., a rule was made absolute in this court for entering a suggestion on the roll to deprive the plaintiff of costs, and for the plaintiff to pay the defendant his costs of suit, pursuant to the statutes 23 Geo. 3. c. 33. and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97.

T. Jones shewed cause.—The plaintiff is too late in his application, the rule for a suggestion having been made absolute on the 24th of November last, and the plaintiff's affidavit in support of the present rule being sworn on the 28th of April. Besides, it is not pretended that the term as to payment of costs has crept into the rule by mistake. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

Lush, in support of the rule.—The Court has exceeded its power in ordering the plaintiff to pay the costs, for the costs depend upon the suggestion, which being traversed is a matter to be tried, and according to the result of the trial the plaintiff may receive costs instead of having to pay them. If this rule were discharged, the Court could not enforce the terms of the former rule, and compel the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs of suit. Take the case of an ordinary action; the Court could not by rule order the plaintiff to pay the debt and costs, and in the event of his refusal enforce payment by attachment. As long as the traverse remains on the record there is an inconsistency in directing the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs. The truth is, that this term has found its way into the rule by mistake of the officer of the court, and ought not to have been introduced into any rule after the decision of this Court in Watson v. Quilley (1), that a suggestion similar to the present might be traversed. All that the plaintiff requires is, that costs may not be taxed until after the trial of the suggestion.

[PARKE, B.—This term ought not to have been introduced into the rule.]

T. Jones.—The Court has the power of doing what is right between the parties, and in this case justice has been done. This is, in fact, an application to this Court to rehear a question which has been decided in a previous term, and is contrary to the established practice of the courts—Todd v. Jeffery (2). Besides, the plaintiff has no merits in this case; if he could have shewn to the Court either that the cause of action did not accrue in Middlesex, or that he would have been successful on the traverse, the rule for entering a suggestion would not have been made absolute.

[PLATT, B.—The plaintiff contends that the rule improvide emanavit; that it ought not to have been made absolute in its present terms.]

[PARKE, B.—There is a contradiction in the present state of things which ought not to be allowed to remain. A rule compelling the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs of suit, and a suggestion on the record which has been traversed, are inconsistent.]

[PLATT, B.—The rule has not been drawn up in the proper form.]

PARKE, B.—The Court had no power to make the rule complained of. The taxation of costs must be suspended until the trial of the issue. The present rule will, therefore, be absolute to strike out of the former rule so much as orders the plaintiff to pay the defendant his costs.

of the said bill of exchange :—Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to sign judgment, on account of the variance between the rule to plead and the plea pleaded.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Alderson, B., setting aside a judgment, should not be rescinded.

An action having been brought by the plaintiffs, as indorsees, against the defendant, as the drawer of a bill of exchange for 100*l.*, with counts for money paid, and on an account stated, the defendant obtained a rule to plead several matters : viz. first, a traverse of the making of the bill ; secondly, no notice of dishonour ; thirdly, as to the second and third counts, never indebted ; and fourthly, as to 100*l.*, parcel, &c., that before the commencement of the action the defendant indorsed and delivered to the plaintiffs a bill of exchange for 100*l.*, which the plaintiffs received in satisfaction of the said sum of 100*l.* Under this rule, the defendant pleaded, fourthly, that, as to the said sum of 100*l.*, parcel of the monies in the second and third counts, he, the defendant, for and on account of the said sum of 100*l.*, indorsed and delivered to the plaintiffs a certain bill of exchange for 100*l.*, drawn by the defendant and accepted by one T. Jackson, and the said plaintiffs took and received the said bill of exchange for and on account of the said sum, parcel, &c. Averment, that the defendant had not due notice of the non-payment of the said bill of exchange, so taken by the plaintiffs, as in this plea mentioned. The plaintiffs thereupon signed judgment, which was set aside by Alderson, B., at chambers, on the authority of Holliday v. Bohn (1). The above rule having been obtained,—

Horn now shewed cause.—The judgment was irregular, and was properly set aside by the learned Judge ; for the plaintiffs were not justified in signing judgment, on the ground of a slight variance between the description of one of the pleas in the rule to plead and the plea itself. In truth, the plea pleaded is substantially in accordance with the rule to plead. It states that the plaintiffs received the bill for and on account of the sum of 100*l.*, which is in effect a statement that the bill was received by the plaintiffs in satisfaction, because it is a statement that the plaintiffs, by their laches, caused it to operate by way of satisfaction. But admitting that a variance exists between the rule to plead and the plea itself, there is no case which shews that the plaintiffs were authorized to sign judgment on account of such variance. The case does not stand on the same footing as where a non-issuable plea is pleaded, when the defendant is under terms of pleading issuably. In that case the defendant is properly punished by having judgment signed against him, because his improper pleading is in clear violation of his engagement, and tends to delay and embarrass the plaintiff ; but that is not so here. In the present case there has been nothing more than a slight unintentional misdescription in the rule of the plea intended to be pleaded, and no inconvenience or injury to the plaintiffs has been suggested. Holliday v. Bohn is in point : that was an action of debt on a promissory note, and upon an account stated ; and the defendant having obtained a rule to plead, to the first count non fecit and payment, and to the second count nunquam indebitatus, by mistake delivered with pleas to the first count a plea of non assumpsit to the second count, whereupon the plaintiff signed judgment. The Court set aside the judgment, saying “that the present case differed from that of a defendant who delivers several pleas without having obtained a rule to plead several matters ; in which case the plaintiff may properly sign judgment.” The proper course for the plaintiffs to pursue was to procure the rule to plead to be amended at the expense of the defendant, or to move the Court or a Judge to strike out the last plea, as not being pleaded conformably with the rule to plead. He cited Badman v. Pugh (2) and Baily v. Baker (3).

[ROLFE, B.—In Holliday v. Bohn there were two counts : the defendant pleaded properly to the first count ; and the question is, whether he required any rule to enable him to plead to the second count on the account stated.]

Arbitration—Award—Rule to pay Money—Demand of Sum due.

*In an action in which several issues were raised all matters in difference were referred to two arbitrators and an umpire, the costs of the cause to abide the result. The umpire awarded that all further proceedings in the cause should thenceforth cease, and be no further prosecuted, and that the plaintiff should pay to the defendant 12*s*. 0*½d*., being the amount which the umpire found to be due to him. A demand of 21*l*. 16*s*. 2*d*., being the costs of the cause, had been made upon the plaintiff, and payment refused, but no demand had been made of the sum of 12*s*. 0*½d*.*

A rule having been obtained calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why he should not pay to the defendant both those sums, the Court, under the circumstances, refused to make the rule absolute for payment of the one sum that had been demanded.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why he should not pay the defendant two sums of 21*l*. 16*s*. 2*d*. and 12*s*. 0*½d*. pursuant to an award.

It appeared from the affidavits that an action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, in which several issues were raised; and that by a Judge's order all matters in difference between the parties were referred to two arbitrators, with power to appoint an umpire; the costs of the cause to abide the result, and the costs of the reference and award to be in the discretion of the arbitrators. The umpire awarded "that all further proceedings in the said cause shall henceforth cease, and be no further prosecuted;" that the plaintiff should, on &c. pay to the defendant 12*s*. 0*½d*., being the amount which he found to be due to him; and that upon payment thereof the defendant should deliver to the plaintiff the four ash-pans mentioned in the particulars of the matters in difference; and that each of them, the said plaintiff and defendant, should bear and pay his own costs of the reference, and that the costs of his award should be borne and paid by them in equal moieties. It also appeared that a personal demand of the sum of 21*l*. 16*s*. 2*d*., being the costs in the cause, had been made upon the plaintiff, and payment refused, but that no demand had been made of the sum of 12*s*. 0*½d*.

Pashley shewed cause.—This rule must be discharged on two grounds. First, the award is bad and cannot be enforced. The costs of the cause are to abide the result, and no result appears on the face of the award, for the direction that all further proceedings in the cause are to cease and to be no further prosecuted cannot be considered as a result. In re Leeming v. Fearley (1) was an action of replevin which was referred to arbitration, the costs of the cause to abide the event. The award was that the plaintiff should pay the defendant 6*l*., and that the action should be no further prosecuted; and it was held that the award did not shew who ought to pay the costs, and, consequently, was not final. Blanchard v. Lilly (2) is distinguishable. There the award directed the actions to be discontinued, and on that account appears to have been held final. Secondly, there has been no demand of these two sums; and the authorities shew that in a case like the present a demand must be made similar to that which is necessary on motion for an attachment—Richards v. Patterson (3), Winwood v. Hoult (4).

Hugh Hill, contra.—The rule in this case may be made absolute, at least as to 21l. 16s. 2d., which sum has been demanded. This is like the case of a party demanding a large sum, and obtaining an attachment for the non-payment of that sum by agreeing to waive the costs.

[PARKE, B.—You cannot have a rule in this case unless you could have one for an attachment. The defendant ought not to make his application as it were piecemeal.]

Secondly, the award is sufficient. The costs are to abide the result, not the event, of the cause. The Court will always presume in favour of the validity of an award. The award amounts to a direction to the plaintiff to pay a sum of money to the defendant, and it is quite clear that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I do not come to that conclusion; and certainly this is not a case in which we ought to enforce the extraordinary power of the Court.

T., then being two of the Commissioners for the affairs of taxes, acting for the said district of St. Anne, according to the acts of parliament, &c.; that in and by the said assessment he, the plaintiff, as such inhabitant as aforesaid, and as a person so exercising the said trade and business in the parish, district, &c. aforesaid, was, by the said J. S. and E. W., then being such assessors as aforesaid, assessed in the sum of 25*l.*, as and for the duties of 22*l.* 10*s.* and 2*l.* 10*s.*, payable by horse-dealers, under the statute passed in the forty-eighth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, and in the fifty-second year of the reign of the last-mentioned king, for, amongst other things, granting duties, payable by persons who should use or exercise the trade and business of a horse-dealer within the cities of London and Westminster, and the liberties of the same respectively, the parishes of St. Marylebone and St. Pancras, in the county of Middlesex, and the weekly bills of mortality, or the borough of Southwark, in the county of Surrey; and also in the further sum of 2*l.* 16*s.*, part whereof, to wit, 2*l.* 10*s.* was the additional duty of 10*l.* per cent. upon the said sum of 25*l.*, that is to say, such additional duty of 10*l.* per cent. as was granted to our Lady the now Queen, by the statute passed in the third year of her reign, for granting to her said Majesty duties of Customs, Excise, and assessed taxes, and the residue of which said sum of 8*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* was such additional duty of 10*l.* per cent., granted by the last-mentioned act, upon and in addition to certain other duties, amounting to 3*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, in which the plaintiff was duly assessed in and by the said assessment, and to the payment of which, and to be so assessed as aforesaid he, the plaintiff, was according to the said several statutes relating to assessed taxes liable.

The avowry then went on to allege the payment by the plaintiff of the said sums of 3*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* and 6*s.* 10*d.*; the due appointment of the defendant by the Commissioners as collector of the said duties; the delivery to him of a warrant by the Commissioners requiring him to distrain, on non-payment thereof; the demand by the defendant, upon the plaintiff, of the said duties of 25*l.* and 2*l.* 10*s.*; a refusal, by the plaintiff, to pay the same; and the taking of the goods in the declaration mentioned by the defendant, as such collector, and by virtue of the said warrant as and for a distress for the said sum of 27*l.* 10*s.* so in arrear. Verification.

At the trial of the cause, a verdict was taken for the defendant, by consent, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following

CASE.

The avowry was admitted by the plaintiff to be entirely true, except as far as relates to the plaintiff having used or exercised the trade and business of a horse-dealer, or being or having been liable to be assessed for the duty payable by horse-dealers or persons using or exercising the trade or business of horse-dealers.

The duty was imposed under the provisions of the statute 48 Geo. 3. c. 55. sch. H, and 52 Geo. 3. c. 93. sch. H, whereby it is made payable by every person who shall use or exercise the trade and business of a "horse-dealer."

As to the plaintiff's liability to be so assessed, the following were the facts admitted at the trial, and on which the plaintiff contended that he was not liable.

The plaintiff, during the time in respect of which the assessment was made, as hereinafter mentioned, viz. from the 5th of April 1844 to the 5th of April 1845, was the proprietor of Aldridge's Repository, in Upper St. Martin's Lane, in the said parish of St. Anne, Westminster, and there carried on the business of selling horses and carriages, harness, and other things, for persons upon commission. The repository was open to all persons desirous of selling property of that description, and the general mode of selling was by public auction. These sales took place periodically, viz. once a week in the winter months, and twice in each week in the summer months, and the horses or carriages or other property were generally sent into the plaintiff's premises a few days previously to the day on which they were to be sold. They were arranged in lots, and catalogues and particulars of sale were printed and distributed, and the property was then put up for sale by public auction, by the plaintiff or his manager, upon the premises. If the same was sold the plaintiff charged the seller a commission of 5*l.* per cent. upon the purchase-money, and also a further sum for the keep of the horses or standing of the carriages or other property until the time of sale. If the same was not sold the plaintiff charged from 5*s.* to 7*s.* 6*d.* for putting it up by auction, and the keep or standing as before stated. * Where the property was put up for sale, but was not sold at the public auction, the plaintiff occasionally sold it after the auction for the owner by private contract, and he then made the same charges as if it had been sold at the auction. The number of horses sold by the plaintiff for other persons, between the 5th of April 1844 and the 5th of April 1845, otherwise than by public auction, was to that of the sales by public auction in the proportion of about 3 to 100.

The plaintiff also occasionally, but very rarely, received horses and carriages and other property from other persons for sale by private contract on their account, but not exceeding six instances in the course of any one year, and he then charged the commission as upon a sale by auction, and the keep or standing if sold, and if not sold then only the keep or standing, to the proprietors of such property. The business carried on by the plaintiff was simply selling horses and carriages and other property, in the way before described, for and as the property of other persons. He did not buy horses or carriages or other property for other persons, nor did he buy or sell horses or carriages or other property on his own account, in the way of trade or business. The plaintiff's principal business was selling horses and carriages by auction as before mentioned; but he also frequently sold by auction or commission for other persons being the owners thereof, harness and stable utensils and the stock of horse-dealers and people employing horses and carriages, and occasionally also leases of the premises on which the business of such persons had been carried on. The plaintiff, also, on all his printed posting-bills and catalogues of sales, printed and issued the following notice:—"The public is respectfully requested to take notice that the business of Aldridge's Repository is strictly confined to sales by auction and commission; there being no dealing on the part of the proprietor, nor by any person employed by him, to operate to the prejudice of either buyers or sellers, and that under no circumstance is the practice of misrepresenting the ownership of horses ever resorted to. The days of payment for the proceeds are Saturdays and Mondays only, upon production of the printed receipt." The plaintiff also, several times in each week, caused advertisements to be inserted in the public daily newspapers to the same effect. The plaintiff, during all the time aforesaid, took out auctioneers' licences, and paid the duty thereon, for himself and also for his manager; and exercised no other trade or business as before mentioned.

The plaintiff having declined to pay this assessment, on the ground that he was not liable to the horse-dealers' duty, and having intimated his intention to raise the question of his liability, the seizure in question was made upon his goods, and he thereupon caused the goods to be replevied; and this action was then commenced by the plaintiff, in order to raise the question of his liability to be so assessed, as in the avowry set forth. If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was liable to be assessed to the horse-dealers' duty as aforesaid, or that if not so liable the avowry could still be supported, the verdict for the defendant was to stand. If the Court should be of a contrary opinion, the verdict was to be entered for the plaintiff, with 5*l.* damages. The Court to be at liberty to draw such inferences of facts as a jury would have drawn; and, at the desire of either party, the present case is to be converted into a special verdict, and the inference of facts found by the Court in that case to be stated as facts.

Sir F. Thesiger (Ogle and Bovill with him), for the plaintiff.—First, it will be contended by the other side, that replevin will not lie in the present case; but George v. Chambers (1) is a conclusive authority on that point in favour of the plaintiff. Parke, B., in his judgment in that case, says, "though in ordinary practice it is applied only to a distress for rent, yet a replevin is, at common law, a remedy applicable in all cases where goods are improperly taken."

[PARKE, B.—You need not argue that point further.]

Secondly, was the plaintiff liable to be assessed to the duty imposed upon horse-dealers? Did he exercise the trade or business of a horse-dealer within the meaning of the statutes relating to assessed taxes? It is submitted that he did not. To be a dealer a party must both sell and buy. He must buy with the intention to sell again—The King v. the Commissioners of Excise (2).

[ALDERSON, B.—I take it that the strict definition of “dealing” is “distributing.” A dealer is one who distributes.]

By the 5th section of the 29 Geo. 3. c. 49, a horse-dealer is defined to be one who seeks his living by “buying and selling” horses. That same definition must be applied in giving a meaning to the word “horse-dealer,” in the statutes under which the assessment in question has been made, for although the 48 Geo. 3. c. 55. repeals the former statutes with respect to the amount of duties to be paid, in other respects their provisions are still in force.

[PARKE, B.—You will be met by a preliminary objection that the assessment of the plaintiff as a horse-dealer by the assessor, is final, subject only to an appeal to the Commissioners, under the 69th section of 43 Geo. 3. c. 161, and from them, in the manner pointed out by the 73rd section, to the Judges.]

The objection in the present case is not to an overcharge, but to the assessment itself; and although the 73rd section allows an appeal in such case, the legislature does not use any words depriving the party of his right of action. Here the assessor acted without jurisdiction, if the plaintiff was not, in point of fact, a horse-dealer within the meaning of the statute.

[ALDERSON, B.—Upon looking at the 9th section of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 99, under which the assessors are appointed, and to the 30th section of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 161, by which assessors are required to make assessments on persons refusing or neglecting to deliver lists, it appears to me intended to make the judgment of the assessors final, subject to appeal in certain cases.]

That would be so in cases where they had jurisdiction to make an assessment upon the party, but not otherwise. In Weaver v. Price (3) it was held, that trespass lies against magistrates for granting a warrant to levy poor-rates, if the party distrained upon has no land in the parish in which the rate is made. The objection taken in that case was that the remedy was by appeal against the rate, but it was overruled upon the ground that the Justices acted without jurisdiction—Charleton v. Alway (4). In Marshall v. Pitman (5), where the plaintiff, being an inhabitant of a parish, had been rated to the poor-rate, and claimed to be exempt because he had no stock in trade there, it was properly held that, the Justices having jurisdiction to make the rate, the plaintiff's remedy was by appeal to the Quarter Sessions and not by action.

[PARKE, B.—The question is, whether the assessment of the plaintiff as a horse-dealer is not matter within the jurisdiction of the assessors; if it be, the assessor's judgment upon it would be final, subject to the right of appeal—Brittain v. Kinnaird (6), The Queen v. Bolton (7).]
